114 601 194 171 835 It did not even occur to Morgan that the whole Turanian system was based on this principle. This peculiarity, however, is precisely the result of the primitive system of cross-cousin marriage, from which the Turanian system also developed. Under cross-cousin marriage, marriage between the children of brother and sister is the only form of marriage, and such male and female cousins accordingly call themselves "husband" and "wife." That the Turanian system is the result of cousin marriage is evident also from other terms, which /228/ must have been inexplicable to Morgan and which he does not even bring up, not having found an explanation for them. For example, among the Tamil, if "I" am a man, then the wife of my sister's son is my "daughter" (as in the Gilyak and Australian terminology); the husband of my sister's daughter is my "son" (as in the Australian cousin marriage); the husband of my father's sister's daughter is my "brother" (as in the Gilyak and Australian terminology); the father of my wife is my "father-in-law" and "uncle" (father-in-law and brother of the mother among the Gilyak, father-in-law and brother of the father or mother among the Australians); the mother of my wife is my "mother-in-law" and "aunt" (aunt and father's sister among the Gilyak, mother-in-law and father's sister or mother's sister among the Australians); my brother's wife is my "female cousin" (i.e., a daughter of my mother's brother or of my father's sister); and, finally, the "wife" of a son of my father's sister, and

/228 cont./

114 171 the wife of a son of my mother's brother, is my "sister" (typical cross-marriage). A corresponding series of terms 194 is met if "I" am a woman.

601 All this is without question evidence that the Turanian 835 system was a system of cross-cousin marriage, although th examples introduced by us above (the Batak and the tribes central India) are evidence that even in the homeland of t system cross-cousin marriage has already begun to change the unilateral cousin marriage of the Gilyak type.

121 It now remains to explain from this point of view a co 194 tradictory (according to Morgan's opinion) fact in the 601 Ganowanian system, namely, that, in contradistinction to 835 the Tamil system, if "I" am a man, then all the children 615 my male cousins, that is, the children of my father's siste [171] son and the children of my mother's brother's son, are my [114] "sons and daughters." We find the analogue of this in the Gilyak system. Let us recall the four-clan phratry and the case where clan V was short of women, and male cousins c the first clans A and V were obliged to take wives from the corresponding generation of clan S; under the norms of gro marriage the children of these cousins are each other's "brothers" and "sisters" and, consequently, are children fo both male cousins. The first step in this direction was the formation of that four-clan phratry which we have seen among the Gilyak. This happened quite simply, and we sl see that these four clans in an embryonic state exist also in the Australian system.

121 Let us imagine a society divided, like the Australian 194 one, into two phratries, exchanging women in each genera 835 tion, so that the children of a sister marry the children of 615 her brother, and thus the wife of each man is the sister of the husband of his sister.

601 /191 cont./
174 the natural key to the /192/ restoration of the Gilyak system [58] of marriage in its pure primitive aspect.
[178]

But what does the kinship terminology teach us?

First of all, we see that the Gilyak kinship terminology does not have special terms for relationships by marriage, which are absolutely identical with the terms of blood (cognate) kinship. In Gilyak, kinsmen by marriage are [602] called pandf, i.e., people of a common origin, cognates,
[611] for a man, from the side of the mother, for women -- from the side of the father. The father of the wife is the brother of the mother; the mother of the husband is the sister of the father; the husband is the son of the father's sister; the wife is the daughter of the mother's brother, etc.

It is clear that such a terminology could develop only under conditions where marriages had to be made exclusively with blood kinsmen through the father or through the mother. This was first. In what form these marriages were accomplished is shown to us by other kinship terms.

614 Within each clan, as we have seen, in each generation
601 the wives of tuvn, that is, the wives of own and collateral
582 brothers, call each other sisters, and their mothers-in-law, that +174 is the mothers of all these tuvn, they call aunts (sisters of the father), and, conversely, these latter call them nieces; on the other hand, every male calls the sister of his father-in-law his mother. From this it is clear that 1) the wives of all the members of the clan are necessarily kinswomen taken from one clan, in other words, each clan takes wives for itself exclusively from one common clan, with marriage outside of this clan being impossible; 2) under these conditions, marriage is regulated by generations, i.e., in each generation the clansmen-"brothers" take from a clan which is obligatory for marriage a corresponding generation of "sisters," the nieces of those women whom the generation of their "fathers" married, and their descendents, in turn, take the following generation of "sisters," the nieces of their mothers, etc. This is why the wives of "brothers" call each other

/192 cont./

"sisters" (for they are such in reality), their mothers-in-law -- aunts on their fathers' side, and husbands call the sisters of their fathers-in-law mothers. We shall not speak here of the group character of these marriage unions and of the classes of "mothers," "fathers," "brothers," "fathers-in-law" /wives' fathers/ which arise from this, for we have already explained it in detail earlier.

Thus to the first principle -- the obligation of marriage with one's blood kinsmen -- is added another principle -- the wives of clansmen must of necessity be taken from one common clan, i.e., two clans are bound to each other by a mutual obligation: one must take wives from the other clan, and the latter /193/ must give its wives to the former. All men of the latter, according to generation, are considered from birth to be the husbands of the women of the corresponding generation of the other clan, and, as we have seen, these classes in actuality call each other pu and an'g:ej.

But from the kinship terminology we know that the reverse is not allowed, i.e., men of the second clan and women of the first are not joined in the class of husbands and wives. Thus, an exchange marriage between the two aforementioned clans is not allowed. All these principles which have been deduced by us above a priori from the kinship terminology completely correspond to contemporary reality. We have seen that even now there exists the right of marriage, that even now a marriage from the class akhmalk is alone considered "pure," that marriages of clansmen are usually made from one common clan and that exchange marriage between clans is not allowed. Now we can with confidence continue our analysis.

But what is this clan from which clansmen are obliged to take wives? The answer to this is that detail of nomenclature whereby the mother of every man is the sister of his wife's father; in other words, all wives of clansmen are taken from that clan from which their ancestress came. The members of the clan are thus, both on the father's side and

/193 cont./

614 on the mother's side, of one common blood. For each individual member of the clan, as we have seen above, this is expressed 601 in the fact that a person usually marries the daughters of his 602 mother's brother, in other words, the daughters of every man
582 belong to the sons of his sister. This principle also is the link
*174 from which not only the classificatory system of kinship, so complicated in appearance, but also group marriage and finally, the clan grew. We shall also examine this dynamic. We shall see below that this principle, still so common nowadays among many primitive peoples, the principle that the daughters of the brothers belong to the sons of their sisters, goes back to the most ancient stage of the maternal family, the one that immediately followed blood marriage, and served as the basic method of providing the group with wives. In order to satisfy this most vital need in the early stages of human society, every mother obtained for her sons the daughters of her brother, in other words, all the descendants of a sister obtained as wives all the descendants of her brother. Why such a principle arose, why they took as wives exclusively the daughters of the mother's brother, and not the children of the mother's sister or the daughters of the father's brother, we shall see below. Now let us look at the consequences *174 this principle had in its practical application.
582 /194/ 1) Once the daughters of the brother belonged from 591 birth to the sons of the sister, it was most natural that the 581 future husbands should go at a very early age to the homes of their future wives /sic/. This arrangement is still to be seen among the Gilyak, as among many other primitive tribes. In "pure" marriages, i.e., between the children of brother and sister, from earliest childhood the future wife moves [602] to the home of the husband and grows up with him. Terminology has perpetuated this arrangement in that even from birth children in certain classes stand in the reciprocal

/197 cont./

*174 The natural result of this system was the classificatory
582 system of kinship, according to which a man gives the name
●601 of wife not only to his individual wife, but also to all her sisters, and to the wives of all of his own brothers and to the sisters of these wives, both own and collateral; on the same basis he gives the name of mother to all the wives of the brothers of his father, both own and collateral, while he calls their husbands his fathers, and he calls their children his brothers and sisters; in exactly the same way he calls the brother of his mother father-in-law, her sister -- mother, while he calls the daughters of the brothers of the mother his wives.

The classificatory system, which appears to be so complicated, becomes completely clear and simple; it is logically developed out of a basic principle -- the female offspring of a brother belong to all the male offspring of his sister. At first it may seem strange and extremely complicated that, for example, a man's wives include not only the wives of his brothers, but also their sisters. In actuality, this is explained very simply -- the wives of the brothers cannot be other than sisters, and they all belong to the whole group of "brothers" -- cousins of these sisters. Or, a man calls the brother of his mother "father-in-law"; this is because his father-in-law can only be the brother of his mother, no one else.

The only variation possible in this system is connected with the differences in the rights of group marriage of younger and elder brothers. Among some peoples all the brothers are equally the group husbands of their mutual spouses; among others only the younger brothers enjoy group rights with respect to the wives of elder brothers. Among the Gilyak, as we have seen, we find both systems, and correspondingly two terminologies with respect to the brothers of the father and the wives of the brothers. Among some only the elder brothers of the father are called fathers, while

/197 cont./

*174 among others only the younger brothers; similarly among s 582 a man only calls the wives of his elder "brothers" his wives,
● 601 while among others all the wives of the brothers equally.

Now we shall continue our analysis of the Gilyak norms

*174 6. Once every mother by right takes the daughters of h 614 brother /198/ for her sons, then by the same right her daug must belong to the sons of the sister of her husband; this sister, moreover, cannot be married to her brother, because as we have seen, the exchange of women between the descendants of sister and brother is not permitted. Thus, si by side with the two groups, the descendants of the brother and the descendants of the sister, there is formed a third group -- the offspring of the sisters of the husbands of the latter group.

7. Since in each of these groups the men draw their wives from the group of the brothers of the mother, while the women marry into the third group of the sister of the father, each group forms a completely exogamous unit, i.e clan, and, depending on whether the men go into the clan of the wife or, vice versa, the women into the clan of the husband, there resulted either a maternal or a paternal clan. Among the Gilyak the clan has been paternal from remote times. The strength and unity of such a clan union rested not only on the negative bond of exogamy (exogamy or prohibitions against certain degrees of kinship can exist even without a clan union), but on the precious positive ties, on the common right of marriage, on the common right of the clansmen to the women of the blood clan of their ancestress, on the mutual rights of group marriage, on the privilege of having for one's sons-in-law /zyat'ya/ one's blood kinsmen -- the children of the sisters of one's fathers, the members of that clan which from time immemorial has married its ancestresses. The strength of this union was doubled by the peculiarity of its composition. Within the clan there was not a single non-blood element: if the clan was maternal and the sons-in-law moved to the

/198 cont./

614 home of the wife, all the women born into the clan remained
*174 together; their husbands, taken into the clan, were all of the same clan -- the male cousins of their wives, the sons of the sisters of their fathers. In the agnatic clan the imported 602 women were all kin to each other, either sisters or aunts and 614 nieces (and blood kinswomen -- female cousins of their
*174 husbands), the daughters of the brothers of their mothers. This common blood kinship of the representatives of both sexes of both the native and the imported elements of the clan is a still more important cement of the clan union, a religious cement binding together all the elements with the highest ties of the common cult of the ancestors. The ●601 terminology has perpetuated this arrangement by the fact that
614 the wives in each generation call each other sister and their
*174 husbands' mothers -- aunts, and a man calls the daughter of his mother's brother wife, while a woman calls the son of her father's sister husband.

614 8. Since marriage is obligatory into the group of the 587 sisters of the father exclusively, once the daughters of a man
*174 belong from birth /199/ to the sons of his sister, and this rule, naturally, became a religious imperative, then under no circumstances can either the men or the women marry out-
[171] side of the indicated groups. Hence a twofold levirate, so often encountered, by the way, among the American Indians. If the individual husband of a woman should die, she cannot under any circumstances leave the group of her husband. Whether young or old, she passes to one of the class of "brothers" of her deceased husband. Conversely, if a man's wife dies, he cannot look for a wife anywhere except in the class of her sisters.

614 9. Under this arrangement, as long as it maintains its 583 complete purity, within the marriage groups there can be
*174 no question either of abductions or of bride price.

/204 cont./

178 In just this way, under exceptional conditions, it is true,
*614 the foundation of the marital-clan system was breached, but
615 once it was breached in this way, it had to spread more and more and lead to the condition where marriages of different persons outside of the old phratry became, if not lawful, at least a completely acceptable phenomenon.

Now we shall consider the second case, where clan A does not die out completely, but has only become considerably thinned out in people. On account of the shortage of women in clan A, a part of the men of clan C were obliged to take their wives, as in the first case, from the closest lawful clan, namely, from B, but in the case where, as in the first instance, C does not have a right to give its women to D, and therefore to the phratry, in order to guarantee D women, a fifth clan, E, will have to be added, giving women to D and taking them from C. But, besides this, there is still another consequence, which confuses matters still more.

Since both the members of clan A and some of the members of clan C take /205/ women from clan B, then the first and second in each generation will be married to sisters, and, although they are members of different clans, they will be members of a group marriage with a group of sisters (1) and their children, as the terminology shows (see

● [601]

1. By a curious coincidence in this case the group husbands call each other navkh -- a term signifying the same thing as the famous term punalua, comrade, participator.

above), will be tuvn, i.e., brothers and sisters, and, consequently, forbidden for each other, so that in the following generation the women from clan A will not have the possibility of marrying into clan C and will be obliged every second generation to seek their husbands entirely outside their phratry, which still more destroys the strength and

/206 cont./

*614 marry, according to the old norm, the daughter of the
615 mother's brother. Finally, in some cases the descendants
178 of this man take wives /207/ either from the old or from the new clan of the father-in-law, depending on circumstances, and both clans begin to be considered lawful clans. It may happen that not merely two, but many more of these lawful clans are accumulated in the course of time, both for the individual person and for the whole clan, but nevertheless each man as an individual strives to observe the old norm in arranging a marriage, seeking his wife above all from the clan of his mother, preferably always the daughter of the brother of this last.

Such is the power of the old norm. But its role is not limited to this. Compelled to make a retreat in one direction, it develops the strength of its age-old inertia with still greater intensity in other directions. Having out of necessity allowed marriages outside the phratry, having allowed the possibility for members of one clan to take wives from different clans, it has extended the whole system of regulations both to the free marriages and to all the clans which even sporadically enter into marriage relations with this or that clan.

*614 This amalgamation of the old institution with the new 615 one and the extension to it of all the regulations of the old
●601 norms and prohibitions have made not only the kinship
178 terminology, but also the character of the group marriage unusually complicated and confused. Under the old system, when marriages were arranged from one particular clan, the picture of the group marriage appeared entirely clear and simple: in each generation all the "brothers" of one clan participated in a group marriage with all the sisters of the same generation in the other clan. For this reason the wives of brothers called each other sisters, and the husbands of sisters called each other brothers, for both groups were such in reality.

/207 cont./

614 With the appearance of the institution of free marriage, 615 the clansmen-brothers may be married to women from dif-601 ferent clans, i.e., complete strangers to each other, and 178 nevertheless, by the old presumption, these women call each other sisters and become the group wives of their husbands-brothers. In exactly the same way, clanswomen-sisters may be married to men from different clans, and nevertheless these latter, although they are complete strangers to one another, will have group rights to their wives, and their offspring will call each other tuvn (German Geschwister /siblings/) and will not have the right to marry each other.

And, finally, we have seen that even "brothers-in-law" /zyat'ya/, i.e., persons of whom one is a member of a group marriage with the sister of another, may be married to sisters from a third clan. And in this case, although these persons have lost their rights of group marriage with /208/ respect to their sisters-wives, nevertheless all their children are considered tuvn and may not marry each other.

Furthermore, formerly, under the pure intraphratral marriage, the clan did not have the right to give women either to that clan from which it itself took women or to the clan from which this other clan took wives, i.e., to the clans of fathers-in-law of the first and second degrees of kinship. This, as we have seen, was an automatic consequence of the rule under which a clan was obligated to give women to one of the other three clans of the phratry, namely, to that clan into which was married the sister of the father of their ancestor, and accordingly the other two clans of fathers-in-law became eo ipso prohibited for women of the given clan. Now, when individual members of a clan may take wives even outside the clan of the mother, the designation of akhmalk of the first and second degree is extended to all the clans from which even one clansman has taken his wife. Thus there may be a situation in which, if five men from clan A marry freely with persons from five separate clans,

/235 cont./

X.

Features of the Classificatory System Among Other Peoples of Northeast Asia

174 601 As early as forty years ago L. Morgan in his Systems of Consanguinity and Affinity gave special attention to the question of the relationship between the Turanian and the Ganowanian kinship systems and after a long analysis, came to the definite conclusion that the relationship between these systems could occur only because of common blood, and that the present bearers of the Ganowanian system, i.e., the American peoples, brought it from their ancient homeland, from Asia. Morgan at that time was in a position to trace the Turanian system among the Dravidian peoples of India up to the southern boundaries of Central Asia. He was unable to get any information about the Mongol, the Tungus, or even the Turkic peoples. And it was all the more difficult for him to obtain any data about the peoples /236/ of the Amur region and the Pacific shore of northeast Asia. At the same time, it was the Amur River that he regarded as the point of departure for the crossing of the Turanian system from Asia to America, just as, with greater justification, he regarded the Columbia River as the point of departure for the spread of the Ganowanian system throughout the continent of North America. Whatever we may think of Morgan's hypothesis, from this point of view, his conviction that definite traces of the Turanian system should be discovered from the banks of the Amur throughout the northeast of Asia, including the Aleutian Islands, is now beginning to be justified, in some cases in the kinship systems and in others in survivals of cousin marriage. It is particularly strengthened by the system of kinship and marriage discovered by me among the Gilyak. Morgan's great hypothesis, which has such a direct bearing on the problem of the interaction of the peoples of Asia and America, deserves our making at least a brief survey of the marriage norms among these peoples.

Ainu AB6

G /236 cont./

*174 601 So, let us begin with the Amur peoples. In the Amur region we find two basic ethnic groups -- Paleo-Asiatics, and the Gilyak and the Tungus nationalities and in part the Ainu, joining them from the side of the Japanese archipelago.

We do not have to talk about the Gilyak -- they not only have the Turanian system in its most complete form, but in addition they have preserved the ideal form of the punalua family, the analysis of which has shown us that the Turanian system is the result of cousin marriage.

A 101 174 601 835 The Ainu tribe, to which, as the neighbors of the Gilyak, we shall devote a special chapter, is excluded from our survey as a tribe that is both racially and linguistically unique among the circle of peoples of northeast Asia. It is equally unique in its family structure. They have a classificatory system, but it differs in many essential respects from the Gilyak and the Tungus. Equally radically different from these latter are their marriage norms and their social organization. Among the Ainu, for instance, marriages are allowed both between the children of brothers and between the children of sisters, and in this respect they resemble more closely the northern Paleo-Asiatics -- the Yukagir and the Chukchee. The features of group marriage in the form of the mutual rights of brothers to each other's wives have been found by me at only a few points, and only the levirate fully coincides with the Gilyak-Tungus. The most important characteristic trait of the Ainu system, however, is the typically pronounced maternality and the absence of a clan structure -- a feature which also brings them closer to the northern Paleo-Asiatic group. In any case in /237/ view of the complete isolation of this tribe in all other respects from the group of nationalities in which we are interested, we note only their peculiarities, without engaging in any kind of comparison.

A [611] [614]

Go

Gi /237 cont./

114 835 I shall proceed to the Tungus nationalities who are p dominant on the Amur and spread out to the north up to t shores of the Bering Strait. The marriage norms of these nationalities have been studied by me principally among most isolated tribe, namely, among the northern Orochi, and I had an opportunity to compare and supplement this information with the data collected among other peoples the Amur region.

G Gi 601 835 171 433 In spite of the fact that in their original mode of life as nomadic hunters and reindeer-breeders these nationali differ considerably from the Gilyak, settled fishermen an dog-breeders, nevertheless we find a great deal essential similar in their classificatory system and norms of marria

G Gi 614 601 835 As among the Gilyak, the clan is based on paternity /paterniteta/. In each generation of a given clan, the men women are elder and younger brothers and sisters. The c dren of these classes are common sons and daughters and brothers and sisters to one another. The clansmen-"broth own and collateral, live in a group marriage with their wives, just as among the Gilyak of the eastern dialect, i the younger with the wives of the elder. Here, as among the Gilyak, they prefer to take wives from a single clan, from which one may conclude that again, as among the Gilyak, that marriage from a single clan was once obliga

Group marriage also exists with the wife's sisters who

Gi 601 835 married to members of another clan, but, by analogy wi the brothers' wives, among some tribes this marriage inclu only the younger sisters of the wife. In two respects grou

G [601] [835] marriage among the Tungus tribes is much broader than among the Gilyak. First of all, each man has a right no only to the wives of his elder brothers, but also to the wi of the younger brothers of his father, whom he therefore calls by the same class term as his elder brothers, namely

Gi [582] aki, a'ga. On the other hand, marriage to the daughters the younger sisters is allowed and thus that category of ni is drawn into the circle of the class of group wives. It is

/261 cont./

584 the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female.
585 It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered
[601] testimony of betrothal. From this moment on the children are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife moves to the house of her young husband, sleeps with him in the same bed, passes her childhood years with him, and upon attainment of sexual maturity begins marital life.

58 This haste to conclude a marriage between children is
182 explained by many reasons, but the basic reason amounts to a timely strengthening of the right to marriage. In a few years another such lawful claimant may be born or grow up, the son of another sister or female first cousin. Furthermore, in the course of time the economic situation of both sides may change. The father of the bride may become needy and be seduced by a bride price from the outside. There are cases, of course, where the cousins becoming betrothed are of different ages; the bridegroom, the son of the sister, may be a grown lad, while the daughter of the brother /262/ is just an infant, but the procedure is exactly the same. A Gilyak
585 of my acquaintance, Pletun, a lad of about 20, married in [582] this fashion his five-year-old cousin, the daughter of Iksus, took her into his house at once, commenced to sleep with her, and began actual cohabitation with her when she reported her first menstruation to him. But it also happens
[693] that a child-wife remains in the home of her parents and moves to her husband's house at the first appearance of menstruation, but no formalities are required for this move; the initial agreement is considered a public act, known to all. "All Sakhalin knows of this," a Gilyak of my acquaintance, who had betrothed his little daughter to the son of his sister,
585 said to me with great pathos. In such marriages not only is 583 bride price not due, but there is not even any question of it. There is merely an exchange of gifts, but even this is not at [178] all obligatory. Such is the simple arrangement in cases of [184] betrothal of the children of male and female first cousins,

/266 cont./

177 To a certain degree one may admit the influence on the 58 matrimonial psychology of the Gilyak from the Ainu, who, [173] judging from legends, were constantly infiltrating the mass of Gilyak settlements in the form of individual immigrants, and they exerted their influence on it in many respects, as we shall see particularly clearly in our examination of [171] religious institutions. But this influence in the sphere of [601] marriage was in general quite limited, for it is impossible to find a similarity between the two systems in their kinship terms or their norms of marriage.

/267/ XIV.

Forms of Concluding Marriage

582 We have already had occasion to introduce in another
538 place, as a clear illustration of the former obligation to marry women from the clan of the mother, from the an'g:ej the episode from the Gilyak poem, when the Gilyak, dying from a wound inflicted on him by a man who has the right to his daughter, summons his slayer and says to the people who a are present: "Although this man has slain me, give him my daughter; do not fail to carry out my wish for any reason." The epos just as clearly portrays for us the old forms of concluding marriage, corresponding completely to the norms of obligatory marriage.

58 Once a marriage is obligatory, there can be no question of complicated procedures in concluding the marriage, such as betrothal and negotiations concerning property obligations, and, of course, there can be no question of payment for the bride. There can be no question of religious rites connected with a move into an alien clan. The bride and the groom are of one common blood on the paternal and on the
[538] maternal side. Therefore, in all the works of the epos

[191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602] [603] [604] [605] [606] [607] [608] [609] [610] [611] [612] [613] [614]

When one observes the family among the Gilyak, one at first does not notice anything particular about it. As among many of our other natives, the Gilyak buys one or two concubines, slaves, who are all socially recognized wives, as are his children who were with him, are supported by him, and to whom his property passes after his death. The concubine's fidelity or a wife is guarded with an armed hand, as we shall see below. In a word, the form of marriage is, to all appearance, completely individual. Individual marriage is opposed to group marriage/. But on closer acquaintance with the inner life of Gilyak life /354/ one encounters a whole series of phenomena which are at variance with the form of marriage. First of all, it becomes apparent that Gilyak call the father of the father (ytk) not only his socially recognized (one) father, but also all the brothers of his father, not only one, but, in the first degree of kinship, but also of all the more distant degrees, also the wives of these brothers of his father is also mother (ymk), but not only mother. In the same way, a Gilyak calls all the sisters of his mother by the name of mother (ymk), and their husbands father (ytk). The children of brothers, as well as the children of sisters, of all degrees of kinship call one another "nvr" (= brother and sister). Hence the known word "Geschwister" = brothers and sisters). Thus, we see what seems to be a strange phenomenon, that a person may have a very considerable number of fathers and mothers, not to speak of brothers and sisters, and such fathers and mothers are often younger than their children. But, at the same time, a Gilyak does not call the sister of his father and the brothers of his mother "ymk" and "ymk," but "ykk" and "ykk."

Two other forms of kinship relations, the Gilyak have a whole series of names, which proves that it is not poverty of language. Such is the name of child, in, a strange kinship terminology. A similar terminology exists among Sioux Iroquois and other Indian tribes of North America, and also among certain tribes of India, but among them it has long since ceased to correspond to reality. Among the Gilyak, however, although the terminology does not fully correspond to reality, it does to all but fully. Even now, every Gilyak has marital rights (it is not considered a sin) to the wives of his brothers of all degrees of kinship and to all the sisters of his wife. Only the elder brother is deprived of this right with regard to the wives of his younger brothers. This limitation is of recent origin, and its very existence seems to emphasize the legality of the collective marital rights of the younger brothers to the wives of their elder brothers and to all the sisters of their wives. Even at the present time these rights are not always exercised by the Gilyak, and in many cases it is not without displeasure and even forcible protests that the interested parties look upon the realization of these rights, as we shall eventually see; but legally, so to speak, they exist, the realization of these rights is not considered adultery, is not punishable, and often is even carried on openly with the consent of the brothers and of the husbands of the wife's sisters. Thus, the contemporary individual form of marriage is a new phenomenon among the Gilyak, and the powerful remnants of the old /355/ order of clan marriage preserved up to the present time are similar to the famous so-called "punalua family," which still existed in the first half of our century on the Sandwich Islands (Hawaii) where, as among the Gilyak, such mutual rights to the wives of brothers and to the wife's sisters existed without limitations. And, what is still more remarkable, just as the husbands of sisters and the wives of brothers in the Punalua family called one another punalua (companion, one's half, comrade, Fotsch), -- the word which gave the name to the institution itself, so among the Gilyak these categories of people call one another "nevih" (the word signifying literally what punalua means among the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands). Such, down to the smallest detail, is the astounding similarity of primitive institutions of peoples living in different parts of the world and separated by oceans.

/353 cont./

This form of family-kin relationship serves as the basis for the social organization of the Gilyak and is the basis of their clan organization ("khal" = clan, also clansmen).

From what has been said of the primitive family of the Gilyak, it is obvious who constitutes the clan. All of the brothers (of all degrees of kinship) of the father of some Gilyak NN and their sisters (ytk), their fathers are his grandfathers (ate), their children are his brothers ("nvr"), their grandchildren are his children ("ola"), and mutually. In this huge family of grandfathers, fathers, children, brothers and sisters that constitutes the clan of the Gilyak. It is understandable that a clan so constituted may be compared of a great number of people. In one clan in northern Sakhalin, I counted 150 people, and this is only a branch of a clan which lives on the mainland.

But the clan of the Gilyak is organized on the male basis. Even though the children of a sister of NN's wife are his children (ola) and they are considered brothers of his own children, if these sisters of the wife are married to Gilyak of a different khal, then they, i.e., the children of these sisters, will be alien to the clan of NN. Similarly, only the sisters of clansmen and their unmarried daughters belong to the clan, and, consequently, a woman passes over to the clan of her husband, while the dissolution of the marriage brings her back into her father's clan. Here are the principles which regulate the life of a clan:

1. The clan has only four degrees of kinship: grandfather and grandmother (ate and ytk), father and mothers (ytk and ymk), brothers and sisters (nvrn), and children (ola). Clansmen call one another "khal" in contrast to aliens. To distinguish own brothers from own kinsmen of the first degree of kinship, the word khal is added, so that clan brothers are /354/ khal'-nvrn, clan fathers -- khal'-ytk, etc. The elder of the clan, whose role will be described below, is called "khal'-geymar," clansmen as thinking and acting social units bear the name of "khal'-nivukh."

/354 cont./

wife-abduction, it needs no further special refutation after what has been said above. But in view of everything that I heard from them about it, I must also deny that the Gilyak must always undertake the mock abduction of the bride or maiden in concluding a marriage, which can be regarded as a survival of a formerly obligatory wife-abduction among them. The abduction of a woman is never a /636/ trifling affair among them, but, as has been said, is damage to property, always a deadly serious business.

Let us now return to the regular conclusion of marriage among the Gilyak. Only to a very limited extent is blood relationship an obstacle to marriage, that is, brother and sister and the children of brothers are not permitted to marry each other. Even in the language they are not differentiated, in that "ykyn" and "amchek" mean older and younger brother as well as older and younger cousin on the father's side, and "ayak" means sister as well as female cousin on the father's side, and, accordingly, the brother and the sister of the father are designated with the same word as father and mother, namely, "ytyk" and "ymyk." But beyond that, the membership of both partners in the same patronal kin group, which, as we shall see later, is also taken into account in other communities by the Gilyak, constitutes no obstacle to marriage among them as it does among some Siberian peoples (1) and,

1. As, for instance, among the Ostyak, Samoyed, Lapps Tylor /Tylor/, Fotsch, Über die Urgesch. der Ehe, and die Entwick. der Civilis. /Researches into the Early History of Mankind and the Development of Civilization/, transl. from the English by H. Müller, p. 389).

on the other hand, among the Chinese (2) and through them, in

2. Du Halde, Descr. de l'Emp. de la Chine et de la Tart. Chinoise, Paris, 1735, Vol. III, p. 133. Fauthier,

/635 cont./

Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, as it does in Kamchatka, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one that exists between the Gilyak in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

The law of inheritance existing among them gives us further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but not even regarded as objects of the estate. The first and, if there are any, only heir of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (yhkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atachek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, because of her age, there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from the unmarried sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers dies and he was married and leaves a "and a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already

/652 cont./

Thus, an attitude toward the slaves similar to that among the Gilyak seems to exist among the Chukchee, as it does in Kamchatka, as in the motives for it, the more intense national consciousness and sense of freedom, there is a parallel between these two peoples similar to the one that exists between the Gilyak in their enterprising genius for trade and their extensive trade activity.

The law of inheritance existing among them gives us further insight into the family relations of the Gilyak. After what has been said above about marriage, it is almost self-evident that it is concerned solely with the male members of the family, while the female members are not only left empty-handed, but not even regarded as objects of the estate. The first and, if there are any, only heir of a Gilyak are his sons, and, to be sure, the property of the father is inherited by them in equal shares, regardless of the order of seniority -- a custom which is all the more remarkable since the Gilyak language has a special term (yhkyn) for the oldest brother in contrast to the younger one (atachek). The wife and the daughters, whether married or unmarried, have no share in the inheritance. The former, if, because of her age, there is no chance of her remarrying, is taken care of by her sons; the married daughters have entered other family circles, after they have increased their brother's inheritance by the bride price paid to their father for them, and the unmarried daughters become the property of their brothers and, if a suitor is found, must be purchased from them, and the bride price is shared equally among them. If one of the brothers dies unmarried, the other, surviving brothers inherit from him, again in equal shares. The same thing happens when from the unmarried sons of a Gilyak, who have become independent, one dies unmarried while his father is still alive; the latter receives nothing, because under no circumstances may a father inherit from his son.

The law of inheritance is different if one of several brothers dies and he was married and leaves a "and a wife or perhaps wife and child, especially minor daughters and sons. If only a widow survives, she, along with all that she and her husband had, goes to the next brother of her deceased husband, and, to be sure, as a wife, regardless of whether the latter is still unmarried or already pertire to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was fought between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the clan, represented by its representatives, gave spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

The Nivkh had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tungusic-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to groups of men, rather than different generations. As Shirokogorov showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. The Nivkhi existed until the end of the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were prohibited only for persons of same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

The term of kinship in the Nivkhi distinguished four age groups: 1) grandfathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (ymyk), husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the mother (ymyk); 3) brothers and sisters (nvrng); and 4) children (ola).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of hunting into economic activities directed by commercial and simulated the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred first among the Amur Nivkhi, who had early begun to trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to Sin-hsing, and followed furs and other goods, including luxuries for his, tobacco, tobacco and metal utensils. They also bartered with the Aina, the Japanese and with other neighbors of the Nivkhi. Merchants of the Tyilung clan, for instance, were for a long time the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Aina. Thus, long before the Russian colonization, the Nivkh began to be drawn into rich and poor. The rich could have several wives and 2-5 slaves. The rich man's brideprice always exceeded large quantities of imported valuables; but commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The means of the Nivkh continued in a subsistence economy.

Slaves had only housework. They could set up their own households and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. In the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 19th and the 19th centuries, the Manchus established among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalaba -- clan elders, and gyasiangar -- village elders.

After the middle of the 19th century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy accelerated more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russian state organization, a new form of exploitation appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the implements of production fell into the position of "half-shares." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used their own implements received two-thirds of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkh were officially considered Orthodox Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about Amur, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking always "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its pa'ga. The chief of these was Pal-yut'-ma, the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrandu, or Tol'ya'-ma, the "master" of

602 KIN RELATIONSHIPS—conception of kinship, cultural definition of kinship statuses, kinship symbolism and its extensions (e.g., to kings, to gods); kinship and other social relations, aspects of culture (e.g., sequential analysis of patterned kinship behavior; incidence and interpretations of stereotyped patterns (e.g., joking, respect, avoidance); categories of kin not classifiable elsewhere (e.g., patrikin and matrikin, general affinal relatives) and relationships among them; etc. Data on relationships between specific secondary and tertiary relatives will be found in separate categories. See also:
Age-grades 611 Political organization 1 1
Marriage . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Mortuary functions of kinsmen 1 1
Mutual aid . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Ceremonial exchanges 1 1
Naming and nicknames . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Feasts 1 1
Religious ceremonies . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Other ceremonies and rites 1 1
Clan . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Kinship 1 1
Clan exogamy . . . . . 1 . . . . . 1 Instruction of children in kinship behavior 1 1
Clan relationship versus conjugal families 1 1

/xxviii cont./

The question of cousin marriage is developed particularly assiduously in these works. In this respect, Shternberg enriched the history of marriage with valuable material, very thoroughly analyzed by him. When Shternberg tries to extract cousin marriage from group marriage, however, he contradicts /xxix/ himself and takes an anti-Morgan and at the same time anti-Engels position. To accept the proposition that cousin marriage preceded group marriage, logically leads to the conclusion that individual marriage preceded cousin marriage. The reasoning of Shternberg on the causes for the transition from marriage between sisters and brothers to cousin marriage is just as completely idealistic.

Shternberg revealed the clan character of the group marriage of the Gilyak with great thoroughness and, in addition, established the principles of the third- and fourth-clan phratry. Indisputably, the conclusions of Shternberg about the precedence of cross-cousin marriage to unilateral-cousin marriage are correct.

Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of the institution of izbeganiya (avoidance), according to which people not having mutual relatives rights must avoid mutual glances, conversation, and so forth, also has extremely great importance for confirming the existence of group marriage. He considers the survival of this institution among peoples who have already emerged from the stage of group marriage as extra proof of its previous existence.

Further, the works of Shternberg give a vivid picture of the clan way of life of the Gilyak and of the basic norms of their common law. By the way, in speaking of the clan, one must stress the correctness of Shternberg's criticism of Kunow, who, in spite of Engels, rejected the existence of a clan structure among the Australians.

Shternberg considers in some detail the khlai-ni-vuqhakh and quite correctly explains that they are recruited from the yxi (wealthy men), but we wait in vain for an answer from him on the question of the reasons for the degeneration of the clan and the appearance of the yxi. At the same time it must be said that the fact of the existence of the wealthy men among contemporary, so-called primitive peoples, and especially their social role, has been treated with silence in ethnographic literature, and Shternberg was one of the few non-Marxist ethnographers who paid attention to it.

/35 cont./

The views of the Gilyak in this regard are so strict that he transfers them into the animal world: dogs caught in an incestuous act are killed, being considered werewolves.

The Gilyak speak of the Russian women who sell themselves for money with the greatest contempt. This strict loyalty with regard to persons of prohibited categories created a system of prohibitions against conversation and joking with whole classes of people. It is even difficult for us Europeans to imagine that the Gilyak man or the Gilyak woman does not have the right, not only to joke, but even to talk with his own brothers and sisters, or with brothers and sisters of the most distant degrees of kinship, i.e., with the whole class of tuvn, because on the one hand, familiar relations may lead to sexual intercourse in forbidden degrees and, on the other hand, to light quarrels out of jealousy in cases of permitted intercourse. On the same grounds, among the Sakhalin Gilyak, one is allowed to talk to, but not to joke with, wives of the younger brothers, because sexual intercourse with them is forbidden, and, conversely, one can both talk to and joke with wives of elder brothers, and generally with the group of an'gej (wives).

Because of the prohibition against conversation with categories of close kinsmen among the Gilyak, the custom of saying hello and good-by upon arrival and departure is absent.

So far, I have cited only facts. But where did these strange facts come from? How can we explain these complicated and confusing norms of sexual cohabitation, and the no less strange kinship nomenclature? Even if we can to some extent explain the mutual rights of brothers to their wives, the right of a person to the married sisters of his own wife or the married sisters of the wives of his brothers is completely incomprehensible. Why is it that a woman calls not only her own sister, but also her husband's brothers' wives sister? Why does a man /36/ call the sister of his father-in-law his mother? Why, for instance, is it enough that a person from clan A, let us say, takes a wife from a completely alien clan for all the women of clan A to become forbidden to the representatives of the latter. The complex and confusing chain of these facts must doubtless be the result of the single, very simple basic fact of an original type of family and clan organization, a type which father-in-law signifies the common right of each generation of clansmen to the corresponding generation of women of the akhmak'k clan, while a common son-in-law = the obligation to give their women to the ymgi clan. Only the men are a constant element of the clan; the women are an element that either departs from the clan or comes in from outside. Hence the whole "physiological" construction of the clan -- exogamy, agnation, common rights and obligations regarding women, reciprocal conjugal rights of brothers, etc.

/36 cont./

Thus the Gilyak clan is a union of kinsmen in the male line, agnates, taking their wives from another certain clan, giving their women to a third, and bound among themselves by a whole series of mutual rights and obligations in the realm of sexual norms.

But this is only the formal framework of this kinship union; in the flesh and blood of all the consequences that flow from it, it is much deeper, more intimate, and firmer than appears at first glance. First of all, it must be kept in mind that, despite the principle of agnation, the clansmen are bound by kinship ties, not only through the father, but also through the mother. This follows directly from the very thesis of a common father-in-law. For once each /37/ generation of clansmen ("brothers") marries a corresponding generation of women ("sisters") of one akhmak'k clan, then the mothers of these clansmen, in turn, are sisters to one another. Further, the wives of the clansmen, despite the fact that they, according to the agnatic principle of the clan, are, as it were, a completely alien element, in reality stand in a close cognate relationship with their husbands; accordingly, husband and wife, as we know, are usually the children of a sister and brother -- own or of more distant degrees -- and, consequently, they are in any case cognate brothers and sisters. Thus, the male and female elements are not only not alien to each other, elements bound only by marriage, but on the contrary are intimately bound together, aside from marriage, by blood kinship. Moreover, by virtue of that same proposition concerning the unity of the "physical sex" all these women who are not the clan are agnate kinswomen to one another, either sisters or aunts and nieces, so that both elements -- male and female -- each separately and both together, are cemented together by the firm intimate bonds of kinship, which, of course, are profoundly reflected in all the social relations of the members of the clan among themselves.

/82 cont./

No influence has been exerted upon these relations by those circumstances that we mentioned, at the time, by the union of which it sometimes becomes necessary for individual members of the clan to take their wives outside the confines of one original akhmak'k clan; the general spirit and the general norms have remained the same.

But the cement which strengthens the union of kinsmen in the indestructible organization of the clan does not rest only on the formal consciousness of a common origin and kinship, and not only on the fact that the clansmen, for by themselves they are not so strong as to hold people from generation to generation in a closed hereditary union. The reasons go far deeper. First of all, there is the religious sanction, which plays such an important role in the eyes of primitive man, originally not the sanction of the clan union itself, but of those marriage norms which created the clan. The principle that each man must take wives from the clan of the mother, that the wife must be a blood relative of the husband, is a religious principle, intimately bound up with the cult of the ancestors, in particular with the cult of the mother. The seizure of a married woman is a religious offense against the clan of the abducted woman equal to the slaying of a clansman; the struggle for her return, or at least the demand for a ransom, is obligatory, as in matters of vengeance, to the third generation

/106 cont./

1. One sin. Although the norms and customs of religion and conduct are almost the same for the whole tribe, nevertheless each clan has its own complex of obligations and prohibitions, obligatory only for its own members. The first extensive category of prohibitions relates to sexual norms. For the members of each clan certain categories of women are prohibited for marriage and sexual relations, for example, all the women, without exception, born in the given clan. Further, the wives of one's younger brothers, all women who are called ymk and ran; all women who come from the clan of the "son-in-law"/ gvat'ya/, etc., /107/ so that to know what women are prohibited for one or another person is enough to infallibly saying to which clan he belongs. In this category the prohibitions of speech may also apply. For the members of each clan there are certain classes of persons with whom it is prohibited to speak: such classes are the tuvn (brothers and sisters of all degrees of kinship), the ashk (mother and aunts of the wife), and others. A third category of prohibitions deals with religious norms in the narrow sense. Each clan, as we have seen, has its own clan gods and sacrifices; its own sacred objects; its beliefs, and, consequently, its own ritual of the clan cult. common to all the clansmen but having no religious significance whatever for members of other clans. These numerous rites and objects of the cult constitute a fine greater respect. The whole clan, on whom is vested the wrath of the offended deities, answers and therefore each member of the clan is not only obliged himself to avoid infractions of his taboos, but to defend them against infractions by outsiders. For each such infraction it is necessary to exact tshusind. Hence the customary difficulties with members of other clans over an accidental defiling of the enclosure of the beach, over the taking of fire from the yurt, a bear bone dropped during the festival banquet, the infraction of the inviolability of all the appurtenances of the bear festival -- the posts to which the bears are tied, the poles with their heads, the storehouses for festival utensils and bear bones, etc.

/107 cont./

Finally, if one keeps in mind that the term "sin" embraces not only prohibitions in the formal sense, but also the obligation to carry out certain rites, that is, the "common sin" becomes a broad general sense, becomes the expression of the principle of unity of the circle of clan obligations in general. The significance of this principle is all the greater by virtue of the fact that in the eyes of the Gilyak obligations and prohibitions are by no means formal juridical norms, observed through fear of punishment, but religious imperatives, rigorously performed out of the feeling for self-preservation. For the Gilyak there is no difference between religious, ethical, and legal obligations; all are equally religious, and to satisfy the dictates of religion means to be concerned about the benevolence of the gods, about the elimination of the machinations of the enemies of life, etc., that is to say, to feel concern for one's self-preservation. Not to fulfill them, keeping in mind the whole clan background of the cult, means not only to destroy oneself, but the whole clan as still. Hence the great importance of the principle as a cementing agent of the clan union. Hence, on /108/ the other hand, it becomes comprehensible as to why norms frequently contradicting human nature, requiring immense self-control, are observed out, not through compulsion, but as the natural dictates of instinct. Consider, for example, with what strength the sexual norms act. In general, in matters of the sexual instinct the Gilyak, both men and women, have complete freedom; there is no chastity either before or after marriage. Their only concern is not to become victims of jealousy. There is no question of any feeling of self-restraint. Nevertheless, despite the complete sexual license from our point of view, the Gilyak observes complete chastity with respect to persons of the prohibited categories. A adultery is unknown to him; the adulterer is a monstrosity, an exception that is almost never encountered. The same is true of the prohibitions of speech. Brothers and sisters, left face to face, will go for whole days enduring the torments of silence, in the most urgent necessity exchanging rare businesslike phrases in important form, although by temperament these are far from taciturn people. Of course such self-control is the result of upbringing and training to a considerable degree, but it never would have reached such a high state of self-restraint if it were not for the general consciousness of the destructive effect of each individual infraction on the welfare of the whole clan.

/108 cont./

The religious sanction of prohibitions and obligations and the lively consciousness on the part of one and all that "sin is common" explain to us the most amazing phenomenon of the clan structure, the presence of the social organism and the almost complete absence of the element of compulsion, authority. But more about this later.

Such are the basic features of the clan. By them one can judge its all-embracing role in the life of the Gilyak. It enfolds a man from birth to death, giving life all its contents. It surrounds him with intimate bonds of kinship from both the side of the father and the side of the mother. It unites with a living bond the living generation with the departed ones. It guarantees to man an individual marriage and compels him to seek a wife outside of it, and after his death it provides for his widow and children. The clan defends his life and the inviolability of his family against encroachments by a member of another clan, ready as one man to rise to the defense of the sacred rights of a clansman and to answer for his guilt to a member of another clan. It feeds him when he is hungry, it pays the debts of the insolvent, it assists in the payment of the bride price and of blood money.

/109/ In the benevolence of the clan gods, in the clan sacrifices, man finds the higher protection and the strongest guarantee of his welfare. The clan is the school of moral training, the school of duty, of social co-operation and abnegation, and, finally, in the clan, man finds the highest pleasures and the most valuable consolation in the most bitter miseries of life - the noisy joys of festivals and preparations for felicity in the world beyond the grave.

/136 cont./

Forms of kinship. According to the basic structure of Gilyak society, relationship is determined by the clan organization of kinship. The Gilyak distinguish two main categories of kinship which may be called: agnate kinship and cognate kinship. The first embraces all persons bound together by a common origin from one forefather, that is, all individuals born or adopted into one or another clan. Upon marriage, women pass into the clan of their husbands. There are two kinds of cognate kinship: the first embraces that clan or those clans to which the women -- agnates of a given clan -- belong by birth; the second embraces the clan or clans from which a given clan or its separate members have drawn their wives.

The persons bound together in agnate kinship are united under the common name "khlai-ni-vuqhakh" or simply "khlai" the people of the clan, clansmen (from khlai -- clan, vuqhakh -- person). With respect to the first group of cognates, i.e., to the members of the clan or clans which take or have taken their wives from the khlai-vuqhakh, these latter and the whole clan are united under the common designation of akhmak'k (father-in-law) and, conversely, ymgi (son-in-law /gvat'ya/ "son-in-law" or "brothers-in-law" in Russian). On the other hand, in relation to the second group of cognates, i.e., those clan or those clans from which they themselves take women, they are ymgi (son-in-law) and, conversely, akhmak'k. Both cognate groups in relation to the first, and all three among themselves are /137/ the characteristic designation ymgi (from pandynd -- to be born), that is, consanguineous, bound by a common origin (1) through women. Thus, relationship

1. Schrenck (III, p. 23) quite erroneously asserts that kinsmen on the father's side, i.e., agnates, members of one and the same clan, call each other ngali, and that kinsmen on the mother's side call each other amal'. Inequality, both terms, on the contrary, designate exclusively relationship either through the mother or through the wife, but under no conditions on the father's side. Kinsmen through the father bear the name already mentioned by us: k:khal, k:khal-n'ig:yvyn.

/137 cont./

Thus, relationship by marriage and cognate relationship are completely identical concepts among the Gilyak. We shall see how this has come about upon examining the marriage norms. Now, let us proceed to an examination of each category of kinship separately.

Agnate kinship, kinship within the clan. Within the clan the Gilyak distinguish only three lines: 1) the ascending generation "the generation of my fathers"), without distinguishing between direct and collateral lines, since the brothers of the father are called by the same term as own fathers; they only distinguish the generations of the ascending line; 1st generation, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, etc.;

2) the descending generation ("the generation of my children"), in which by children is understood not only the descendants of the speaker and of the whole class of his own brothers and collateral brothers of all degrees, but all the subsequent descending generations of these persons;

3) within each generation the lines of collateral kinship, embracing the class of brothers and sisters (own and collateral), the so-called class "tuvn."

In addition, in each generation of clansmen the class of husbands and wives is distinguished.

The class of brothers and sisters ("tuvn"). For a better understanding of what is to follow we shall begin with that class called tuvn (2). The peculiarity of this term consists first of all in the fact that it embraces persons of both sexes alike; it equally signifies brother and sister. Another peculiarity -- still more important -- consists in the fact that under tuvn are understood not only own brothers and sisters, i.e., the children of one father, but also the children of all brothers of the father, own and collateral of all degrees of kinship, i.e., male and female first cousins, second cousins, etc. in the male line. Thus, within the clan, all the male and female agnates of the same generation are brothers and sisters; male and female cousins in the male line and likewise a married woman and the wives of the brothers /138/ of her husband are tuvn in relation to each other. But a man, as we shall see, can have tuvn outside his clan as well, namely, the children of those persons outside his clan whom he calls father and mother (see the class of fathers and mothers). Within this class there is one large and important subdivision that plays a leading role in both terminology and sexual norms, namely, the one for those persons who are older than the speaker or person referred to and persons younger than he, namely, "akand, aki" -- elder brother or sister (tuvn) and "as'khand, as'kh" -- younger brother or sister (tuvn). For the designation of the elder sister, in view of the peculiarity of her position in sexual rights, there is in addition the term "nanakhand, nanakh, nankh" -- identically used in reference to her by both men and women. Certain special terms for separate categories of this class, however, have been developed. Thus, there is a general term to designate the concept of "sister" in the class sense, namely, ranr: (same root as rankh -- sister). One meets (very rarely, however, and only in poetry) the term "kivung, kiun" -- brother (1). Descriptive forms are

2. A term borrowed from the eastern dialect; in the western dialect it is ruf.

/137 cont./

[538]

1. "Chikhys' kivung khendra" -- "I considered you a brother," says the heroine to her beloved in one song. "Kiun" could also be formed from the rare form akikhun.

/138 cont./

*601 likewise used to distinguish own from collateral tuvn, namely:
●602 "os'kyr: tuvn" -- own brother or sister, "tukor: tuvn" -- male cousin, female cousin in the male line. But all these designations do not constitute links in the general kinship terminology and the norms of sexual intercourse bound up with it. If you ask any two agnates of one generation, no matter how distantly related, how they address each other, you receive the answer: either simply tuvn, or aki (elder tuvn), or as'kh, depending on the person answering.

Concerning the question of seniority between collateral brothers, this is defined, not by seniority in the ascending line, but by the actual seniority of the cousins themselves, while in doubtful cases the question is decided by the old men.

*601 Ascending line. Within this line there are only two gradations for each sex: 1) fathers and grandfathers, 2) mothers and grandmothers.

Grandfathers and grandmothers. The term "atk," more rarely "app, appyk," designates all the males in the ascending line of the father, i.e., not only grandfathers, great-grandfathers, etc., but also their brothers, own and collateral i.e., their class of tuvn -- men. In precisely the same way the terms of the female category, achik, ytik, ychik, serve to designate the grandmothers, great-grandmothers, etc. and their sisters -- the wives of grandfathers and great-grandfathers and their "brothers" (tuvn). /139/ If a Gilyak in one instance or another has to designate a person of this category more precisely, he resorts, as we do, to a descriptive device; for instance, wishing to name the younger brother of his great-grandfather, he says: "n'i er: atk pilang" -- "the uncle (younger) of the grandfather of my father," etc., but such cases are rare, since such degrees of kinship play no role in marital questions.

The class of fathers and uncles in the father's line. It is necessary here to distinguish two forms, evidently reflecting two successive stages of marriage and sexual norms.

/141 cont./

*601 In addition to the stated normative cases, the term og:la is frequently applied outside of the rule as a term of endearment to other categories. Thus, a woman frequently applies this term to the son of the sister of her husband, while a man applies it to the son of the brother of his wife, although normally completely different designations are established for these persons.

We shall note two more special forms of designation in this class: one is a descriptive designation of a "kinsman" of the descending line -- os'kyr: og:la -- and one designates primogeniture, ykych, but neither of these terms play any role in either the general system of terminology or the sexual norms.

*601 Cognate kinship. Now we shall proceed to the kinship terms
●602 for persons outside the clan, to cognate kinship, which is the 614 key of this system. We have already said that in the Gilyak kinship system relationship by marriage and blood (cognate) - kinship are identical, that a special kinship through relationship by marriage is not known to the Gilyak classificatory system. For a better understanding of this strange fact, we begin our survey of kinship outside of the clan with kinship through the mother, that is, with kinship with members of the clan and the whole clan from which the mother of a person came.

First of all, it is noteworthy that all the sisters (tuvn) of my mother, not only own, but also of the class of "mothers," are the "wives" (an'g:ej) of my father and of his class of tuvn. Corresponding to this, all the "sisters" (tuvn) of my mother and of my class of "mothers" are also my "mothers" (ymk), while I and my "brothers and sisters" (tuvn) are their "children" (og:la). On the other hand, my relations to the brother of my mother and his tuvn are even more important. Just as my father calls all the "sisters" of my mother his "wives" (an'g:ej), so I (if "I am a man) from birth call all the daughters of the brother of my mother and their "sisters" (tuvn) -- an'g:ej -- my "wives," and, conversely, they call me their husband (pu); their children call me "father" (ytk), my official wife --

d) nanakhand, nankh (E.D.).
nynkh (W.D.)

II. Ymk, Rarely: oma (northern Sakhalin).

/148/
III. Ytk, yt.
Other forms: er:

1: Shternberg--221 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*601
602
184

/147 cont./

d) Elder sister; sister of the father; sister of the tuvn of the father; mother-in-law /husband's mother/; sister of the mother, if she is married to a non-clansman (in certain places, settlement of Viakhtu), in general in such cases she is ymk.

II. Own mother and stepmother; wives of all the tuvn of the father; the sisters of the wives of the brothers (tuvn) of the father; the sisters (tuvn) of the mother; the sisters (tuvn) of my father-in-law /wife's father/ and his tuvn.

III. Father; stepfather; the tuvn of the father (1); husband of the "sister" of the mother; the brother (tuvn) of the husband of the mother's sister; the husbands of the sisters (tuvn) of my father-in-law /wife's father/ and his tuvn; the brothers of the husbands of the sisters of the father-in-law.

1. Among the Gilyak of the continent and the northwestern shore of Sakhalin, especially

a) Ytk or pilang, pila mig:yvyn (more frequently the latter).

IV. Atk, app, appyk, apo, edr:, etk.

*601
.602
184

1: Shternberg--222 E-5 (1890-1897,1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/148 cont./

(footnote cont'd)
beginning with Tamlevo; to the south, only in the settlement of Yamy. Among the latter, pilang, n'vil-nivukh, corresponding to the Tungus a'ga, are also used for the younger tuvn of the father, in addition to the term ytk.

a) In all cases of III, when the reference is to the younger tuvn of the father (among the Gilyak with predominantly the eastern dialect.

IV. The elder tuvn of the father (among the Gilyak of the eastern dialect); grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. through the mother and the father; the tuvn of grandfathers, of great-grandfathers, etc. (from the maternal and paternal side); fathers, grandfathers, great-grandfathers, etc. of the husbands of the sister of the mother; fathers, grandfathers, and great-grandfathers (and their tuvn) of the

(cont'd)

V. Achik, acik, achk (E.D.); asi (Okhotsk shore);
ychik, ytik (W.D.).

VI. Og:lang, og:la, eg:lang, o:la.

1: Shternberg--223 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*601
602
184

/148 cont./

husbands of the sisters of the father-in-law /wife's father/; the elder brother of the husband (among the eastern Gilyak).

V. The wives of the brothers of the mother and their tuvn; the wives of fathers, grandfathers, etc. of the brother of the mother; the wives of the sons of the brothers of the mother; mother, grandmother, etc. of the wife; mother, grandmother, etc. of the sister of the wife and her tuvn in general; grandmother, great-grandmother (on the maternal and paternal side).

VI. Son or daughter -- children; the children of all the brothers -- tuvn (if "I" am a man); the children of the sisters (if "I" am a woman); the children of sisters (tuvn) of the wife; the children of the sisters of the wife of the brother; the children of daughters of the brothers of the mother and their tuvn.

/141 cont./

601 602 614 mother (ymk), while /142/ we call them our "children" (og:la). As for the remaining clansmen and kinsmen of the brother of my mother, the following terminology has been established. If "I" am a man, I and all my "brothers" -- tuvn and my descending line call the brother of my mother and all his male clansmen -- atk, akhmalk (uncle, father-in-law /wife's father/); the wife of the brother of my mother, her "sisters," and the wives of the tuvn of the brother of my mother, as well as the wives of the ascending line of the brother of my mother achk, ytik -- aunt, mother-in-law /wife's mother/, grandmother; the sons of the brother of my mother and his tuvn -- akhmalk, navkh; conversely, all these persons call me -- ymg:i (son-in-law /zyat'/) navkh; my wives, as well as the wives of my clansmen, these persons, according to generation, call either "sisters" (tuvn) or "daughters" (og:la), but our sisters and daughters -- by the one term "niece," n'ern, and, finally, all my clansmen call all the male clansmen of the brother of my mother akhmalk (father-in-law /wife's father/), and, conversely, -- ymg:i -- son-in law -- a survival from the time when there was exchange marriage. This last term is very characteristic; it is from the same root as umgu -- woman, oma -- mother, and testifies to the fact that the term son-in-law /zyat'/ is associated with the idea of cognate kinship, with kinship through the mother.

But especially noteworthy is the fact that the kinship terminology established between me and the generation of the brother of my mother is not limited to the individuals of our common generation, but is correspondingly repeated as well between the persons of all our ascending and descending lines, so that if I, a man, call the daughter of the brother of my mother my an'g:ej, so does my father in turn call his sister, i.e., the daughter of the father of my mother's brother, "wife" -- an'g:ej. In the same way, my son calls the daughter of the son of my mother's brother his "wife," etc., in a word, it is as though every wife of a clansman were actually the daughter of the sister of his father /sic./

/142 cont./

* 601 ● 602 614 Thus, kinship through the mother establishes, not partial kinship of the family of her husband with her own family, but an indivisible kinship between both clans, extending to each member of each of them. If my clan is A, and the clan of the brother of my mother is B, the latter, as a whole, will be called the akhmalk of A, while A, in its turn, is the ymg:i of B. And, what is especially noteworthy, this relationship remains permanently between both clans. Clan B can no longer under any circumstances be converted into the ymg:i of A. This is evident from the reciprocal terminology of the clans. The designation "akhmalk" of clan B originated, as we have seen, from the fact that members of clan A have whole classes of "wives" (an'g:ej) in this clan; conversely, among the women of clan A the males of clan B only have either sisters (tuvn), "daughters" (og:la), or /143/ "nieces" (n'ern), but not "wives" (an'g:ej), and for this reason, clan B cannot become A's akhmalk.

The terminology for kinship through the mother defines another form of cognate kinship -- kinship through the sister of the father. As long as she remains in my clan, I call her by the agnate term nankh (elder sister, aunt), and she calls me as'kh (younger brother), but upon marriage she and the clan of her husband stand in the same relation to me and my clan as I and my clan stand in relation to the clan of the brother of my mother, i.e., the husband of the sister of my father and his "brothers" (tuvn) call all the sisters of my father "wives" (an'g:ej), and, conversely, they are called "husbands" (pu); my daughters and those of my tuvn are the an'g:ej of the sons of the sister of my father and their tuvn and are the jokh (daughters-in-law) of all the ascending line of the husband of the sister of my father; the men of my clan, according to the class of the ascending line, are either the atk, akhmalk, or the akhmalk, navkh of the clansmen of the husband of my father's sister, while they are our ymg:i, navkh, and the women of that clan are either our agnates -- "aunts" (nankh), "sisters" (tuvn), "daughters" (og:la), or "nieces" (n'ern); in a word, my clan is the akhmalk clan, while the clan of the sister of my father is the ymg:i clan to us.

/143 cont./

* 601 ● 602 614 The terminology of this group is the central point of whole kinship terminology, for it is according to its patter i.e., the pattern of the kinship relations between a man a the brother of his mother, that the entire kinship nomencl of the marriage relationship in general is constructed. W ever the Gilyak marries, between him and his clan on the one hand, and his wife and her clan on the other, the kins terminology established is the same as if his wife were rea the daughter of the brother of his mother. Conversely, wh ever a Gilyak may give his sister to in marriage, the entir kinship terminology established between the clans is the sa as if the brother-in-law /zyat'/ were truly the son of the s of his father. This is why Gilyak terminology does not rec nize kinship through relationship by marriage, for the fath in-law /wife's father/ in any case is the same as the son o the brother of the grandmother, a man's brother-in-law /z is the son of the sister of his father, the father of the broth in-law /zyat'/ is the son of the sister of the grandfather, a so forth. And, consequently, all members of both clans a blood kinsmen.

Thus, keeping in mind the kinship nomenclature of th group of the brother of the mother and the sister of the fath we have a ready scheme for any marriage combination bet a husband and the clan of his wife, between a wife and the clan of her husband, between a man and the clan of his married sister, etc. According to this scheme, the relatio ship of a man toward the clan of his wife, whoever she ma de facto in origin, must, as a general rule, be the followin my father-in-law and /144/ his ascending line, as well as corresponding classes of their tuvn, are related to me as a and akhmalk, their wives -- achk, their descending line o male sex -- akhmalk and navkh; I am their ymg:i, navkh The sisters of my akhmalk'i are my mothers (ymk), their husbands -- my "fathers" (ytk), I am the son (og:la) of bot similarly the "sisters" (tuvn) of my wife are the "wives" (a of myself and my "brothers" (tuvn), their husbands are my "brothers" (tuvn). Their children call each of us "father"

/144 cont./

*601 and "mother" (ymk), and call each other "brothers" (tuvn).
● 602 On the other hand, my sisters and daughters are simply nieces
614 to the men of the clan of my father-in-law, and therefore no one from the clan of my father-in-law can become an ymg:i of my clan.

[178] At the present time in certain instances breaches have begun to appear in this well-shaped, though strange system of relationships between the son-in-law /zyat'/ and the clan of the father-in-law, specifically, when some clansman takes a wife who is not from the clan of his mother or is not even from the customary akhmalk clan; in the case of certain clans the terminology loses force in the third generation, but this is a deviation of the newest order.

*601 Now, before we finish with this system, we must underline 614 two more important peculiarities still further complicating this already complicated system. We have seen that the relationship between the akhmalk and ymg:i clans remains constant, so that the members of the first clan -- let us call it A (if A is the akhmalk of B, then B is the akhmalk of a third clan, C, and gives its daughters to the third clan) -- must, in turn, have their own akhmalk clan or even clans (let us call it C), while the second clan (let us call it B) must have its own ymg:i clan or even clans (D). Thus, the following kinship terminology is established between these four clans: Clan A gets new ymg:i clans (sons-in-law /zyat'ya/) in the person of the D clans, while clan B gets new akhmalk clans in the person of the C clans. These secondary clans, in distinction from the first, are called tujma (distant); for example, tujma akhmalk -- distant father-in-law, tujma ymg:i -- distant son-in-law /zyat'/.

Finally, in view of the fact that at the present time it is not prohibited for various persons of one clan to take wives from various clans, each such marriage establishes in relation to each new clan a whole complex fabric of akhmalk-ymg:i terminology, i.e., each clan as a whole can be the akhmalk and ymg:i of a whole series of clans.

/144 cont./

*601 In conclusion -- the most noteworthy peculiarity of cognate
● 602 kinship. In the akhmalk clans a man has not only cognates -- uncles, aunts, nieces, but also agnates, "sisters of fathers-in-law," whom /145/ he calls "mothers" (ymk), their children -- "brothers" (tuvn), the husbands of the sisters of his wives -- "brothers" (tuvn), their children -- og:la, while they call him ytk, and so forth.

Thus, by this terminology a man can have male and female agnates outside his own clan. We shall see during our examination of the sexual norms how this strange anomaly may arise.

Now let us look at several separate forms and peculiarities of the kinship terminology.

*601 The term pilang. In conversational speech, as well as in texts, 193 the adjective pilang is quite often used with this or that kinship term. Among other peoples, the addition of this adjective signifies a raising of the degree of kinship one step higher along the ascending line (for example, father and grandfather in English). Among the Gilyak, it evidently has only one meaning -- namely, to indicate the mature age of a given person. The fact is that in the Gilyak language, owing to the classificatory system, even such terms as father, mother, grandfather, and grandmother, which in our languages sufficiently define the age of the person in relation to the speaker, have no relation whatever to age: not only a "father" and "mother," but even a "grandfather" and "grandmother" may be younger than their "son" or "grandson," and a "son" may be older than his "father" or "grandfather." Therefore, when they wish to indicate that they are referring to adult members of one or another class, or to a person older in years than the speaker, they add the adjective big, adult: n'vilan n'atk; n'vila n'ymka; n'bila nanko; pila n'ig:yvyn, etc. -- my adult elder "grandfather," "uncle," "father-in-law"; my elder "mother"; my adult "elder sister" or aunt, sister of my father; elderly man.

601 602 /147/ The terms of kinship in a figurative sense. It is curious how the kinship terms are reflected in the terms used between persons who are not married to each other -- sweethearts. It seems that terms are often transferred into this area from the matrimonial terminology. Thus a woman calls her sweetheart [197] [184] o'kono (husband, in the western dialect), az'mych (man, husband, in the eastern dialect), ivn (groom), navkh (from the terminology of the group of father-in-law and son-in-law [837] /zyat'/). It is very interesting that the unrelated wives of "brothers," and, jokingly, men who have an extramarital relationship with the same women, sometimes call each other by this last term, as well as by the term akhmalk, while the terms navkh and akhmalk in practical life have taken on the meaning of "comrade" or "participant in a common affair." Thus, the term "navkh" by its meaning in these cases entirely corresponds with the famous Hawaiian term punalua in the family group which takes its name from this term.

601 As a result of our survey of the kinship termonology, we find among the Gilyak a typical classificatory system of kinship.

Summing up the terms for agnate and cognate kinship, we get the following scheme. (See following page.)

I. Tuvn = ruvn (E.D.). ruf (W.D.).
In poetry (rarely): kivung.

Separately:
a) akand, aki -- as'khand, as'kh (E.D.) (1).
ykind, yki -- as'kh (W.D.

1. In personal address these terms take the vocative form, for example: instead of akand -- aka; instead of as'kh -- as'kha.

b) nanakhand, nankh (E.D.).
nynkh (W.D.)

c) ranr: (W.D.)

*601
602

I. Brothers and sisters (Ger. Geschwister /siblings/): consanguineous and uterine children of own and collateral brothers of all degrees of kinship; the children of own and collateral sisters of all degrees of kinship.

a) Elder brother (tuvn), elder sister (tuvn); younger brother and younger sister (tuvn); wife of the younger tuvn (if "I" am a woman).

Seniority in the collateral lines is not determined by the seniority of the fathers, but by the age of the corresponding persons.

b) 1. Elder sister (tuvn).
2. Wife of the elder tuvn (if "I" am a woman).

c) Sister in general (own and collateral); tuvn of the female sex.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

XIII. N'em.

*601
602

/149 cont./

The term o'kon, standing completely isolated, is marked by the fact that it is from the same root as jokh -- daughter-in-law /nevestka/ (daughter-in-law, wife of the younger brother), i.e., a term of forbidden character. Concerning the term navkh, it must be said that it is used most frequently in reference to the husband of the sister and their children of the male sex.

XIII. If "I" am a man: daughter of the sister (tuvn); the sister of the husband of the daughter and her daughters, and in general of all the women born in the clan whose members ever took wives from the clan of the speaker.

VII. An'g:ej, an'kh (to the north of the Amur), an'kh n'um-gu (Amur).
Other designations: shank, shankh, ran'kh.

VIII. Jokh, jokho.

IX. Pu, ivn (E.D.).
Pu, if, o'kono (W.D.).
Other designations:
ychikh, a'zmych, utgu.

1: Shternberg--224 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*601
602
184

/148 cont./

VII. Wife; sister of the wife; wife of the elder tuvn; wife of the son of the sister (tuvn) of the mother; daughter of the brother of the mother and all her tuvn; in certain places on the Amur they also call the wife of the elder tuvn, ivy.

VIII. Daughter-in-law /nevestka/; wife of the younger brother (tuvn).

IX. If "I" am a woman: husband; son of the sister of the father; tuvn of the son of the sister of the father; husband of the sister; elder tuvn of the husband.

Deviations: 1. On the continent to the north of the Amur, they call all the tuvn of the husband alike, pu, ivn.

2. Likewise on the western shore of Sakhalin in the settlement of Tamlevo and farther north, all tuvn of the husband -- o'kono, also jori; on the Amur -- o'kono, n'orej. Conversely, among the eastern Gilyak they always call the younger brother of the husband, as distinct from the elder, atk, edr:, even er: (see group IV).

X. Atk, atyk, akhmalk.
Synonyms: app, appyk, aryr, arir:, ychkh, arychkh, edr:, eryr: (E.D.).
Appak, appyk, app, appo, amal (W.D.).

/149/
XI. navkh, akhmalk (more frequently navkh).

XII. Ymg:i, emg:i, navkh (E.D.).
Synonyms (rare): ashkh, poshkhr: (W.D.).
Rak n'ivukh, rag-n'ivuk, ora (the last on the Amur in the neighborhood of the Olcha). As an exception -- o'kon.

*601
●602

/148 cont./

X. Brother of the mother; tuvn of the brother of the mother; father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. of the brother of the mother and their tuvn; father of the wife, father of the sister (tuvn) of the wife; tuvn of the father of the wife; father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. of the father of the wife and their tuvn; father, grandfather, great-grandfather, etc. of the sister (tuvn) of the wife.

XI. Brother of the wife and his tuvn; the children of the brother of the wife and their tuvn.

XII. If "I" am a man and my wives: -- the son of my sister and of all my female tuvn; son of the sisters of my father and of his tuvn; son of the sisters of grandfathers, etc. and of their tuvn; son-in-law -- husband of my daughter and of her tuvn; the husband of any woman of my clan, of any female agnate; any man of that clan whose members (even if only one) took wives from the clan of the speaker.

/178 cont./

835 The right to sexual intercourse with the wives of brothers
828 has grown to be such an ordinary idea among the Gilyak that 829 they are not able to imagine an order of things whereby a woman could be the private property of one man. The Gilyak youths were extremely perplexed by my asking them so often and so persistently about these relations; they considered them so commonplace that they should not, according to their way of thinking, have caused any doubts at all, and they asked me in surprise: "Is it possible that it is different among you? Is it bad for you to sleep with your brother's wife?" i.e., not permitted, finding that their law is better than ours. It goes 152 without saying that human nature remains true to itself. The
* 835 Gilyak, too, is jealous, and in other cases where the matter
598 does not concern his tuvn he can react with the unbridled passion
684 of primitive man. It means nothing to a Gilyak to kill a rival or have a bloody duel with him. But when the affair concerns /179/ his brothers, then, thanks to the notions that have been a part of him since childhood and to a whole set of prohibitions that we shall discuss below, the brutal instinct loses its power over the Gilyak; he either does not react at all to the flirta-[182] tions of his wife, or quite weakly. To avoid friction between brothers, however, some preventive measures are practical.
[602] Thus, for example, custom dictates that the older brothers [584] not only yield primogeniture in marriage to the younger brothers, but even that they help them with "valuables" for the purchase of wives.

835 At first glance such a custom seems all the more strange 182 in that the older persons often do not have sexual rights to the 578 wives of the younger. But, on the other hand, another advantage is gained: having married off their younger brothers, the older brothers are freed in the future to a certain extent from the encroachment of the younger brothers on their own wives. Though such a preventive gives security, albeit weak, with regard to own brothers, the younger class-brothers are too numerous to be all married off in turn and secured 000 against. By way of an exception, I observed several cases

G /186 cont./
• 602 Psychic prohibitions. But side by side with training and, I 688 would say, the hypnotic influence of the kinship terminology, a still mightier force acts on the development of the above-mentioned instincts -- prohibitions of a special kind, prohibitions on psychic intercourse: prohibitions on speech, glances, and familiar address (joking). Corresponding to the two different instincts necessary for the realization of the sexual norms, these prohibitions are of a dual character. Some are created for persons between whom it is necessary to weaken the instinct of jealousy to the last degree, others -- for those who must avoid having sexual relations with each other. Both factors, both the prohibitions of sexual intercourse and the prohibitions of psychic intercourse, act not only as factors of hypnosis and habit, but also as very strict taboos of religion. To violate one or another of these norms, in the eyes of primitive man, G 602 s as dangerous as the most dangerous blasphemy. The strength 171 of the taboo on psychic intercourse in particular and what 688 instincts they can develop in the soul of primitive man can be seen even from Iokhel'son's /Jochelson/ tale about a Yukagir Y 602 who by mistake allowed himself familiarities with respect to 171 his own brother, but when he realized his error, he passed 688 away on the spot out of horror.
538

This is the way Iokhel'son tells this amazing story, entirely in keeping with Gilyak psychics.

"There were two brothers. With them lived the husband of an older sister, with whom it is permitted to talk. Therefore, both brothers frequently joked with him and played pranks... The brothers, as usual, had a non-speaking relationship. One time the older brother, upon returning from hunting, found the young people in the settlement playing games and dancing. His younger brother, who happened to be dressed in the fur clothing of his brother-in-law /zyat'/, was in the chain of dancers with his back to the new arrival. The latter took his younger brother to be his brother-in-law, and, wishing to scare him as a joke, he ran up behind him, put his hand between his legs, and touched his sexual organs.

G /186 cont./
• 602 The younger brother quickly turned around. The older brother 171 realized his error and fell dead then and there "from shame."
688 As usual, they performed an autopsy to /187/ learn the cause
Y 602 of his death, and his heart, according to the legend, was 538 found to be broken in two" (1).
171
688
961

1. Iokhel'son, Materialy /Materials/, XIII.

G 602 Let us proceed now to the prohibitions themselves. The prohibitions of the first kind, i.e., prohibitions established between individuals of the same sex in order to weaken the instinct of jealousy, naturally cover persons who are joined in one class by group marriage: among the men, the pu classes, i.e., the classes of persons who have the right to sexual relations with a certain class of women; and, among women, the an'g:ej classes, i.e., women having common husbands. All these individuals, all these group husbands or group wives, among whom outbursts of jealousy might so easily flare up every day and every hour, are fenced off from one another by the impassable wall of the strictest prohibition on psychic intercourse, a prohibition beginning at the threshold of life and ending only with the grave, and creating an instinct of restraint which does not yield first place to the strongest instincts of nature.

The prohibitions of the second category, as we have said, have as their aim the hindrance of sexual relations between persons of different sexes of the forbidden categories. For this reason prohibitions between persons who are mutually in the classes of "husbands" and "wives" (pu and an'g:ej), even if not in a state of individual marriage, are superfluous; any man freely converses not only with his individual wives, but with his group wives, for example, with the wives of his brothers without distinction (in some clans) or only with the wives of his older "brothers" (in others), in a word, with those women whom he calls an'g:ej and with whom he has the right

/187 cont./
• 602 of sexual intercourse. This is not the case with the individuals of the forbidden categories. But even in this category there are groups who, in the view of the Gilyak, do not require prohibitory protection; these are, first of all, the mother and, in part, the father. Sons, not to speak of daughters, may both speak and joke with the mother without any restrictions. The same applies to the whole class of "mothers" and "sons," whose designation alone, assimilated from childhood, is a sufficient guarantee of sexual indifference between its members. The situation with regard to "fathers" is somewhat stricter. The father may carry on "business" conversations with his daughter, may revile her, but he may not joke with or caress (be familiar with) his daughters. The same is true of the whole class of "fathers" and "daughters" (uncles and nieces). There are absolutely no prohibitions with regard to grandfathers, great-grandfathers, grandmothers and great-grandmothers. But this is not the case with other persons of the forbidden categories. Particular strictness marks /188/ the prohibitions between the men and women of the same clan. Men not only do not converse or dare to joke with the class of "sisters," with the "sisters" of the fathers, whom they call nanakh (elder sister), but even "to glance with the eye" at them is strictly forbidden. This prohibition applies also beyond the confines of a given clan if -- as we shall see later -- these persons reciprocally regard each other as tuvn, for example, the children of sisters who married persons from different clans. In addition, since -- as we know from the kinship terminology -- for every woman her "brother" is the potential father of her daughter-in-law /nevestka/, while, on the other hand, for every man each "sister" is the potential mother of his "son-in-law" /zyat'/, it follows that the woman is forbidden to converse and so on with the father of her daughter-in-law (actual or potential) and with his class, while a man is forbidden to converse with the mother of his son-in-law (in those clans in which the elder brothers do not have sexual rights to the wives of younger brothers). Furthermore, prohibitions of the second category are in effect (in the majority of clans), between men and the wives of their younger tuvn, on one hand,

/188 cont./

602 and between the women and the elder tuvn of their husbands on the other. As is well known from the kinship terminology, [601] the individuals of these groups call each other by the prohibitory terms jokh and atk. These last terms are likewise used by daughters-in-law and mothers-in-law to designate each other. 602 184 Between them, as between the individuals of the prohibited categories, once again psychic intercourse is not permitted, although not with uniform strictness everywhere. Among some, for example, among the Gilyak of the estuary of the Amur, neither conversation nor jokes are allowed. In other places business relations are allowed, but jokes and conversation are forbidden. The prohibition of psychic intercourse does not exist between sons-in-law and mothers-in-law.

602 Now how the prohibitions are realized in life remains to be explained. The Gilyak themselves classify the psychic [192] forms of intercourse between prohibited categories with the terms: indynd (to look, khernd (to converse, to talk), lerund (to joke, play, play pranks), and vakrund (to quarrel, dispute, revile). But not all of these four forms are applied equally between all the categories. Thus, we have seen that the father is forbidden only lerund (jokes, playing pranks) with his daughter, but he is permitted to converse with her and all the more to revile her. The prohibitions on "looking in the face" -- indynd -- on the contrary, are in effect only between "brothers and sisters"; lerund applies with equal rigor between all categories. There remains the prohibition khernd. This term embraces two concepts: conversation and discussion, and business relations. The first are absolutely forbidden: /189/ one can get along without conversations, and besides conversations may lead further. It is another matter with business conversations; sometimes it is absolutely impossible to get along without them. Thus, for example, the elder brother frequently takes the place of the father in relation to the younger brothers, and it is impossible to avoid having dealings with him; therefore in extreme cases the younger brothers may address the elder brother. Brief direct

/189 cont./

602 speech, in the form of orders, business advice, and so forth, is always permitted between brothers, between daughter-in-law and the father and mother of her husband, even between a man and the wife of his younger brother, with the use of the vocative case. But ordinarily they seek to avoid direct address. If there is a person of a permitted category at hand, they transmit their wish to this person, addressing their message in such a manner that it is audible to the prohibited individual, 602 who, in turn, answers in the same manner. If not, the ad- 195 dress is in the third person or in the impersonal form. For 193 example: "the daughter-in-law, the brother, etc., could do such a thing," instead of "daughter-in-law, do it!" Or, "thanks to my brother," instead of "thank you, brother" etc. Owing to this custom of getting around the prohibition on speech by the use of the third person, the Gilyak have formed the custom of frequently using the third person in general instead of the second, especially in reference to strangers, out of fear, apparently, that they may turn out to be persons of prohibited categories. Again and again, upon the entrance of an unknown Gilyak, one hears the phrase: "Where has the Gilyak come from?" (instead of "where have you come from?"). Perhaps there is concealed in this custom, brought about by the prohibition on conversation and not peculiar to the Gilyak alone, the reason for the origin of these strange forms of the third person in place of the second that we find in Italian, 602 Polish, Tatar, and other languages. Finally, the plural num- 193 ber, which is commonly used in addressing old people and [576] honored persons or strangers, is most frequently used in ad- [554] dressing persons of forbidden categories. Thus, for example, in addressing the wife of an elder brother they commonly use the singular, chi, while in addressing the wives of the younger brothers, on the other hand, they use the plural, chin.

/189 cont./

G 602 576 171 The prohibitions on speech have had another curious result. The Gilyak have no salutation for greeting or saying farewell. It may seem strange that the Gilyak, returning to his home after a long absence or leaving his family for the long months of hunting and of danger, utters no salutation. Yet the Gilyak are very ceremonious and /190/ always greet and escort their departing guests with solemn forms of address and expressions of good wishes. The neighbors of the Gilyak, the Olcha and Goldi, as well as the Ainu, have salutations for meeting and parting. Their absence among the Gilyak arises precisely from the fact that in the home and settlement of every Gilyak there is a mass of persons with whom speech is a sin, and therefore the customary greetings could easily lead to frequent involuntary violations of the psychic taboos. Prohibitions on conversation, as is well-known, are practiced among many peoples. We shall recall, for the sake of an example, one of the American peoples, the Arapaho, among whom conversations between brothers are forbidden. The prohibitions among the Yukagir are of special interest to us. Of the prohibitions which they have in common with the Gilyak, we find among the Yukagir prohibitions between "brothers" and "sisters," between the husband's father and mother and their daughter-in-law, between older brothers and the wives of younger brothers; and, as among the Gilyak, in cases of necessity, they address each other either in the third person, or in the impersonal form, or in the plural (1).

1. Iokhel'son, Materialy /Materials/, 240.

G 602 191 B 602 582 194 835 The Buryat present examples of an interesting analogy with the Gilyak prohibitions. Among them at the present time marriage is exclusively individual, and "brothers" have no sexual rights whatever to each other's wives. Nevertheless, prohibitions with regard to the so-called khadym clearly reveal an earlier stage of group marriage. As a result of this

G 602 /190 cont./ As a result of th
191 institution, the prohibitions between a woman and the ol
B brothers of her husband are very strict, and, on the other 602 hand, with respect to the younger brothers of her husband prohibitions are absent. The content of the prohibition (f the man to sit on the bed of his khadym, to see her naked 835 is evidence that this prohibition had the exclusive aim of venting sexual intercourse.

V.

The Genesis of the Gilyak Marriage Norms and the Kinship Terminology

G We have examined the norms of sexual intercourse a *194 have seen that they completely correspond to the kinship 60 terminology. Now it is necessary for us to proceed to a co sideration of how this complicated system of kinship and m riage was formed, what sort of psychic substratum gave ri the system. Obviously, such a complicated system could arise artificially. It must have developed, without a dou out of one simple principle, a clear /191/ categorical im perative for the primitive man, out of which there must h grown, as from a seed, that complicated organism of Gily institutions which has been examined by us in such great d tail. Along with the genesis of this system, however, it i necessary for us to explain also the long evolution of this system, without an understanding of which a whole series peculiarities of the kinship nomenclature will seem completely inexplicable and, as it were, out of keeping with general system.

/161 cont./

581 587 121 intercourse; he must support her and her children, who usually are also considered the children of all the members of the group.

835 Now the Gilyak marriage classes "pu" and "an'g:ej" become understandable to us, and we shall proceed to a detailed examination of them.

The classes "pu" and "ang:ej." We have already said that for the Gilyak, at least at the present time, it is not prohibited either by religion or by the opinion of society to have sexual relations with or to marry any woman of his own tribe or a neighboring one, except for those women who are bound to him by one or another prohibitive term of kinship. But in relation to such alien women he has no rights whatever; illicit sexual intercourse is accompanied by the risk of bloody reaction on the part of a certain group of males, and individual marriage is a simple civil agreement accompanied by strict conditions of payment for the bride. The Gilyak most naturally therefore seeks sexual intercourse or a legal wife among the women with whom he has the right to do so. These are, namely, those women whom by the kinship [601] nomenclature, either from birth on from another specifically defined moment, he calls an'g:ej (wife), and he calls all ● [602] their agnates akhmalk'i (fathers-in-law). We already know who these women are. They are, first of all: 1) the daughters of all the "brothers" of the mother; 2) all the "sisters" of the wife; 3) "sisters" of the wives of brothers; 4) "sisters" of the father-in-law of the son; 5) individual wives of all aki, i.e., of brothers who are older than the person speaking (among the majority of Gilyak); 6) individual wives of all "brothers" of the person speaking, without distinctions of age (in certain places).

[601] Each woman, in turn, as we know, gives the name of husband, in addition to her own official husband, to: 1) all the sons of the sisters of her father; 2) all the husbands of her "sisters" and the "brothers" of these husbands; 3) all the younger "brothers" of her husband (if she is married to one of them), and among some -- all the brothers of her husband.

/165 cont./

582 583 Concerning the primary obligation of marriages between pu and an'g:ej, supporting evidence is offered by another extremely important peculiarity of this form of marriage, namely, the fact that the bride price, i.e., the payment which is received by the father or the brother of the bride and which in the contemporary marriage plays an enormous role in the question of giving a woman in marriage, is here completely lacking or at least plays an insignificant /166/ role. In cases of marriages between cousins of the first degree, not only is a bride price not demanded, but it is even forbidden to mention it during the betrothal.

582 583 174 The absence of the bride price in marriages between pu and an'g:ej is clear evidence that the marriage between these categories was at one time an obligatory marriage, and in the case of obligatoriness it goes without saying that there can be no question of any financial obligations.

There is no doubt that the bride price was a later institu- [538] tion. In the traditional poems of the Gilyak, the so-called n'astund, in which the procedure of betrothal is so often described, there is never any mention of the bride price. On the contrary, the "fathers-in-law" usually fill the boat of the bride with all kinds of valuables.

583 174 Remembering what an enormous role the bride price plays in the economic life of the Gilyak, sometimes representing the only resource for giving the economy of a poor man a start, it must be realized that the neglect of the bride price in marriages of the above-mentioned category cannot be caused by reasons of a sentimental nature; the motives for such an attitude toward the bride price must be of a more compulsory character, that is, religious. We shall have to speak about the nature of these motives in more detail later on.

● 602 606 As an illustration, we merely point out the surprising relations that, thanks to this religious imperative of marriages between pu and an'g:ej, were characteristically established between persons of the class of "fathers-in-law" and their legal "sons-in-law" /zyat'ya/. These relations are surprising

/166 cont./

● 602 606 by their touching tenderness, their devotion and selflessness. Toward an ymg:i, though only potential, the "fathers-in-law" sometimes behave better than toward their own children. "One must feed a son-in-law," runs the religious formula of relations between "fathers-in-law" and "sons-in-law." In this dry formulation is hidden a rich content. Not only in times of poverty does a "son-in-law," sometimes with his huge family, move in to live with his father-in-law, getting a living from him without any payment for a period of months and even several years, but even in normal times the "son-in-law" (although such merely by designation) is the favorite guest in the house of his father-in-law.

[594] [224] [431] For months at a time the Gilyak youth loudly and happily pass their time in the settlements of their "fathers-in-law," finding in every yurt the most hearty welcome and the greatest delicacies; and when the hunting begins, the "son-in-law" is invariably a participant in the undertakings of his "father-in-law," and when he returns to his own home, he carries with him, in addition to /167/ the usual gifts, also his share of the [796] catch. At solemn moments of life, for example, at the bear festival, the "sons-in-law" are in the foreground among those who have been invited, and it is to them that the honor of [72] killing the bear is presented. In an arduous moment in wartime, the "fathers-in-law" and the "sons-in-law" are obliged to come to each other's aid in case of necessity.

In order to evaluate fully the religious background of these peculiar relations between "fathers-in-law" and "sons-in-law," it is necessary to keep in mind the wide meaning that the Gilyak, with a purely primitive passion for the broadening of their original taboos, have given to the term "father-in-law."

602 614 606 From the kinship terminology we know that the clan of the "fathers-in-law" is considered to be not only that clan from which a man's kinsmen usually take wives, but also all the other clans from which even one kinsman has chanced to take his wife. Thus, each man can have several clans

606 /167 cont./ Thus, each man can have several clans
602 of "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these clans, ac-614 cording to generations, are considered an'g:ej -- his wives and [601] the wives of his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, and so it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how this complicated system developed.

For the present, we think, quite enough has been said to see that in the sphere of individual marriage the appellations pu and an'g:ej have played and still play an enormous role, symbolizing in themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage -- one of the many benefits which the clan structure gives to each of its participants.

584 Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of 162 this institution of the right to marriage at the present time.
595 For the contemporary Gilyak, marriage is one of the most difficult matters of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in real life "finding a wife" is a business of unusual difficulty. First of all, there is the extreme shortage of women. Among the Gilyak, according to calculations made on the basis of the censuses that I took, for every 1,000 males there are 785 females; on the isolated shores of the Sea of Okhotsk, it is 694 females, while in Siberia, for every 1,000 males there are 900 females. It is necessary to add that a significant percentage of the Gilyak, namely, the wealthiest individuals, keep from two to four wives. For example, according to my census on the western shore of Sakhalin to the north of the settlement of Arkyvo, for every nine monogamous men there was one polygamous man, with the total ratio of men to women being 1000:694. There is one old bachelor for every 11 married men, and one polygamist for every 19 married men. It is not difficult to imagine how limited the choice of women was, /168/ and it was already limited by a whole set [583] of prohibitions. With such a limited choice and with such a considerable preponderance of men over women, the bride price, the payment for women (in valuables or long-term ooo service), naturally reaches an unusually great amount. Under

/172 cont./
*835 sweetheart, and, thanks to this polyandrous practice, they 836 hardly ever run the risk of pregnancy. As to what proportions these polyandrous habits of intercourse among maidens reach, it will be sufficient to offer an example intimately known to me. The wife of my friend Pigunayka from the settlement of Arkyvo, a likable woman and a splendid housekeeper and mother of children, before her marriage had in her home village alone 14 sweethearts at one time, who called each other, and she likewise called them, navkh, akhmalk -- comrade, fellow participator (it is curious that navkh literally means the very same thing as punalua in Morgan's well-known punalua family). Furthermore, Pigunayka's wife's sexual intercourse with her sweethearts quite often took place at one time. Her "husbands" told me quite good-naturedly how all 15 of them used to get together in a little clearing not far from the settlement, and one after the other they would exercise their rights. The most curious thing of all is that in this merry band was Pigunayka himself, who is now the happy husband of the 602 heroine. Under such circumstances, it is natural that the Gilyak
*835 youth in many respects feels much more at home and at ease
836 among his maiden an'g:ej than he does among his married an'g:ej, access to whom is surrounded with great difficulties in view of the preferential rights to them of their individual husbands. And, naturally, he is attracted thither most of all. But he does not find these maidens in his own clan, even among the most distant of his tuvn. With them he not only does not have a right to have sexual intercourse, but he does not even dare to converse with them. In his own clan he has only the married women for sexual intercourse. In fact, maiden an'g:ej very rarely live in the same settlement as their pu.
[614] The daughters of his mother's brother, the sisters of his brothers' wives, the daughters of his akhmalk, in other words, the clan of his "fathers-in-law" -- there is where all his sympathies 602 draw the Gilyak youth. In the yurts of his akhmalk'i nothing is hidden to him; here he is met with open arms, for, as we

/172 cont./
602 know, an ymg:i is the closest person to an akhmalk and to his wife. An ymg:i is a preferred hunting companion summer and winter. He is the dearest guest; they serve the most delicate dishes to him. He makes them still happier for a special reason. With their clansmen-brothers the akhmalk'i /173/ and their sons can neither converse nor joke, but the ymg:i is a legitimate interlocutor, with whom they may make merry to their hearts' content. And in such surroundings there [836] are dozens of maidens -- his an'g:ej, with whom he may openly converse, joke, and, when the opportunity presents itself, have sexual intercourse.

*835 Now we shall turn to the relations of the pu with their 602 married an'g:ej.

[184] From the kinship terminology we know that a man's married an'g:ej include, first of all, the individual wives of his "brothers" (tuvn), which, among the Gilyak speaking the western dialect, refers to all tuvn, while among the Gilyak speaking the eastern dialect -- only to the elder; further -- all the married "sisters" of his own wife; finally, the married sisters of the wives of his tuvn -- a huge category, including many dozens of persons distributed throughout the *835 territory of Gilyak settlement. Concerning the last two groups -- the wife's sisters and the sisters of the brothers' wives -- one must make the following reservation: usually, in agreement with the general norms of Gilyak marriage, the sisters marry persons of the class tuvn alone, so that with regard to the sisters of the wife and the sisters of the brothers' wives a general rule concerning the wives of "brothers" operates. But, due to deviations from the traditional norms, it may turn out that the sister of one's brother's wife or the sister of one's own wife is married to a completely alien man, or even to someone who is an accidental akhmalk (1).

[582]
[614]

1. An accidental akhmalk is what I call a man from a clan from which one of the kinsmen of the speaker has

CONTIN

FRO

PRECE

FICI

NUED

OM

DING

HE

/192 cont./

614 "sister," (for they are such in reality), their mothers-in-law -- 601 aunts on their fathers' side, and husbands call the sisters of 582 their fathers-in-law mothers. We shall not speak here of the
* 174 group character of these marriage unions and of the classes of "mothers," "fathers," "brothers," "fathers-in-law" /wives' fathers/ which arise from this, for we have already explained it in detail earlier.

Thus to the first principle -- the obligation of marriage with one's blood kinsmen -- is added another principle -- the wives of clansmen must of necessity be taken from one common clan, i.e., two clans are bound to each other by a mutual obligation: one must take wives from the other clan, and the latter /193/ must give its wives to the former. All men of the latter, according to generation, are considered from birth to be the husbands of the women of the corresponding generation of the other clan, and, as we have seen, these classes in actuality call each other pu and an'g:ej.

But from the kinship terminology we know that the reverse is not allowed, i.e., men of the second clan and women of the first are not joined in the class of husbands and wives. Thus, an exchange marriage between the two aforementioned clans is not allowed. All these principles which have been deduced by us above a priori from the kinship terminology completely correspond to contemporary reality. We have seen that even now there exists the right of marriage, that even now a marriage from the class akhmalk is alone considered "pure," that marriages of clansmen are usually made from one common clan and that exchange marriage between clans is not allowed. Now we can with confidence continue our analysis.

614 But what is this clan from which clansmen are obliged 601 to take wives? The answer to this is that detail of nomencla-602 ture whereby the mother of every man is the sister of his 582 wife's father; in other words, all wives of clansmen are
* 174 taken from that clan from which their ancestress came. The members of the clan are thus, both on the father's side and

/193 cont./

614 on the mother's side, of one common blood. For each individ-601 ual member of the clan, as we have seen above, this is expressed
● 602 in the fact that a person usually marries the daughters of his
582 mother's brother, in other words, the daughters of every man
* 174 belong to the sons of his sister. This principle also is the link from which not only the classificatory system of kinship, so complicated in appearance, but also group marriage and finally, the clan grew. We shall also examine this dynamic. We shall see below that this principle, still so common nowadays among many primitive peoples, the principle that the daughters of the brothers belong to the sons of their sisters, goes back to the most ancient stage of the maternal family, the one that immediately followed blood marriage, and served as the basic method of providing the group with wives. In order to satisfy this most vital need in the early stages of human society, every mother obtained for her sons the daughters of her brother, in other words, all the descendants of a sister obtained as wives all the descendants of her brother. Why such a principle arose, why they took as wives exclusively the daughters of the mother's brother, and not the children of the mother's sister or the daughters of the father's brother, we shall see below. Now let us look at the consequences
* 174 this principle had in its practical application.
582
591 /194/ 1) Once the daughters of the brother belonged from 581 birth to the sons of the sister, it was most natural that the future husbands should go at a very early age to the homes of their future wives /sic/. This arrangement is still to be seen among the Gilyak, as among many other primitive tribes. In "pure" marriages, i.e., between the children of brother and sister, from earliest childhood the future wife moves to the home of the husband and grows up with him. Termi-
[602] nology has perpetuated this arrangement in that even from birth children in certain classes stand in the reciprocal

58
* 174 /194 cont./
582 relationship of pu and an'g:ej toward each other (1).
591
● 602
[114]
[835]

1. This fact radically refutes the assertion of Westermarck, Crawley, and others that the prohibition of marriage between brothers and sisters arises from an instinctive sexual aversion created by living intimately together. Crawley cites in this respect the categorical assertion of Ellis (see "Exogamy and the Mating of Cousins," Anthropological Essays, Oxford, 1907, p. 52).

[113]

* 174 582
581

2) The above-mentioned principle created in the persons of the daughters of the brother a permanent pool of women for each man, but this measure was inadequate for the satisfaction of the objective for which it was created; corresponding norms of distribution were necessary in order to guarantee peace between the possessors of the group of women. It is first of all clear that the norms of distribution could not be exclusively individual or exclusively communal. Communal possession, as a general rule, would have evoked endless discord; a purely individual arrangement was not always possible because of the inevitable fortuitousness in the distribution of men and women, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms to be worked out, therefore, had to be of such a nature that they could give satisfaction in the face of any combination.

The individual mode of distribution, of course, would be the most satisfactory, but it requires an equal distribution of the sexes, which is not always possible, especially within the limited sphere of a few families. The norms of distribution under such conditions had to be a compromise between the communal and the individual mode, in order to satisfy any combination of the distribution of the sexes.

/198 cont./

614 home of the wife, all the women born into the clan remained
*174 together; their husbands, taken into the clan, were all of the same clan -- the male cousins of their wives, the sons of the sisters of their fathers. In the agnatic clan the imported
● 602 women were all kin to each other, either sisters or aunts and
614 nieces (and blood kinswomen -- female cousins of their
*174 husbands), the daughters of the brothers of their mothers. This common blood kinship of the representatives of both sexes of both the native and the imported elements of the clan is a still more important cement of the clan union, a religious cement binding together all the elements with the highest ties of the common cult of the ancestors. The 601 terminology has perpetuated this arrangement by the fact that
614 the wives in each generation call each other sister and their
*174 husbands' mothers -- aunts, and a man calls the daughter of his mother's brother wife, while a woman calls the son of her father's sister husband.

614 8. Since marriage is obligatory into the group of the 587 sisters of the father exclusively, once the daughters of a man
*174 belong from birth /199/ to the sons of his sister, and this rule, naturally, became a religious imperative, then under no circumstances can either the men or the women marry out-
[171] side of the indicated groups. Hence a twofold levirate, so often encountered, by the way, among the American Indians. If the individual husband of a woman should die, she cannot under any circumstances leave the group of her husband. Whether young or old, she passes to one of the class of "brothers" of her deceased husband. Conversely, if a man's wife dies, he cannot look for a wife anywhere except in the class of her sisters.

614 9. Under this arrangement, as long as it maintains its 583 complete purity, within the marriage groups there can be
*174 no question either of abductions or of bride price.

*614
615
● 602

/210 cont./

Schematic Table No. 1 of the Three-clan Cognate Phratry.

Clan A (Andrey)	Clan V (Vasiliy)	Clan S (Stepan)
Ancestors: Andrey, Vera. Andrey -- brother of Anna, who is married into clan S. Vera -- sister of Vasiliy from clan V.	Ancestors: Vasiliy, Sof'ya. Vasiliy -- brother of Vera, who is married into clan A. Sof'ya -- sister of Stepan from clan S.	Ancestors: Stepan, Anna. Stepan -- brother of Sof'ya, who is married into clan V. Anna -- sister of Andrey from clan A.
Their children: 1) The sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Vasiliy of clan V. 2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Anna of clan S.	Their children: 1) The sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Stepan from clan S. 2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Vera from clan A.	Their children: 1) The sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Andrey from clan A. 2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Sof'ya from clan V.

Table No. 2 (cont.)

2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Anna in clan S.	2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Vera in clan A.	2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Mariya in clan D.

1: Shternberg--312 E-5 (1860-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*614
615 /211cont./
602

2) Daughters
marry the sons
of the sisters
of their father,
of Sof'ya
in clan V.

Schematic Table No.

Clan A (Andrey)	Clan V (Vasiliy)
Ancestors:	Ancestors:
Andrey, Vera. Andrey -- brother of Anna, who is married into clan S. Vera -- sister of Vasiliy from clan V.	Vasiliy, Sof'ya. Vasiliy -- brother of Vera, who is married into clan A. Sof'ya -- sister of Dem'yan from clan D.
Their children:	Their children:
1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Vasiliy from clan V.	1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Dem'yan from clan D.

Clan S (Stepan)	Clan D (Dem'yan)
Ancestors:	Ancestors:
Stepan, Anna. Stepan -- brother of Mariya, who is married into clan D. Anna -- sister of Andrey from clan A.	Dem'yan, Mariya. Dem'yan -- brother of Sof'ya, who is married into clan V. Mariya -- sister of Stepan from clan S.
Their children:	Their children:
1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Andrey, from clan A.	1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Stepan from clan S.

(Cont.)

/211 cont./

1: Shternberg--311 E-5 (1890-1927, 1929) 1929 Gilak 225

/213 cont./

614 615 602 my mother, while my mother-in-law is the sister of my father and a cousin of the first degree of my mother; that is to say, husband and wife are kin on both their fathers' and their mothers' sides. On the side of their fathers, on the one hand, and on the side of their mothers, on the other, they are alike cousins of the second degree; on the side of the father of the wife and of the mother of the husband, they are cousins of the first degree, while on the side of the father of the husband and of the mother of the wife, they are cousins of the third degree.

4) The kinship relations between the clans work out in the following way: a) clan A is the akhmalk (father-in-law in the first degree) of clan S; it is also the tujma akhmalk (father-in-law of the second degree) of clan D, and, finally, the ymg:i (son-in-law /zyat'/) of clan V (although at the same time it is formally the father-in-law of the third degree of the latter, because D is the father-in-law of V); b) clan V stands in exactly the same relationship toward clans A, S, and D, as does clan S toward clans D, V and A, and, finally, clan D toward clans V, A and S. All the clans stand in the relation of pandf (people of a common origin) to each other. From this relationship between the clans it follows that an ymg:i is the father-in-law of the third degree in relation to his genuine father-in-law, from which it appears, in turn, that a father-in-law of the third degree is a degree of kinship completely unnecessary for the regulation of marriage. And, in fact, it does not exist in the terminology, which has only two forms of kinship with the father-in-law: akhmalk (father-in-law of the first degree), and tujma akhmalk (father-in-law of the second degree).

5) From the above it follows that the tujma akhmalk assumes a reciprocal relationship: A is the tujma akhmalk of D, while D, in turn, is the tujma akhmalk of A, and since, as we know from the contemporary marriage rights of the Gilyak, women cannot be given to the tujma akhmalk

/213 cont./

* 614 615 ● 602 clan, in view of the reciprocity of the clans standing in the tujma akhmalk relationship, no marriage relationships are possible between them. As we have seen above, the obstacle is not the closeness /214/ of kinship, but, on the contrary, the distant degree of kinship in comparison with the relationship to the other clans of the phratry.

VIII.

Cousin Marriage

582 * 174 121 We have seen that the basic form of marriage among the Gilyak is marriage between the son of a sister and the daughter of her brother. Thus, the type of the Gilyak marriage is a variety of the so-called cousin marriage.

How did this variety come about? This leads us necessarily to the general problem of kuzennogo braka (cousin marriage /given in Eng./) as an important stage in the evolution of marriage. I shall allow myself to dwell briefly on this problem.

582 * 174 121 114 As long ago as 1900, in my report to the Russian Geographical Society and in subsequent articles -- "Teoriia rodovogo byta /Theory of Clan Life/" and "Endogamiia i ekzogamiia /Endogamy and Exogamy/" -- starting from an analysis of the Gilyak form of marriage, I showed that cousin marriage is the primary form of exogamy and that it gave rise to the classificatory system of marriage, group marriage, and the institution of the clan. At that time I showed that the exogamous institution of the clan was not only an institution of prohibitions, but an institution whose main function was to provide a given kinship union with a constant reservoir of wives from a group of persons bound by a community of blood, which plays such an important role in the various stages of the community.

/260 cont./

583 538 Such catastrophes, as we shall see further on, are not at all rare. This alternative which, according to the epos, faced the man of olden times -- either to marry his lawful an'g:ej, who belonged to him by right of birth, or to obtain a wife by force, while at the same time there is almost no mention of betrothal to an alien woman as a special form of marriage -- proves that obtaining a woman by purchase was a later institution, established as a corrective of the custom of abduction with /261/ all its bloody consequences, just as ransom was a corrective of blood revenge.

Thus are the methods of obtaining wives depicted for us in the traditional epos.

582 584 Contemporary methods of obtaining a wife. Up to the present the Gilyak has preferred the old orthodox mode of marrying a woman of the an'g:ej category, a woman who is regarded as one's wife by right of birth. Only such a marriage is considered "pure." And people who are staunchly for the laws of antiquity try to observe the old law. Of all the categories of an'g:ej the most desirable marriage is with the daughter of the mother's brother, in other words, the most orthodox is considered the cousin marriage between the daughter of a brother and the son of his sister. Such a marriage is so highly valued that even before the future spouses appear in the world the sister and the brother give each other their word to unite the children in marriage. After the birth of the children, when they have reached the age of three or four, there takes place in the presence of the clansmen of one side or the other a formal act of agreement [593] or even the actual concluding of the marriage. Even the mother of the groom may carry on the negotiations, not ● [602] with the father of the bride (for she is his sister and conversation between brother and sister is prohibited) but with 584 585 his wife. The whole procedure of agreement amounts to this: the matchmaker /svat/ (father or mother of the groom) before everyone ties each arm and each leg of the fiancés with threads of nettle and dog hair and, in addition, gives

/263 cont./

196 195 58 [171] [174] [591] /paterniteta/, with the wife moving into the house of her husband. At the present time the original meaning has disappeared from the consciousness of the people to such a degree that often for the expression "to get married" there is added to the verb javind the verb vind, avin vind, which would mean literally -- "go take a man and support him," but this is an obvious contradictio in adjecto, for it signifies moving into the husband's house and, /264/ consequently, being 196 58 supported by him. A linguistic remnant of the old form of marriage is shown in the fact that in the old language, as far as the texts indicate, all the terms of joint marital life are expressed by means of forms derived from javind. The reflexive verb v'avind means -- to live in marriage with someone, the joint marrying of two persons, or, for example, ytk menakh vavin kuil itynd, i.e., "father ordered us to get married," literally, "father ordered us to support each other." Further, the active verb ajvund is used in the sense of to be married, to have a wife, for example, menyn ruvn an'g:ej n'enyn' ajvutà -- "two brothers lived in marriage with one wife," literally -- "they supported one wife," etc.

178 602 591 174 In contemporary life there are likewise preserved several remnants of the former maternality. Eloquent testimony of this is found in the contemporary formula of common marriage law of which we spoke earlier, namely -- ymg:i ● 602 arinkh jag:n'idra -- "one must feed the son-in-law," although according to the general rule, the son-in-law takes his wife to his home and lives apart from the father-in-law.

[171] Clearly, such a formula could only arise in a system where the son-in-law either moved into the wife's house for good, or, as among the Ainu of today, he regularly came to live at her house for a certain length of time, and it goes without saying that the wife's family was obligated to feed the son-in-law on the same bases as those on which at the present time the husband's family is obligated to feed his wife.

/264 cont./

602 606 591 [431] [574] This formula has preserved its vital significance even today. One is supposed to send regularly to the son-in-law gifts of edibles and a share of every catch. Moreover, the young men of the category ymg:i during the course of several months out of the year are unfailing guests in the settlement of their fathers-in-law and are indispensable participants in the more important hunting expeditions.

606 225 602 In particular, this relation is clearly attested to at the time of distant sea excursions for the hunting of sea animals. The master of the boat -- he is the head of the expedition -- in such cases especially summons his ymg:i to take part in the hunt (1).

[171] 1. We find an analogous phenomenon among the Haida Indians, a purely maternal tribe. Here, so reports Swanton (Haida, p. 69), when a man undertakes a military campaign, he calls together his tribesmen who are his potential or actual sons-in-law.

[431] All this time the ymg:i are not only fed for nothing, but when they leave they carry away with them an equal share 606 of the catch and various /265/ gifts besides. One's relations 602 with these young men are often much more tender than with [591] one's own children. And this is entirely understandable, for a man's ymg:i are the sons of his sisters or daughters, his tribesmen, who under a maternal system must live with him, while his own sons and grandsons will move to the settlement of their wives and will be completely estranged from him.

602 604 171 This obligation for the "nourishment" of the tribesmen through the female line, however, is a customary institution in maternality. Among several peoples, as, for example, among the Polynesians, the right of tribesmen to the property of their uncle on the mother's side has taken on completely improbable forms, where a tribesman has the right to ravish with impunity the possessions of his uncles. This right is

/265 cont./

602 604 171 preserved in the form of remnants even among peoples who by now have shifted to paternity, for example, the peoples of the Caucasus, where a tribesman has the right to steal his uncle's horse, if the latter refuses to give it as a gift. Among the Altaians the saying that "a tribesman is worse than seven wolves" has been preserved to this day.

584 593 Moreover, the role of the brother in giving his sister in marriage is quite characteristic. In many cases, it is not the father, but the brother who plays the main role in this affair; the agreement to the marriage depends on him, and the bride price is handed over to him.

174 196 591 171 Not a few other extremely indicative traces which may be considered remnants of maternality have been preserved in the language and customs. Thus, if a Gilyak wishes to say that he is married, that he has a wife at home, he says: n'i-umgarvo ivrà, literally "I have a wife's village" (n'i -- I, umgar -- wife's, vo -- village, ivra -- there is), an expression completely corresponding to the present-day way of life of the Ainu, among whom to this day maternality has been preserved, and often husband and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then he returns to his own settlement, so that a man has, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

174 611 614 186 Another example: the term for designating a person's origin is the expression pandos', literally "root of birth." This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, nor the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her female ancestors. No matter how distant such a settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and more than once my /266/ Gilyak companions during the time of my travels amazed me by the tenderness and

/266 cont./

174 611 614 186 reverence with which they approached a settlement where, according to them, one of their female ancestors had once lived.

In several places to this day, to a question about origin, the Gilyak point to the places from where their mothers and wives came. For example, in the settlement of Nyyvo at the mouth of the Tym' river on the eastern coast of Sakhalin, they reply to the question about the origin of the inhabitants of that settlement, "We are Nyurskie," i.e., come from the settlement of Nyur, which is on the northernmost tip of Sakhalin, and, when I asked for an explanation of this strange answer, it was explained to me: "Because we take wives from Nyur."

Thus, these people reckoned their origin according to the place of the homeland of their mothers, for, as we saw above, the wives of the Gilyak are taken predominantly from the clan of the mother. I shall introduce still another interesting remnant.

553 184 614 611 Usually at the present time children are given names according to the clansmen of the father. Such is the general rule, but there are still places (for example, the settlement of Nanivo on the west shore) where they give names according to the brothers and clansmen of the mother; thus, it is as though the children were members of the mother's clan.

602 611 174 [582] [614] All these are remnants which are entirely out of line with the agnate organization of the contemporary Gilyak clan, but they are remnants which are intimately bound up with the present-day psychology of the Gilyak. For the Gilyak themselves they are not remnants; this is made clear mainly by the marriage norms, according to which spouses are cousins, the children of brother and sister, and the members of each clan preferably take wives from one and the same clan, so that the psychologies of paternity and of maternality cross each other, and in the main between male and female lines there does not exist that gulf which is present in those agnate organizations where the Gilyak norms of marriage are not in effect.

/211 cont./

614
615

In succeeding generations marriages proceed according to the same principle as in the foregoing generation: the men marry the daughters of their mother's brother, and the women marry the sons of their father's sister.

Analyzing this table, we see that:

1) In each clan every generation of men takes its wives from the /212/ clan from which their ancestress came, specifically, each individual man takes a wife from the clan of his mother, while the women of each clan marry, according to generation, into the clan into which their ancestress was married, specifically, each individual woman takes her husband from that clan in which her father's sister is married. Exchange of women between two clans is not permitted.

2) Clan A, therefore, takes its women from clan V (the clan from which the ancestress of A, Vera, was taken), but it cannot in return give its women to this clan, but gives them to clan S, where the sister of its ancestor, Anna, is married. It therefore remains for clan V to take its wives either from S or from D, but clan S is prohibited to it, because in relation to this clan it is tujma akhmalk, father-in-law of the second degree (see above); therefore it remains for clan V to take its wives only from clan D, from which was drawn the ancestress of clan V (Sof'ya). After that only the women from clan S and the men from clan D remain unaccounted for, and, as we saw from the table, the latter marry the former, and thus the entire phratry is provided for matrimonially, and all the marriage norms are observed.

3) In every conjugal pair, the husband is the son of the sister of the father of his wife, and, consequently, husband and wife are always cognate cousins.

602 The interrelationships of the members of the various clans of the phratries are clear from the following analysis of the relationships between the ancestors. Let us begin with Andrey from clan A.

/270 cont./

192 584 [199] orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orth /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the specia term tkhagund (eastern dialect tygnydz).

584 602 [593] Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the of the father. The role of the latter individual is explain apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. Accordin to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since b the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage o his closest akhmalk, the brother of his own daughter-in-l 584 602 614 If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla n'ivukh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there frequ participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy p [556] [583] son, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringi with them at once the articles of the bride price, and fre quently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes proper impression, they immediately take the maiden aw with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

584 554 556 [533] The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one so maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth

595 584 614 Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a marrie man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himsel usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the la herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there ar no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and

Andrey is a cousin of the first degree of Vasiliy and Vera, because the sister of the father of the latter was the mother of Andrey. In exactly the same way, Andrey is a cousin of the first degree of Stepan and Mariya, because the mother of the latter is the sister of the father of Andrey. Only in relation to Dem'yan and Sof'ya is Andrey a cousin of the second degree, for the clan of Dem'yan (D) takes its women from S, which, in turn, takes them from A; consequently the grandmother of Dem'yan was the sister of the grandfather of A, and thus Andrey and Dem'yan are cognate cousins of the second degree.

It is easy to see that the relationship of every other ancestor to the others is the same as that of Andrey, and similar relationships will exist in every generation between the representatives of the different clans, since the marriage norm in every case is the same. From this analysis it follows that: 1) in each generation the representatives of all four clans are either brothers and sisters to each other, or cousins, in a word, people of the same origin on the male and female side; 2) in clans united by marriage relationships, in each generation the husbands, on the one hand, and their wives, on the other, are cognate cousins of the first degree; 3) between clans not /213/ united by marriage relationships, i.e., clans which are tujma akhmalk to each other, for example, between clans A and D, both the husbands and wives are reciprocally cousins of the second degree, i.e., they are more distantly related than the marrying clans; thus remoteness of kinship beyond a certain degree, as in Australia, is an obstacle to marriage.

The relationship between the marrying ones may be defined in greater detail in the following manner: if "I" am a man, my father-in-law is the brother of my mother and a cousin of the first degree of my father, while my mother-in-law is a cousin of the second degree of my father and a cousin of the first degree of my mother. If "I" am a woman, my father-in-law is a cousin of the first degree of my father and a cousin of the second degree of the natural key to the /192/ restoration of the Gilyak system of marriage in its pure primitive aspect.

But what does the kinship terminology teach us?

First of all, we see that the Gilyak kinship terminology does not have special terms for relationships by marriage, which are absolutely identical with the terms of blood (cognate) kinship. In Gilyak, kinsmen by marriage are called pandf, i.e., people of a common origin, cognates, for a man, from the side of the mother, for women -- from the side of the father. The father of the wife is the brother of the mother; the mother of the husband is the sister of the father; the husband is the son of the father's sister; the wife is the daughter of the mother's brother, etc.

It is clear that such a terminology could develop only under conditions where marriages had to be made exclusively with blood kinsmen through the father or through the mother. This was first. In what form these marriages were accomplished is shown to us by other kinship terms.

Within each clan, as we have seen, in each generation the wives of tuvn, that is, the wives of own and collateral brothers, call each other sisters, and their mothers-in-law, th is the mothers of all these tuvn, they call aunts (sisters of the father), and, conversely, these latter call them nieces; on the other hand, every male calls the sister of his father-in-law his mother. From this it is clear that 1) the wives of all the members of the clan are necessarily kinswomen taken fro one clan, in other words, each clan takes wives for itself exclusively from one common clan, with marriage outside of this clan being impossible; 2) under these conditions, marriage is regulated by generations, i.e., in each generation the clansmen-"brothers" take from a clan which is obligatory for marriage a corresponding generation of "sisters, the nieces of those women whom the generation of their "fathers" married, and their descendents, in turn, take the following generation of "sisters," the nieces of their mothers, etc. This is why the wives of "brothers" call each other

/271 cont./

The bride is customarily represented by the father and mother, but for the final decision the attendance of representatives of her side is necessary. The bride, the father of the bride and of the groom, intervene in the negotiations, but their participation is rather passive. In resolving the question, aside from the consent of the father and mother, the wishes of the bother play a part. Frequently the wishes of the sister are decisive. Here is a remnant of matriarchy in the epos the role of the brothers stands out in sharp relief. In one story which I recorded from Tyl, when he was in uniform him of his intention to give his sister in marriage, relation: "Do thou but think upon it only after hearing the counsel of your younger sisters!" It is interesting, also, that the role of the mother, despite the fact that women have /272/ no part in the negotiations and ceremony affairs, is no smaller in matriarchal affairs than that of the father. This, however, is the case only on Sakhalin; on the Amur the wishes of the bride are not considered, although the negotiations are conducted in the presence of the maiden, who sits silently in her accustomed place among the trunks with her dowry and waits for the decision concerning her fate. Ordinarily her sole begin when the matter has already been decided, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she ordinarily comes of the laconic phrase: "Since you with this, it is for me to contradict." But it may happen that the maiden, upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, immediately runs away and does not return until the departure of the matchmakers, and this happens rather frequently and is naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the /273/ It is interesting to note that among the Orogka, whose organization, as a survey of ancient matriarchal ties, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, candidate differences were noticed by me.

/274 cont./

2. The custom that the widow of the older brother goes to the younger brother, but the widow of the younger brother, the younger brother is also found among the Samoyed of the Turukhansk region (Krivoshapkin", "Etnograf. Zb.,"Ethnograf. Sbornik", Vyp. 1, 1853, p. 1, Rum. Geogr. Obshch., 1865, I, Rev. and Stat., p. 176. Sternberg, "Ethnograf. Zb.," Vyp. 5, Turukhansk Region," Zap. Rosk. Geogr. Obshch. po etnogr. Geogr., Vol. 1, 1869, p. 48b; among the Yakut, Priklonskii, "Zap. Sib. Geogr. Obshch. po etnogr. Geogr., Vol. 1, 1869, p. 48b; among the Yakut, Priklonskii, "Zap. Sib. Otdel. Imp. Russkoi Geogr. Obshch., Vol. 1, 1869, p. 48b; among the Tungus, Sternberg

/4t com./

This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-in-law (for he may not be seen); moreover, this also explains, in plains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not yet from the clan of his mother-in-law, ŋ̌ŋ̌ŋ̌ ŋ̌ŋ̌ŋ̌ ŋŋŋ, literally, "ŋŋŋ meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex. because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

Finally, this explains the custom of the bride price. the custom of a payment for one's bride.. Abduction is a sin against the clan of the one abducted; a sin which demands atonement, by force or by a material fine from the abductor. Among the Gilyak this sin of abduction is done away by the bride generation inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that atonement, that same material fem of atonement for a sin. for the killing of a clansman. It is not a consideration that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, ŋŋŋŋŋŋ among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no way to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /ŋŋŋ/ without husbands/for the parents' fear of the punishment, which is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable, perhaps decisive shaple for the supernatural spirit of primitive man to veneration of the dead, and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies. sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

Religion of the Gilyak

In his world view the Gilyak. like every primitive man. is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel. he could say: with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/4l com./

The eve has finally arrived. This day is called Nas—ŋŋŋkhoŋ, the day of the mountain ŋŋŋ. On this day, clicks with the sharpened ends. which play an important religious role in the festival. These clicks are made of the bone of the mountain ŋŋŋ-ŋŋŋŋ-ŋŋŋŋŋŋŋ. which. together with the skin bear will get out to go to the mountain ŋŋŋ and bring back fatness and the needs of the Gilyak, and will be his talisman as well. Each kind of ŋŋŋ is made in pairs each pair is genuine. so that they will be happier. and so that they will propagate and multiply. Some of the ŋŋŋ are hung in sacrificial trees, and some of the ŋŋŋ are placed in sacrificial chests at the bottom. While the preparations of the ŋŋŋ take place. the clan elder. together with the master of the bear, gathers the clansmen (ŋŋŋ ŋŋŋŋŋŋŋ

/378 cont./
clansmen, even in those cases where the families eat separately.
And, conversely, it happens that in large families, keeping house together and eating together, individual members, such as, for example, the unseparated sons, are independent owners of dogs, boats, and other movable property. Thus, the sons who live with their father obtain in good time property for their future independence or for the purchase of a wife with their own means.
Such independent property of unseparated sons is either obtained at a present /379/ from the father, augmented by the fruits of success in hunting through the efforts of the children or as the result of employment in towns. If an unseparated son kills a bear, the meat goes for general use, but he gets the skin. If he sells his fox and sable, he will purchase various articles for the family, but he will certainly obtain something especially for himself. The same is true of his wages. But never will the son reserve for himself a special share of his catch of fish, where ordinarily the skill of one individual plays no role. These same economic relations prevail between the father-in-law and son-in-law who maintain a joint household (furs and wages constitute individual acquisitions). There is a category of articles sui generis which constitute the exclusive individual property of the Gilyak. This is his "wealth." The Sakhalin Gilyak, at least, does not treasure and does not store up money. On the other hand, he stores up valuable fur coats, fox and sable, pieces of costly Chinese silk, spears with silver fretwork, silk gowns, Japanese sabers, etc. These riches pass from generation to generation, from father to son, and only at extremely important moments of life are they taken out of the storehouse. When it is necessary to purchase a wife for his son, when the need arises to provide presents for his daughter, departing for the clan of her husband, when the clan through its common efforts concludes a peace with the clan of the avenger, when he himself dies, or some other person who is dear to him and whom he wishes to see upon the funeral pyre in all the splendor of sable fur coats and Chinese silks -- then the treasured objects are brought out of the storehouse. The attitude of the Gilyak toward rich men is interesting. The Gilyak regards his wealthy brother

608

/382 cont./
428 inheritance immediately. If the widow is old and there is even [968] one young or grown-up son among her children, the family continues to live as it did during the father's lifetime. The grown-up son will be the sustainer and worker of the family. A question of the division of the inheritance only arises when the children, coming of age, subsequently desire to separate. If a Gilyak dies without leaving children, or only leaving children of the female sex, the property passes to that brother of the deceased who marries the widow; if the inheritance is a large one, the other brothers and daughters of the deceased, even the married ones, share in the inheritance. A childless and aged [968] widow passes into the care of the brothers of the deceased, who 428 divide the inheritance among themselves. It is necessary to note 597 that a Gilyak without children or sons takes measures in good time to make sure that he will have an heir of the male sex, which always coincides with the necessity of having an assistant-worker in the maintenance of the household and a sustainer in his old age.
With this aim the Gilyak adopts the son of one of his ruvn or a poor 428 clansman-ruvn, who works together with him and is his heir. It is noteworthy that even when there are children, a person who has worked in the family for a long time receives a share of the ● [600] inheritance. Sons-in-law who work with their father-in-law until his death are without a question his heirs, according to the wish of the testator. Heirs of the male sex receive equal shares of the inheritance. Only in a case where a younger son has lived with his father up to the very time of his death, while the other brothers have separated, does he obtain a little more than the other brothers.
572 Juridical Morals. Among the Sakhalin Gilyak one hardly ever [614] encounters crimes of a mercenary character. The Gilyak keeps his treasures in the storehouse, which is never shut. The Gilyak calmly leaves valuable objects in the taiga, on the road, in an uninhabited summer dwelling, without fearing for their safety.
In my presence a Gilyak left in the taiga, two steps from the road, a piece of silk material and a valuable spear. "No one [192] will take it" he said calmly. /383/ If a Gilyak is sometimes tempted by the possession of another, it is always in the field of

608 ARTIFICIAL KIN RELATIONSHIPS--creation of kinship ties by artificial means (e.g., blood brotherhood); establishment of kinship through ceremonial sponsorship (e.g., godparents and godchildren); kinship terms employed by artificial kinsmen; reciprocal relations and stereotyped behavior patterns exhibited; etc. See also:

Relations between guardian and ward . . . . . 439 Friendship 678
Mating ceremonies . . . . . 563 Adoption 697

*614 /123 cont./
615 from its lair), sable hunting, and especially the hunting of 235 sea animals in boats. And it is noteworthy that in these 235 instances the Gilyak most frequently invites the participation, 442 not of his clansmen, but of the ymgi, and not necessarily those married to his sister or daughter, but ymgi in general, i.e., the young men from that clan which takes its wives from him. The Gilyak feels more at ease with them than he does with his own /124/ clansmen; he can freely converse and joke with them, while he may not do this, as we know, with all of his clansmen. In turn, in their akhmal'k clan the ymgi feel like a fish in water; all the women of their generation are their an'gej (wives) -- all future wives and at any rate women to whom at any time they have conjugal rights in the broadest sense of the term. As concerns the local young male population, they find their revenge in the clan of their akhmal'k, where they meet the same reception from their *614 "fathers-in-law" and among their numerous "wives." Between 615 the male youth of both clans ("navkh'l") (1), as a result of
● 608
[601]

1. Let us recall that ymgi and the "brothers" of their "wives" mutually call themselves navkh'l.

frequent meetings, not to mention relationship by marriage, the most touching relations are established. It is in these surroundings that friendships flower most of all. Among the Gilyak the practice of ceremonial brotherhood is very much in vogue. Ordinarily it manifests itself in the periodic exchange of presents, mutual aid in misfortune, and other such services.
But the most touching instances of ceremonial brotherhood may be found among the navkh'l. Here is one such example, especially surprising to me, which I chanced to observe in the settlement of Ngambevo on the eastern shore of Sakhalin. Both friends, "navkh'l," lived in one yurt; they had everything in common, went about together like lovers, almost never separated -- a modern Orestes and Pylades. They were both,

*614 /124 cont./
615 it is true, very young, unmarried, and it is difficult to say 615 what happened to their feelings later on, but the mere possi-
● 608 bility of such examples illustrates boldly the relations between members of matrimonial clans.
*614 The principle of mutual aid between members of matri-615 monial clans is reflected in the right of inheritance, to which, 428 despite the strict agnatic basis, there is only one exception, 583 namely, with regard to the pandi'y; by a will, as we already know, the ymgi can obtain the iron "shagund" (i.e., going for the bride price), while the akhmal'k can obtain the fur "shagund" (going toward the bride's dowry). This rule, which reduces the bride price to the simple formality of taking it from one pocket and putting it in another, serves, incidentally, as an important indication of the fact that originally among the Gilyak the bride price did not bear the character of payment for the bride, but rather was a form of religious ransom.
But for what?
*614 The fact is that under the Gilyak norms of marriage the 615 bride price is in general a strange anomaly. Actually, once 774 marriage /125/ from the clan of the mother is a religious ob-583 ligation, and even preferable between the children of brother and sister, how can there be any talk of payment or ransom for the bride? Obviously the rise of this institution must have been due to some recent change in the marriage norms. This [198] change we know; it consisted in the fact that in some instances when marriage from the clan of the mother was impossible, it became necessary to take wives from a strange clan, but this clan, in its turn, was obligated to keep its women for its own lawful ymgi and therefore could only accede to giving away its women by masking it with some act of pious deception of the gods, which would at the same time be profitable for the [192] father-in-law. By analogy with the religious ransom in cases of revenge (see above), there thus arose the institution of the bride price, satisfying both the interests of the father-in-law and the dictates of religion. In its turn, the ymgi clan, which

609

609 BEHAVIOR TOWARD NONRELATIVES--cultural definition of nonrelatives; relationships and associated behavior defined by absence of kinship ties; behavior toward strangers and aliens; etc. See also:

Intergenerational relationships . . . . . 97 Behavior toward ethnic religious 563
Behavior toward individual observers . . . . . 123 International relations 648
Ethnocentrism 189

*614 /110 cont./
in its original site that the indigenous village can no longer feed 423 everybody, emigrants by degrees depart from it to other places, [167] selecting the nearest possible sites in order that the ties between the [167] clansmen will not be severed. Immigration to very distant points involves an actual division of the "fire" and branching out of the clan. A no less important cause of the mixture of population is the custom, in some instances, of sons-in-law /yvat'ya/ moving to the clans of their fathers-in-law, about which we shall speak in detail in its place. Territory is in any case an indefinite sign of the clan.
423 The Gilyak do not even possess a consciousness of the right to ● 609 property, not only with respect to themselves, but also with respect to /111/ strangers. When wandering Tungus appeared on Sakhalin 50 years ago and began to hunt in the primordial territories of the Gilyak, it did not occur to anyone to protest against this, although the Tungus came in small groups and could hardly have withstood the numerous aborigines with force.
*614 Clan names are just as indefinite a sign. In the mass of primitive, so-called "totemistic" tribes, the clan name is one of the very sharpest external signs of the unity of a clan. A totemistic name is a real object of nature, animal or plant, which is represented on the body, clothing, buildings, etc.
Among the Gilyak there is nothing of this sort. In some clans there are totemistic legends. Thus, for example, a clan living in the settlement of Tangash considers itself kindred with the bear on the grounds that a woman of that clan had given birth to a monstrosity with features resembling those of a bear.
Similar legends exist in other clans. Nevertheless, not only typical totemistic, but even ordinary clan names in the proper sense are absent. There are only territorial names. If a Gilyak wants to name the people of such and such a clan, he says "the dwellers of such and such a settlement," which sometimes corresponds with the actual place of habitation of the clan, but most frequently only indicates the village which was once the primordial abode of one or another clan.

*614 /127 cont./ But these Ties Prove of 615 particular value in matters of revenge. In urgent cases, when 621 a clan involved in war proves weak, the pandf'y assist it to 628 "raise the bones" and to protect itself against attack with the same selflessness as they show toward their own clansmen. Only in the payment of tkhusind may the pandf'y not participate. Still more valuable, perhaps, are the matrimonial ties in the matter of the reconciliation of clans, especially when the hostile clans are pandf'y to each other, as not infrequently happens, and we have already expressed in the section on revenge our own belief that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

*614 Such are the relations between the akhmal'k and ymgi clans,
615 relations which broaden the narrow framework of the closed
• 669 clan and extend its sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is a whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which finally become stronger than interclan ties and are transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people in general. The term navkh, which the members of the ymgi and akhmal'k clans of the corresponding generations give to each other, has finally become the customary appellation with which any member of another clan or stranger is addressed. This formal change is none other than the expression of a true and profound change in attitude toward members of other clans.

609 Hospitality, courtesy, compassion -- these are virtues
574 which the Gilyak in reality practice toward all without dis-
[157] crimination, not only toward tribesmen of other clans, not only toward indigenous neighbors of other tribes, such as the Orok, the Goldi, and the Ainu, but also toward newcomers, the Tungus, the Yakut, and, finally, the Russians, who have done them so much harm. How often have escaped convicts slain whole families of Gilyak after the most hospitable

/127 cont./
• 609 reception, and nonetheless only in the rarest cases will the 574 Gilyak refuse to tender his hospitality to the Russian who has 609 wandered his way. Where the Gilyak have dealt cruelly with 879 such fugitives (1), it was only in pursuance of clan vengeance
*614

1. The Gilyak regard Russian fugitives as one clan, the representatives of which answer for one another.

for slain clansmen -- just what they consider their duty to do with respect to /128/ their own tribesman-murderer. But isolated acts of this sort do not at all change their general 186 relations with members of other tribes. There are, of course, 609 among the Gilyak, as among civilized peoples, national 824 prejudices, but they are to be attributed entirely to ignorance, to lack of acquaintance with strange, unknown elements, giving a wide play to fantastic notions and fears. These prejudices exist among them even toward their own tribesmen who live in more remote regions. Thus the Gilyak of the western shore of Sakhalin are wont to represent their tribesmen of the Okhotsk shore as little short of cannibals, at any rate as extremely evil and inclined to theft, although this is the purest prejudice, the result of ignorance or generalizations from single cases. In the very same way after the first expeditions of our Cossacks in the seventeenth century the Gilyak called the Russians nothing other than kinr (devil), but then the Cossacks gave abundant cause for it, not only by their strange outer appearance, their novel garments and arms, but by a whole string of senseless cruelties and brigands' greediness for "the forties of forties" of valuable fur pelts. But now that the Gilyak have met peaceful Russian people, they recall their ancient "prejudice" as a funny anecdote and can conduct themselves with true humanity toward their neighbors.

174 But we have strayed somewhat from our main theme. We *614 can now resume it.
615

/254 cont./
832 It is noteworthy that they do not evaluate beauty only 826 from their own racial viewpoint. Men and women both
• 609 liked /255/ Russian women. Of male Europeans, the Gilyak women even liked types unfamiliar to them, such as redheads or blonds. Thus, for example, my friend Bronislaw Piłsudski, reddish-blond, enjoyed great admiration among the Gilyak, not only because of his sympathetic attitude toward them, but in particular on account of his attractice appearance. They referred to him only as poch urakhra -- "handsome man," literally -- "beautiful in face," and when he left Sakhalin, the Gilyak women as a farewell present dictated to him songs of declarations of love.

In their love songs they sing not only about beauty, but 832 also about "white skin, like the bark of a birch tree," 826 luxuriant hair (a braid reaching to the waist, hair made sleek), 533 gracefulness of gait ("with her head inclined to the side, smiling she walks," "with a six-foot stride he walks"), physical strength or size (his trunk is an arm-spread, "his legs go into the ground up to the shin").

832 Of course, elegance in clothing also plays no minor 291 role in the aesthetic appreciation of one's sweetheart. In 533 their love songs they sing about women's clothing embroidered with finery, about a great number of copper rattles sewn on, and so forth; they sing about men's black dog-skin fur coats, shirts made out of variegated sealskins, rich headbands of fine squirrel skins, etc. Women's summer clothing that is black in color is considered the most beautiful; men play the dandy in shirts that are sewed half of red and half of white or dark blue material. But along with outward beauty, moral qualities are also valued.

832 Women like in men the traits of manliness and reliability 577 ("thy voice is like the voice of an urdia n'ivukh'a, i.e., respected man"), or the talents of a conversationalist -- jester, singer. Aside from outer beauty, men admire in women the [867] traits of femininity, which Gilyak women possess to a great degree both by nature and also due to early training; from

/699 cont./
114 4.(cont.)
231 this fable by the Yukagir in the country of 195 "Svatsnia" (tobach'ya zemla = dog country) in Siberia, but he himself labeled the report doubtful.

231 The length of the bear's captivity depends on its age: old
*496 animals are kept in captivity only a few months; young ones for several years, until they are fully grown. When it has acquired a thick layer of fat as a result of plentiful food and lack of exercise, the time draws near to lead it with great pomp to its doom. The only season of the year in which bear festivals take place among the Gilyak is winter, for then they stay, at least on the mainland, in the spacious dwellings built in accordance with the Chinese pattern and have much time for social gatherings, festivities, and feasting; in fact, the abundance of time is probably the chief reason why they like to prolong them as much as possible. In particular December, or Anj-long of the continental Gilyak, is the month in which most of the bear festivals occur. But this is by no means obligatory; they may equally as well take place in January and February; indeed, I myself attended such a festival among the Olcha that did not begin until March 22 (April 3). But this is about the latest date for it, for by then preparations for the summer begin in earnest, and soon afterward, in April and at the beginning of May, the move to the [956] summer dwellings is undertaken. Sometimes setting the date for when a bear festival is to take place is assigned to the shaman, but usually, as was mentioned, it is left to the owner of the bear or bears, who is also the host, and he will let it depend on his own business affairs and can, if the latter demand it, have a more or less long pause between the individual acts of the festival.

• [609] As a result of this, as well as thanks to the great number of bears
[123] kept in captivity by the Gilyak and Olcha and the long duration of the whole festival, it may easily happen that the traveler in the country will encounter here or there an individual act of the festival, but usually on such an occasion the Gilyak, animated by mistrust and suspicion, try to keep such strangers from entering their dwellings by all kinds of pretexts, as I myself experienced on Sakhalin.

116, 186, 609

"Moonlight was silvering the broadening Bay of Ni, and all was still and quiet, save for the passage of a solitary canoe of natives returning to their village. Later there passed another containing two men of a fresh tribe, the Tungus, whose language none of us understood. We mutually grunted salutations, though I never saw the Gilyaks greet each other, this being quite contrary to the [258] habits of their neighbours to the south, the Ainus, with whom the ceremony is both long and complicated.

The Tungus are the most nomadic race on Sakhalin, at the same time they are the best hunters, and probably the cleverest in carving, needlework, and metalwork. Their home is the taiga, and with their reindeer and fine hunting dogs are sometimes seen following the river course or the forest paths made by wild animals. Some of their dogs, I was told, would catch three sables in a day, which their masters would exchange at Derbensk for a pud of gunpowder and a pud of shot.

Between them and the Gilyaks there are occasional misunderstandings, and even the Orochons complain that the latter sometimes steal their reindeer, which in view of the dispersal of their herds in the forest is quite possible. ....

'The Tungus,' said our Vanka, 'are wild people living in the forest. They are not hospitable, and do not give the Gilyaks food and drink when they call;' "

Help in need is decidedly more the order of the day than it is with us civilized people. If someone has undeservedly become poor, he is immediately assisted, and debts are paid for relatives. Likewise people who have become incapable of work because of illness are assured support by relatives and neighbors. The sick, in general, are eagerly nursed; only when the death agony begins, the dying person is subjected to a harsh ordeal. He is carried out of the house into the open and is left there at any time of the year, until he is dead. This custom is based on the belief that a dead person brings ill-luck to the house, and in case a person dies indoors, the house must be taken down. However, the sick person who is subjected to these measures is usually already in a comatose state. It appears, that child-bearing women are removed from the house for similar reasons.

In danger and suffering the Gilyak also help the non-Gilyak to say nothing of their fellow-tribesmen. I must mention two exceptions. I heard repeatedly from Russians that a Gilyak on the point of drowning could not count on help from his people, in fact, the Gilyak watch him going under, with fatalistic calm, and comfort themselves by saying that "he is needed above." Besides, it is said that the Sakhalin-Gilyaks take care not to help a man who has fallen into the clutches of a bear, because they see in it a divine punishment. One who is killed in this way is not cremated but must be buried together with the body of the bear, should he also be killed; at the same time they scatter about pieces of bear flesh and scraps of the dead man's clothing. The Gilyak whom I questioned about drowning persons, unanimously testified [224] that they always helped them as much as they could and they showed me several people who had been rescued because help had been sent them from the shore. Furthermore, in the case of a man who has been attacked by a bear being left to his fate, we must take into consideration the fact that the custom of two or three people going out to hunt a bear presupposes mutual aid. The question deserves to be further investigated, but nevertheless I believe that the afore-mentioned fatalism does not appear in all cases, only in certain instances where superstition was awakened for some specific reason.

The Gilyak help not only their fellow-tribesmen but also strangers in time of distress as much as they can. They repeatedly saved the lives of run-away convicts, for which they were often wretchedly rewarded besides. More of this later.

Hospitality is decidedly practised.

577 As far as deceit is concerned, it is very rare among them-
426 selves but is practiced against Russians. The cheating
● 609 usually consists in a Gilyak asking for a loan of money from 186 a Russian, promising him fish, sable, etc., in return and then not reappearing. However, one is not justified in assuming from this that the Gilyak have two different moral standards, which would contradict our previous statements. The discrepancy may be much more simply explained. To sell something at too high a price to a Russian or to take his money and not return it, - such things many Gilyak take the liberty of doing because they think Russians in general are mightier and wealthier than themselves and they feel that for this reason they would be forgiven. But more frequently they are motivated by the feeling that civilized persons would be the first to cheat them. Russian and Chinese merchants often played nasty tricks on them, in fact it has happened that a Gilyak lost all patience and control and hurled himself on his shameless creditor in order to make an end to the latter's 577 ever-increasing demands. It is actually surprising that,
609 having been taught by such masters, the majority of Gilyak 177 nevertheless refrain from cheating, and this fact is highly appreciated by decent Russians. Often I heard peasants of neighboring villages say: "The Gilyak are in general more honest than our sort, especially those who live in distant villages [225], for they do not even permit themselves to cheat strangers." (1) However, one must

1. I myself had the following experience. I bought some ear-rings from a Gilyak woman and gave her a ruble in paper money because I had no change. The woman took the money with some astonishment. Somewhat later when the little steamer with which I had arrived weighed anchor, the woman suddenly appeared rowing toward me in a boat and called out to me that the ear-rings were "not silver, just ordinary ones". Obviously she did not want to be taken for a swindler.

not believe that the peasants are generally dishonest; on the contrary, they are an upright people, which

577 makes the comparison even more valuable. Unfortunately,
● 609 there have been cases where Gilyak have been wronged 177 by decent people, for example by soldiers who had before that behaved properly. The causes for that may be found in the peculiar manner in which the uncultivated individual regards strange peoples. He is to a certain extent inclined to regard foreigners as outlaws. However, this fact has in recent times been badly misused and misinterpreted by some philosophers. We have pointed out how the Gilyak themselves were able to put themselves in the place of strangers as well as fellow-tribesmen, and to sympathize with them. But one must remember that, where strangers are concerned, moral impulses such as compassion, the sharing of pleasures, the sense of justice, etc., more than ever make room for the egoistic impulses. Everything that tends to repress understanding and sympathy-greed, vindictiveness, etc. - breaks out more easily if one is 177 face to face with strangers. The Gilyak unfortunately
682 put their worst foot forward in their first acquaintance
627 with the civilized world. The French missionary, Le Brunière, who in the year 1848 came from China by way of the Amur and the Ussuri to the Gilyak was robbed and murdered out of pure lust for booty. But this case was and has remained an exception. The village of Vaida (32 versts from the present city of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) still has about 200 inhabitants; at that time it was larger by a third, and seven or eight men took part in the crime, of which none is living.

Actually murder seldom occurs. Most cases are caused by quarrels over the fair sex. The relatives of the murdered one formerly resorted to revenge; now, however, they usually file complaints with the Russian administration. [226]

548 Prostitution in its real sense does not exist; however
837 passing amours are not too much forbidden. A Gilyak
684 woman whose husband is away probably lets herself be persuaded by a passer-by, and the husband himself is not too much offended, provided only that there are no consequences. In general, virginity and chastity have a certain value, but minor transgressions are not taken very seriously. However if a woman gives herself completely to a stranger she is persecuted.

563 hopes, merely from an ungovernable yen for liberty and 177 diversion, although they know they will be only too easily recognized and will only earn a more severe punishment.
563 The hardships and dangers which these unfortunate ones
● 609 must sometimes endure, especially in winter, are hair-
177 raising and some of the stories which they tell as though they were nothing unusual, sound like epics. A large number of them perish. One of the dangers which they must guard against in the Amur country and the Transbaykal is persecution at the hands of the natives, in which activity particularly those kinsmen of the Huns, the wild Buryats on Lake Baykal, distinguish themselves. To them, a brodyaga is as good as wild game, they aim at him wherever they meet him, and take whatever they find on the dead man. They do this with all assurance for they know that the deed will not be investigated. In recent times this bestial custom has also crept in among the Goldi and the Gilyak. The brodyagi themselves gave the impetus to these animosities. Most of them are perfectly docile, peaceable human beings who are glad if [229] they are left alone, and are therefore little feared by the Russians themselves; they are given a night's lodging, a hunk of bread, and no one thinks of notifying an official. Now among these "unfortunate ones" (1)

1. This is what they are called by the Siberians, some of whom are themselves descendants of exiles and have had experiences of their own which corroborate the words of Staël "tout savoir c'est tout pardonner".

there are sometimes real villains who cannot conceal their wolf-like nature. Furthermore, among deportees there are not infrequently to be found people who are simply pathological, suffering from homicidal mania, who belong anywhere but in a penal colony. Such ugly customers make trouble when they escape. There have been cases where entire Gilyak families were murdered even by those who were hospitably received by the natives. As a result, it is easy to imagine that the Gilyak also began playing a different tune. After such precedents, greed and rapacity may now and then also have arisen in the soul of the savage, even though such a refugee would not have been carrying much. Thus the brodyagi now avoid the native villages, and if they are forced to pass near-by, they go in bands and take

563 general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now
609 and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods
177 by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

181 XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

671 Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

556 There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must 595 be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc.
and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

735 Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not
438 capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves.
556 Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are 261 no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

173 them that the old people had told him that one part of the 181 Gilyak came across the ocean, the other, from above, that 721 is, from approximately there where the city of Blagoveshchensk lies. May we not understand this to mean that they crossed over from Sakhalin and that the first immigrants mingled with the Goldi who were already to be found on the Amur?

153 If one asks how intelligent the Gilyak are, it may be said that for savages they are rather intelligent. In the arts, however, they are very backward. They know how to draw or carve various animals. The figures are coarse, but nevertheless [246] recognizable. Music and poetry are absolutely embryonic, but at least they like to hear music.
Their memory for places and persons is astonishing. If a Gilyak meets a stranger somewhere, he recognizes him instantly after many years, and at the same time recalls all kinds of minor circumstances accompanying the original meeting. In languages, too, their memory is not bad, at least many of them speak Russian, but the reverse is not true. It is, however, doubtful whether the Gilyak's memory would be adequate for systematic instruction. In instruction the different facts cannot be directly understood but must be interpreted from the words of another, and thus a certain 212 imagination and judgment are needed. For a time there was 872 a school in the village of Mikhaylovskoye where Gilyak children were taught to read and write. This they learned very well, but nothing else was taught. The Gilyak, of course, do not have their own writing.

153 Curiosity and a desire for knowledge are average. The 609 former I judge in comparison with other uncultivated peoples whom I had the opportunity of observing, especially the Bashkir. The latter are so intrusive in their curiosity that they give the traveler no peace. Of course, the Gilyak also gather around a stranger who stops at their yurts, but not in great numbers; they keep at a certain distance and soon disperse. If they come into the house of a Russian, they look about them with curiosity but they do not immediately reach for everything that strikes them and do not ask for presents. In this, as in many other respects, they are decorous people.

153 If I must praise them in this connection, I must also say
821 that their desire for knowledge is not sufficiently matured 177 that they would be interested in the main springs of culture.
It seldom occurs to them to ask a Russian about a machine, about economic questions, nature, institutions, religion,

231 like a Pawnee concert. There were big dogs and little dogs, white, black, grey, brown, and yellow dogs, and not one friendly. They did not appear courageous, but I was not altogether certain of their dispositions. Their owners sought to quiet them, but they refused comfort.

These dogs had some peculiarities of those in Kamchatka, but their blood was evidently much debased; they appeared to be a mixture of Kamchadale, greyhound, bull dog, and cur, the latter predominating. They are used for hunting at all seasons, and for towing boats in summer and dragging sledges in winter. I was told that since the Russian settlement of the Amoor the Gilyak dogs have degenerated, in consequence of too much familiarity with Muscovite canines. Nicolayevsk appeared quite cosmopolitan in the matter of dogs, and it was impossible to say what breed was most numerous. One day I saw nineteen in a single group and no two alike.

ABOUT FULL.

609 Near the entrance of the village an old man was repairing his nets, which were stretched along a fence. He did not regard us as we scrutinized his jacket of blue cotton, and he made no response to a question which Borasdine asked.
Further along were two women putting fish upon poles for drying, and a third was engaged in skinning a large salmon.
The women did not look up from their work, and were not 142 inclined to amiability. They had Mongol features, complex-302 ion, eyes, and hair, the latter thick and black. Some of the 133 was in motion and evidently came from a descending stea boat. On another occasion we missed in these channels boat our captain was desirous of hailing. Once while Ge eral Monravieff was ascending the river he was passed by courier who was bringing him important despatches.

502 The pilot steers with a chart of the river before him, a relies partly upon his experience and partly upon the deli ated route. Sometimes channels used at high water are n navigable when the river is low, and some are favorable descent but not for ascent. In general the pilotage is more facile than on the Mississippi, and accidents are not f quent.

609 The peasants always came to the bank where we stopp 291 no matter what the hour. At one place where we took wo at night there was a picturesque group of twenty-five or thi gathered around a fire; men and women talking, laughi smoking, and watching the crew at work. The light of t fire poured full upon a few figures and brought them i strong relief, while others were half hidden in shadow.
the men some wore coats of sheepskin, others Cossack co of grey cloth; some had caps of faded cloth, and others T tar caps of black sheepskin. Red beards, white beards, bla beards, and smooth faces were placed upon by the danc flames. The women were in hoopless dresses, and h shawls over their heads in place of bonnets.

133 A hundred versts above Sofyesk the scenery changed. T mountains on the south bank receded from the river and w more broken and destitute of trees. Wide strips of lowla covered with forest intervened between the mountains the shore. On the north the general character of the co try remained. I observed a mountain, wooded to the top a sloping regularly, that had a curious formation at its sum
It was a perpendicular shaft resembling Bunker Hill Mo ment, and rising from the highest point of the mountain appeared of perfect symmetry, and seemed more like a w of art than of nature. On the same mountain, half w down its side, was a mass of rock with towers and buttres

/30 cont./

purchase fish, while in many places (for example, on the Tym') the inhabitants set out in whole settlements to travel several hundred kilometers to the seashore for the spring seal-hunting, only to return half a year later for the fall run of fish in their native places. The Gilyak likes to travel, however, even without serious reasons for it. To make visits, receive guests, arrange celebrations, and live gregariously are the greatest pleasures of the Gilyak. Gloomy and stern while alone, he is transformed in society and becomes playful, gay, and garrulous.

In the north, in winter, between 30 and 40 people live in the big yurts of the Manchu type. It is here that sociableness, which is inherent anyway in the conditions of the social framework of the Gilyak, is cultivated. Now, however, we must leave the external aspect of the life of the Gilyak and pass to its internal structure, with whose unique peculiarities I intend mainly to acquaint my readers.

III.

Kinship System. Marriage Norms and Their Influence on the Family-Clan Structure.

Of all the peculiarities of the Gilyak way of life nothing so characteristically distinguishes them from the surrounding nationalities as their classificatory system of kinship and the rules that regulate their sexual relations and marriage. In this respect the Gilyak stand equally far from their southern neighbors, the Ainu, and from the Tungus tribes that surround them. The Ainu are the only nationality of the Priamur krai who have preserved features of maternality /materniteta/. The Gilyak family and clan are purely patriarchal institutions. As for the Tungus tribes, although the classificatory system of kinship and certain characteristics of group marriage analogous to those discovered by me in 1891 among the Gilyak were discovered by me among them, a careful comparison of this institution among the Tungus tribes and among the Gilyak leads to the conclusion that they /31/ belong to quite different periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

/31 cont./

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/82 cont./

*614 father-in-law signifies the common right of each generation of clansmen to the corresponding generation of women of the akhmal'k clan, while a common son-in-law -- the obligation to give their women to the ymgi clan. Only the men are a constant element of the clan; the women are an element that either departs from the clan or comes in from outside. Hence the whole "physiological" construction of the clan -- exogamy, agnation, common rights and obligations regarding women, reciprocal conjugal rights of brothers, etc.

Thus the Gilyak clan is a union of kinsmen in the male line, agnates, taking their wives from another certain clan, giving their women to a third, and bound among themselves by a whole series of mutual rights and obligations in the realm of marital-sexual norms.

*614 602 But this is only the formal framework of this kinship union; in the flesh and blood of all the consequences that flow from it, it is much deeper, more intimate, and firmer than appears at first glance. First of all, it must be kept in mind that, despite the principle of agnation, the clansmen are bound by kinship ties, not only through the father, but also through the mother. This follows directly from the very thesis of a common father-in-law. For once each /83/ generation of clansmen ("brothers") marries a corresponding generation of women ("sisters") of one akhmal'k clan, then the mothers of these clansmen, in turn, are sisters to one another. Further, the wives of the clansmen, despite the fact that they, according to the agnatic principle of the clan, are, as it were, a completely alien element, in reality stand in a close cognate relationship with their husbands; accordingly, husband and wife, as we know, are usually the children of a sister and brother -- own or of more distant degrees -- and, consequently, they are in any case cognate brothers and sisters. Thus, the male and female element are not only not alien to each other, elements bound only by marriage, but on the contrary are intimately bound together, aside from marriage, by blood kinship. Moreover,

/135 cont./

*601 184 197 or the differences are of an insignificant phonetic character. Thus, for example, "ytk, ymk" -- father, mother -- are completely identical in all dialects; "ruvn, tuvn" -- brother (eastern dialect) are slightly changed to "ruf" in the western dialect; "og:la, og:lang" in the Tym' and the eastern dialect of Sakhalin are equivalent to "o:la" in the western dialect. In cases where the terms are completely different phonetically, this is due either to borrowing from very near neighbors, as in the previously mentioned "app" and "ivy," or to the formation of corresponding terms from different synonyms common to all dialects. Thus, for example, "shankh" -- woman in the eastern dialect has been formed from the common word "an kh" female, and "um-gu" -- woman in /136/ the western dialect has the same root as the common word "ym(k)" -- mother; in exactly the same way "ut-ku" -- man in the western dialect has the same root as "ytk" -- (father), and the corresponding az'mych in the eastern dialect is from azh -- male, etc.

[104] In the table of kinship nomenclature and the explanations for it, we shall give the terms according to dialects and territories, indicating in parenthesis the dialect of the Amur with the abbreviation (A.D.), the dialect of the Tym' -- (T.D.), the dialect of the eastern shore of Sakhalin --(E.D.), and of the western (W.D.). From here on in the text we shall always use the first of the synonyms of the eastern dialect.

*601 614 104 Now we proceed to the explanation proper of the kinship terminology. We only forewarn the reader that the Gilyak reckon kinship through the male line and that the agnatic family is only a cell of the strictly organized, exogamous, agnatic clan. We also ask the reader to remember that at the mention of this or that term without any special indication of whether it is used by males or females we shall imply that these terms are used identically by both sexes; in other cases the sex of the speaker will be specifically indicated.

/xxviii cont./

*114 The question of cousin marriage is developed particularly 582 assiduously in these works. In this respect, Shternberg enriched the 595 history of marriage with valuable material, very shrewdly analyzed by him. When Shternberg tries to extract cousin marriage from group marriage, however, he contradicts /xxix/ himself and takes an anti-Morgan and at the same time anti-Engels position. To accept the proposition that cousin marriage preceded group marriage logically leads to the conclusion that individual marriage preceded cousin marriage. The reasoning of Shternberg on the causes for the transition from marriage between sisters and brothers to cousin marriage is just as completely idealistic.

Shternberg revealed the clan character of the group marriage of the Gilyak with great thoroughness and, in addition, established the principles of the third- and fourth-clan phratry. Indisputably, the conclusions of Shternberg about the precedence of cross-cousin marriage to unilateral-cousin marriage are correct.

*114 Shternberg's discovery among the Gilyak of the institution 602 of izbeganiya (avoidance), according to which people not having 595 mutual sexual rights must avoid mutual glances, conversations, and so forth, also has extremely great importance for confirming [174] the existence of group marriage. He considers the survival of this institution among peoples who have already emerged from the stage of group marriage as extra proof of its previous existence.

*114 Further, the works of Shternberg give a vivid picture of the
● 614 clan way of life of the Gilyak and of the basic norms of their common law. By the way, in speaking of the clan, one must stress the correctness of Shternberg's criticism of Kunov, who, in spite of Engels, rejected the existence of a clan structure among the Australians.

*114 Shternberg considers in some detail the khlai-ni-vukhakh
614 and quite correctly explains that they are recruited from the yzi
556 (wealthy men), but we wait in vain for an answer from him on the question of the reasons for the degeneration of the clan and the appearance of the yzi. At the same time it must be said that the fact of the existence of the wealthy men among contemporary, so-called primitive peoples, and especially their social role, has been treated with silence in ethnographic literature, and Shternberg was one of the few non-Marxist ethnographers who paid attention ooo to it. In spite of the fact, however, that the material presented by *114 Shternberg convincingly testifies to the rudiments of class differentia-

/xxix cont./

565 tion among the Gilyak, he did not discover this, because he looked through the spectacles of the Populists and saw in the appearance of class differentiation the manifestation, not of the immanent economic laws of every society, but merely the effect on the Gilyak of their neighbors -- the Russians.

*114 A significant part of the monograph is devoted to the re-
971 ligion of the Gilyak. /xxx/ Here the conceptions of Shternberg
● 614 about the masters, first stated by him in "Sakhalinskie giliaki," are unwound in all their breadth. "Each element has its 'master'
[976] who is a 'god,' but, just as in each clan there are outstanding persons, wealthy men, of whom one is the richest ('the master,' according to the everyday terminology of the Gilyak), so are there 'masters' among the spirits, who, according to the beliefs of the Gilyak, also live in clans. With this concept Shternberg stresses the reflection of the social structure in the religious views. The views of Shternberg on the relationship of totemism to clan society also deserves attention. According to Shternberg, "... it was not totemism, i.e., not belief in descent from one or another form of animal, that created the clan gods, which is the accepted way of thinking, but the other way around: the clan gods created totemism.
[262] One cannot explain the interdictions among the totemists against using the meat of totems in their food by anything except a fear of killing some kind of clansman turned into a totem animal."

*114 Shternberg contests the opinion that fear created god and [977] advances his own understanding that the cult of a number of ani-
[825] mals (e.g., the bear and swallow) is caused by their seemingly protective relationship to man.

[956] In "Giliaki" Shternberg also, for the first time, formed his opinion that the shaman is divinely selected.

"Obraztsy materialof po izucheniiu giliatskogo yazyka i *114 fol'klora" and Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora 197 constitute the second group of Shternberg's works on the study of the Gilyak; included here also is the summary of a paper at the Fourteenth Congress of Americanists in Stuttgart, "Bemerkungen

342 /18 cont./
798 (kuzind and jugynd), which is fully consistent with the manner of 198 entering and leaving through the smoke opening.
192

I shall not at this point speak of any other aspect of the 191 arctic way of life. I shall mention only the remarkable fact that 174 riding on dogs (we encounter it among the Yukagir, the Chukchee, 492 the Eskimo, the Aleut, the Koryak, and the Kamchadal) is undoubtedly a characteristic peculiarity of the purely arctic way of life adopted by the natives of the Amur region, the Ainu, the Goldi, and the Orochi, from the Gilyak. The Gilyak term "tu" -- dog sled -- became the property of both the Ainu and the Tungus tribes. The priority, as it were, of the Gilyak in this respect is clearly revealed in everything. The Ainu and the Tungus tribes (the Goldi and the Orochi) have adopted from the Gilyak not only the term and the principle of conveyance on dogs, but also the details of building the sled, the ways of sitting on the sled (astride, with the feet on ski along the sides of the sled), the harness of the dogs, and driving them. It is remarkable that among the reindeer Chukchee, among whom dog-raising is preserved only in legends, the Gilyak way of sitting on the sled (astride) has been preserved to the present. The same way of sitting was habitual among the Kamchadal as well.

In connection with this hypothesis, it is interesting to compare a very widespread legend.

173 Among the numerous legends that I have collected about 174 the origin of the Gilyak clans, I have frequently encountered a 133 legend about how this or that clan came to Sakhalin on the so-[614] called "hovykh." By "hovykh" the Gilyak mean everything that is carried on the current of a river or sea, for the most part clods of earth or tundra turf broken off from the bank, and also floes of ice which are carried on a sea current. One such hovykh is still pointed out on the eastern shore of Sakhalin in Nyyvo Bay, where it formed a minuscule island opposite the settlement of Takrvo.
● [614] It is alleged that a part of the clan now living in the settlement of Tangi on the western shore appeared on this hovykh. There is nothing impossible about conveyance on a hovykh. It not infrequently happens that during the spring hunt for seals a sudden

/20 cont./

144 observations of the physical peculiarities of the Gilyak give us. At the same time, other facts and considerations provide us with a full basis for thinking that the ancient Gilyak type has completely perished, drowned in the stronger wombs of the neighboring tribes. This took place, however, not in an ordinary way, not through a gradual interbreeding with the neighboring tribes by means of intertribal marriages, which would be not at all so surprising, but in quite peculiar, extremely instructive way.

174 In conducting the census of the Gilyak, I carefully collected 167 information and legends about the origin of each particular clan.
● 614 The study of these data brought me to the strange conclusion that 144 the founders of the great majority of the clans now in existence [126] were not the Gilyak, but representatives of the neighboring tribes. How could this have happened? It is a common phenomenon even at the present time that separate individuals for one reason or another may abandon their native tribe and, escaping persecution or misfortune at home, seek refuge /21/ in a neighboring, alien tribe... Here they find traditional hospitality, settle down, marry (usually a widow), and, in this way, are adopted into this or that clan, naturally adopting the language and customs of the tribe that has harbored them. The descendants of such newcomers normally form either independent clans or special branches of those clans that adopted them. And the history of the Gilyak clans shows that these clans of newcomers, or the branches of the clans founded by them, in time invariably grew in membership and sturdily survived, while the older clans or the oldest branches of the clan decayed and in the course of several generations died out. The most vital, growing, and numerous clans are the descendants of precisely these newcomers. Whether the reason lies in the fact that the newcomers and exiles represent a natural selection of exceptionally energetic and vital individuals, or this is the result of interbreeding, the fact is not subject to doubt; I found it not only among the Gilyak.

174 As a result of the census of the Gilyak, I asked myself in 144 perplexity, if in the course of a great number of centuries there has been a constant inflow of fresh elements from other tribes, an inflow that was strengthened by the purchase of wives and female slaves from the Ainu and the Goldi, and if these new elements flourished and multiplied while the indigenes degenerated and died

/30 cont./

221 purchase fish, while in many places (for example, on the Tym') the inhabitants set out in whole settlements to travel several hundred kilometers to the seashore for the spring seal-hunting, only to return half a year later for the fall run of fish in their native
574 places. The Gilyak likes to travel, however, even without 517 serious reasons for it. To make visits, receive guests, arrange [484] celebrations, and live gregariously are the greatest pleasures of [157] the Gilyak. Gloomy and stem while alone, he is transformed in society and becomes playful, gay, and garrulous.

342 In the north, in winter, between 30 and 40 people live in 157 the big yurts of the Manchu type. It is here that sociableness, which is inherent anyway in the conditions of the social frame-128 work of the Gilyak, is cultivated. Now, however, we must leave the external aspect of the life of the Gilyak and pass to its internal structure, with whose unique peculiarities I intend mainly to acquaint my readers.

III.

601 Kinship System. Marriage Norms and Their Influence 191 on the Family-Clan Structure.
174

Of all the peculiarities of the Gilyak way of life nothing so characteristically distinguishes them from the surrounding nationalities as their classificatory system of kinship and the rules that regulate their sexual relations and marriage. In this respect the Gilyak stand equally far from their southern neighbors, the Ainu, and from the Tungus tribes that surround them. The Ainu are the only nationality of the Priamur krai who have preserved features of [611] maternality /materniteta/. The Gilyak family and clan are purely
● [614] patriarchal institutions. As for the Tungus tribes, although the [595] classificatory system of kinship and certain characteristics of group marriage analogous to those discovered by me in 1891 among the Gilyak were discovered by me among them, a careful comparison of this institution among the Tungus tribes and among the Gilyak leads to the conclusion that they /31/ belong to quite different

/31 cont./

601 periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could 191 have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in 174 the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient 595 to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of 835 individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

595 At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not 587 seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or 583 rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of 851 his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and 611 succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he 551 is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father
684 of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses 614 itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber
582 of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

593 One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live 601 in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and 592 not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In 352 large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently 965 encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/35 cont./

83 The views of the Gilyak in this regard are so strict that he 579 transfers them into the animal world; dogs caught in an incestuous 825 act are killed, being considered werewolves.

602 The Gilyak speak of the Russian women who sell themselves
829 for money with the greatest contempt. This strict loyalty with regard to persons of prohibited categories created a system of prohibitions against conversation and joking with whole classes of people. It is even difficult for us Europeans to imagine that the Gilyak man or the Gilyak woman does not have the right, not only to joke, but even to talk with his own brothers and sisters, or even with brothers and sisters of the most distant degrees of kinship, i.e., with the whole class of tuvn, because, on the one hand, familiar relations may lead to sexual intercourse in forbidden degrees and, on the other hand, to light quarrels out of jealousy in cases of permitted intercourse. On the same grounds, among the Sakhalin Gilyak, one is allowed to talk to, but not to joke with, wives of the younger brothers, because sexual intercourse with them is forbidden, and, conversely, one can both talk to and joke with wives of elder brothers, and generally with the group of an'gej (wives).

576 Because of the prohibition against conversation with categories of close kinsmen among the Gilyak, the custom of saying hello and good-by upon arrival and departure is absent.

174 So far, I have cited only facts. But where did these strange 601 facts come from? How can we explain these complex and con-
835 fusing norms of sexual cohabitation, and the no less strange kinship nomenclature? Even if we can to some extent explain the mutual rights of brothers to their wives, the right of a person to the married sisters of his own wife or the married sisters of the wives of his brothers is completely incomprehensible. Why is it that a woman calls not only her own sister, but also her husband's brothers' wives sister? Why does a man /36/ call the sister of his father-in-law 174 his mother? Why, for instance, is it enough that a person from 601 clan A, let us say, takes a wife from a completely alien clan for 835 all the women of clan A to become forbidden to the representatives 614 of the latter. The complex and confusing chain of these facts must doubtless be the result of the single, very simple basic fact of an original type of family and clan organization, a type which,

/36 cont./

174 because of the vicissitudes of the clan life of the Gilyak, their 601 migrations, depopulations, immigrations, and other such reasons, 835 naturally in the course of time had to become complicated and 614 lose its former simplicity.

A key to the discovery of this original type is the same kin-
174 ship nomenclature, which, without doubt, is a living reflection 601 of the sexual norms which were discarded or are being discarded.
835 First of all, it is clear that the kinship nomenclature ac-
582 cording to which I, a man, call the sisters of my father-in-law
614 mother (ymk), while my father calls them his wives, at the same time that my wife and the wives of my brothers, both own and agnate, call one another sister, can develop only under circumstances in which all my clansmen take their wives exclusively from one common clan, and furthermore in such a way that each generation of brothers of all degrees of kinship takes for wives a corresponding generation of women-sisters of all degrees of kinship. Then, in fact, the sisters of my father-in-law will be the wives of my father and of his brothers, and consequently, my mothers, while my wife and the wives of my brothers will be sisters to one another. Under such a system, marriages between persons of ascending and descending generations (uncles and nieces) are impossible.

But which clan is the one from which all my clansmen must necessarily take their wives? This is eloquently answered by that detail of the kinship nomenclature by which I and my clansmen of my generation, i.e., my brothers and cousins in the male line, call from birth our mothers' brothers' daughters our wives, and conversely, they call us their husbands. It is clear from this that the clan from which my mother came, i.e., the clan of her father and of her brothers, is that clan from which I and my clansmen (the mothers of the clansmen of my generation are the sisters of my mother) must necessarily and exclusively take our wives, and furthermore, as I have already said, from corresponding generations. If my father and his brothers took for their wives a group of sisters from a certain clan, then I and my brothers must marry the daughters of the brothers of this group of sisters from the same clan. But to exchange women, i.e., giving women to that clan from which my /37/ clan takes wives, is prohibited: all the women of

/37 cont./

174 my clan must, in turn, go to a third clan, whose ancestresses were 601 sisters of the male ancestors of my clan. In the kinship terminology 835 this limitation is clearly expressed in the fact that I do not call the 582 daughter of the sister of my father wife (an'gej), but simply 614 navkh, and she calls me, not husband (pu, ivn), but ytk, akhmal'k. Such was the type of the primitive structure of the family and clan, reconstructed a priori from the kinship nomenclature. I did not, however, arrive at my conclusions a priori.

In spite of all the unfavorable conditions indicated by me 582 which relaxed the exclusiveness of marriage within a particular 601 clan, the old principle continues to be dominant up to the present
614 day. Upon first acquaintance with the way of life of the Gilyak, not yet knowing their kinship nomenclature in detail, I was impressed by the persistent tendency of each clan to take wives predominantly from one particular clan, namely, from the clan of one's mother. P'fand'ukh umgu genedzh urdzhra -- "You must take your wives there from whence you came, i.e., from the clan of your mother" (1); thus the Gilyak taught me their matrimonial

192 1. The etymology of the word p'fand'ukh is interesting; it is composed of pi (ones own, yours), pandf (kinsmen of the mother), and ukh (from). The word pandf is from pandynd -- "to be born."

835 wisdom. Although now it is permitted to take wives not from the clan of one's mother, the terminology has imprinted an old prohibition on this group of women: brides not from the clan of the mother bear the name yokh, i.e., a woman with whom sexual intercourse is prohibited (thus, for example, elder brothers, for whom sexual intercourse with the wives of the younger ones is prohibited, call the latter yokh), while a bride from one's mother's clan is called an'gej (wife, any woman with whom sexual inter-582 course is permitted). Indeed, the favorite form of marriage among 601 the Gilyak even now is marriage to a daughter of a brother, own (preferably) or agnate, of the mother, but in any case a kinsman -- "brother" of the latter. On the other hand, marriage with a

/37 cont./

582 daughter of the father's sister is not permitted. In the predile 601 shown by the Gilyak for such a marriage, the almost religious reverential attitude toward a custom which at one time was i dubitably a universally binding, religio-social requirement is 582 perceptible. Every woman, as soon as she bears a son, appro 584 her brother, if he has a daughter, with a request for the engag ment of their children. The ceremony of engagement consist the binding of the arm of the bride with a piece of dog hair b child-groom or by his father (a symbol of being carried away dogs and also an echo of the totem /38/ cult of the dog). W bride reaches five or six years of age, often even earlier, she to the home of the groom, with whom she grows up and is edu until she enters the period of maturity, when, without any rit
582 she in fact becomes his wife. The degree to which the princi compulsory marriage exclusively with women from the clan o
614 one's mother is still strong may be seen from the fact that, if one clansman of the clan, let us say, A, took his wife from t completely alien clan, D, that is quite sufficient for all the women of the first clan to become forbidden to clan D, becau the fact, even though unique, of the moving of women from D into A makes the first (D) the clan of the mother, into whic marriage of women from clan A is forbidden. In this case, h ever, "numbers" may testify most eloquently. During the ce
125 that I made specifically for the study of the structure of the G 601 family and clan, I was impressed from the very first days by t abundance of married (i.e., other-clan) women in each clan called each other "sister" and "aunt," and not only in name, who had actually been taken from one clan, namely, from th one from which the given clan had taken its women (the clan the mother") from ancient times.

582 If this regulation of marriage survives to such an extent
178 now, in spite of the obstacles mentioned by us that lay in its then without doubt it was originally universally accepted, and if all traces of it had disappeared in the contemporary custom sufficient proof of its existence remains in the kinship termino preserved up to the present in all its originality and recreating with extraordinary objectivity the old regime which gave rise

611

RULE OF DESCENT--unilinear rules (e.g., matrilineal, patrilineal); ambil descent (i.e., in each successive generation descent is traced through eithe parent); bilateral descent (i.e., absence of unilinear emphasis); double de (i.e., concurrent matrilineal and patrilineal descent); anomalous rules (e. linked descent); special exceptions (e.g., ambil-anak or matrilineal descen one generation in default of direct male heirs); degree of correspondence o gence between the rule of descent and the recognition of kinship; evidences former or recent transitions in the rule of descent; etc. See also:

Descent of children in marriages between persons of different castes or social classes . . 56
Rules of succession to authority in the family or household 59
Inheritance rules 428
Allocation of the children of divorced parents . . 586
Rules of residence . . . . . .
Succession to chiefship in the community . . . .
Succession to executive positions in the state . . 63
Theory of paternity . . . . . .
Social placement of infants . . . . . .

601 /191 cont./
174 the natural key to the /192/ restoration of the Gilyak system
[58] of marriage in its pure primitive aspect.
[178] But what does the kinship terminology teach us?

First of all, we see that the Gilyak kinship terminology does not have special terms for relationships by marriage, which are absolutely identical with the terms of blood (cognate) kinship. In Gilyak, kinsmen by marriage are
[602] called pandf, i.e., people of a common origin, cognates,
[611] for a man, from the side of the mother, for women -- from the side of the father. The father of the wife is the brother of the mother; the mother of the husband is the sister of the father; the husband is the son of the father's sister; the wife is the daughter of the mother's brother, etc.

It is clear that such a terminology could develop only under conditions where marriages had to be made exclusively with blood kinsmen through the father or through the mother. This was first. In what form these marriages were accomplished is shown to us by other kinship terms.

614 Within each clan, as we have seen, in each generation
601 the wives of tuvn, that is, the wives of own and collateral
582 brothers, call each other sisters, and their mothers-in-law, that 174 is the mothers of all these tuvn, they call aunts (sisters of the father), and, conversely, these latter call them nieces; on the other hand, every male calls the sister of his father-in-law his mother. From this it is clear that 1) the wives of all the members of the clan are necessarily kinswomen taken from one clan, in other words, each clan takes wives for itself exclusively from one common clan, with marriage outside of this clan being impossible; 2) under these conditions, marriage is regulated by generations, i.e., in each generation the clansmen-"brothers" take from a clan which is obligatory for marriage a corresponding generation of "sisters," the nieces of those women whom the generation of their "fathers" married, and their descendents, in turn, take the following generation of "sisters," the nieces of their mothers, etc. This is why the wives of "brothers" call each other

/265 cont./
602 preserved in the form of remnants even among peoples who 604 by now have shifted to paternity, for example, the peoples
171 of the Caucasus, where a tribesman has the right to steal his uncle's horse, if the latter refuses to give it as a gift. Among the Altaians the saying that "a tribesman is worse than seven wolves" has been preserved to this day.

584 Moreover, the role of the brother in giving his sister in 593 marriage is quite characteristic. In many cases, it is not the father, but the brother who plays the main role in this affair; the agreement to the marriage depends on him, and the bride price is handed over to him.

194 Not a few other extremely indicative traces which may 196 be considered remnants of maternality have been preserved
591 in the language and customs. Thus, if a Gilyak wishes to say 171 that he is married, that he has a wife at home, he says: n'i-umgarvo ivrà, literally "I have a wife's village" (n'i -- I, umgar -- wife's, vo -- village, ivra -- there is), an expression completely corresponding to the present-day way of life of the Ainu, among whom to this day maternality has been preserved, and often husband and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then he returns to his own settlement, so that a man has, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

194 Another example: the term for designating a person's 611 origin is the expression pandos', literally "root of birth."
614 This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally 186 be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, nor the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her female ancestors. No matter how distant such a settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and more than once my /266/ Gilyak companions during the time of my travels amazed me by the tenderness and reverence with which they approached a settlement where, according to them, one of their female ancestors had once lived.

/266 cont./

174 611 614 186

In several places to this day, to a question about origin, the Gilyak point to the places from where their mothers and wives came. For example, in the settlement of Nyyvo at the mouth of the Tym' river on the eastern coast of Sakhalin, they reply to the question about the origin of the inhabitants of that settlement, "We are Nyurskie," i.e., come from the settlement of Nyur, which is on the northernmost tip of Sakhalin, and, when I asked for an explanation of this strange answer, it was explained to me: "Because we take wives from Nyur."

Thus, these people reckoned their origin according to the place of the homeland of their mothers, for, as we saw above, the wives of the Gilyak are taken predominantly from the clan of the mother. I shall introduce still another interesting remnant.

553 184 614 611

Usually at the present time children are given names according to the clansmen of the father. Such is the general rule, but there are still places (for example, the settlement of Nanivo on the west shore) where they give names according to the brothers and clansmen of the mother; thus, it is as though the children were members of the mother's clan.

602 611 174 [582] [614]

All these are remnants which are entirely out of line with the agnate organization of the contemporary Gilyak clan, but they are remnants which are intimately bound up with the present-day psychology of the Gilyak. For the Gilyak themselves they are not remnants; this is made clear mainly by the marriage norms, according to which spouses are cousins, the children of brother and sister, and the members of each clan preferably take wives from one and the same clan, so that the psychologies of paternity and of maternality cross each other, and in the main between male and female lines there does not exist that gulf which is present in those agnate organizations where the Gilyak norms of marriage are not in effect.

614

614 SIBS--presence of unilinear kin groups of traditional, but not actually traceable, common descent; number and distribution; affiliation (e.g., matrilineal, patrilineal); regulation of marriage (e.g., exogamy, agamy, endogamy); distinguishing characteristics (e.g., names, insignia, totemism, food taboos); origin and traditions; organization; headship and succession; prerogatives and obligations of members; solidarity and group responsibility; common property and cult; relationship to clans; unilinear kin groups intermediate between sibs and phratries; relations between sibs; etc. See also:

Property 42
Mutual aid 476
Marriage restrictions 582
Blood vengeance 828
Totemism 779
Taboos 784

1: Shternberg

614

/For general information on the Gilya interclan relationships, see category 116,

RX2 Gilyak RX2

k clan (sib), its role and function in the society and
pp. 130-193 and 299-316./

/40 cont./

582 595 614 daughters while his sister has only one or two sons, or that a long interval of time elapses between the birth of the first son and the ones that follow, or that, which even further complicates the question, several sisters have but one brother or one sister has several brothers: in the first case several brothers have a common wife; in the second, either one possesses several sisters, or two brothers live in common marriage with a group of sisters; in the third case, the younger brother, who reaches puberty when the elder brother has managed to take all his cousins, must of necessity have marital rights to the wives of his elder brothers; finally, in the last two cases, either several first cousins will have as common wives the daughters of the brother of their mothers, or several brothers will have as common wives several of their first cousins. We have given only the simplest cases; in reality, the matter is, of course, much more complicated. Thus, in one way or another, there absolutely inevitably arises a group marriage of brothers (own and further) with a group of sisters (own and further), and in any case the unconditional reciprocal conjugal rights of brothers of all degrees of kinship. Of course, these group rights consequently embraced more and more people of more distant degrees of kinship, for a mother did not always have brothers, or the latter daughters, and it was inevitably necessary to take wives from among the /41/ first, second, etc. cousins of the mother, and hence the union of people united by the common rights of a group marriage grew.

No vicissitudes of tribal life destroyed this group principle, even up to the present time. When in the course of time, as a result of depopulations, the dispersion of kindred families, wars, and other such reasons, there arose the necessity of resorting to marriages from alien families, these customs, inconvenient in themselves, led to the situation that we see at the present time, that a man is the officially recognized husband of one or several women and is required to share this right either with all his brothers (in some clans) or (in others) only with the younger ones, and, moreover, not only with his own, but with all the agnate brothers as well.

/41 cont./

582 614 3) Since in every family sons must marry daughters of a brother of their mother, and daughters -- sons of a sister of their father, it follows that from the time of the establishment of this custom all the descending posterity of each pair of ancestors in all lines eo ipso form a closed group, prohibited from one another maritally, an exogamous organism, a clan, and, depending on whether the men go into the clan of the wife or remain in their own, either a maternal or paternal clan prevails.

At the present time, among the Gilyak a paternal, agnatic clan has been established.

4) Such a clan rests not only on the negative tie of exogamy, but also on valuable positive bonds, on the common rights of clansmen to the women of the blood clan of their ancestress, the mutual rights of group marriage, and, finally, on the obligation to save their women for the clan that took the sisters of their ancestor.

If we take into consideration the fact that marriage regulations among primitive peoples, among whom the cult of the ancestors and, consequently, blood ties play such a tremendous role, become religious imperatives, it will become clear that the clearly indicated mutual rights and obligations cement the clan union.

In particular, the important cementing element of a clan is also the fact that all the women coming in (wives of clansmen) are taken from one clan and are either one another's sisters (own and agnate), or aunts and nieces. As for men, the clansmen, they represent in each generation a group of brothers (own and agnate) married to a group of sisters and cousins from the clan of their mothers, i.e., to their first cousins, /42/ in relation to whom they have reciprocal conjugal rights.

We have already spoken about the effects that these customs have on the kinship nomenclature.

614 615 5) The clan, therefore, is not a self-contained organism. The existence of each clan is organically bound up with the existence of at least two clans, blood kindred with it, one the blood clan of its ancestress, from which it takes its wives, and another clan which took the sisters of its ancestor and to which it must give up its own women.

/42 cont./

615 614 The first of the latter two clans in relation to the third bears the name akhmal'k (father-in-law), the second navkh or ymri (son-in-law /zyat', "son-in-law, brother-in-law"/). All three are pandf (cognates) to one another. Thus, every Gilyak is an organic member not only of his own, but of a tri-partite, blood, tri-clan union, forming, in the literal sense of the word, a phratry (1) (phratry -- brotherhood). In this triple "brotherhood"

[582 114]

1. The Gilyak phratry has nothing in common with the one of Morgan, for within it mutual marriages are not only allowed, but were obligatory.

all the men and women of each generation are actually brothers and sisters (cognate male cousins and female cousins, see below).

Specifically, in relation to each member of a given clan each woman of the second clan is either his mother, his wife or the wife of his sons and agnatic nephews, and conversely, in the third clan, every woman is either his sister, daughter, or a sister of his father. Such are the blood ties of the members of a phratry!

One can get an idea of the form of the Gilyak three-clan phratry from the following schematic table:

Clan A (Andreev)	Clan V (Vasil'ev)	Clan S (Stepanov)
Andrei + Varvara (sister of Vasilii from clan V). Their children:	Vasilii + Sof'ia (sister of Stepan from clan S). Their children:	Stepan + Anna (sister of Andrei from clan A). Their children:
1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Vasilii, from clan V.	1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Stepan, from clan S.	1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Andrei, from clan A.
2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Anna, from clan S.	2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Varvara, from clan A.	2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Sof'ia, from clan V.

/43/

615 614 Analyzing this table, we see that 1) all the women in clan A have been taken, by generations, from clan V, which means that Andrei's mother is a sister of Vasilii's father, and consequently Andrei and Vasilii are cognate cousins. 2) Similarly in clan V, Vasilii's mother is a sister of Stepan's father from clan S, and consequently Vasilii and Stepan are cognate cousins, and 3) in clan S Stepan's mother is the sister of Andrei's father from clan A, and consequently Stepan and Andrei are cognate cousins.

Thus, not only are each pair of spouses, one to the other, male and female cognate cousins, but the ancestors of each clan are, one to the other, cognate cousins. In a word, the founders of all three clans are close, blood kinsmen married to female cognates of the same degree of kinship, and each generation marries cognates of the same degree of kinship as its fathers and mothers. This is a clear example of how weak the terms exogamous and endogamous are: the exogamy of the Gilyak clan does not exclude marriages between close kinsmen. It turns out that endogamy prevailed within each phratry; each of its branches was exogamous.

615 614 198 Such was the original scheme. Time and circumstances, emigration, depopulation, the dispersion of clans, an accidental scarcity of women in the mother's clan, and other such causes naturally led, on the one hand, to a deviation from this system, and, on the other hand, to corrections, whose aim was to reconcile the old norms with the new demands of life. All these superstructures, if I may express myself thus, have quite confused the genealogical systems and the marriage norms, and, as usually happens, the categorical imperative, weakening in one respect, becomes more widespread in another. Due to external conditions, the rule to take one's wife from the clan of one's mother weakened, but, on the other hand, the prohibition against giving wives to that clan (albeit completely alien from which someone, even a most remote clansman of the given clan, took his wife has received the most widespread interpretation (on the presumption that it is the clan of the mother). From this the following has become established:

/43 cont./

614 Since at the present time it is not always possible for all 615 clansmen to take their wives from one clan, the clan of the 178 mother, certain members of some clan (M, for example) are required to take their wives from different clans. And so, on the strength of the old presumption that the clan of the wife of a clansman is the clan of the mother, all these clans for several generations become prohibited for all the women of clan M, for whom marriage into these clans is not allowed.
And this is not all. This prohibition, in essence having lost its former raison d'être, is applied not only /44/ to that clan
M, which takes wives directly from A, but also to a third clan,
N, which, in turn, takes wives from M.

In the Gilyak terminology of marriage this prohibition is technically expressed thus. Clan A, giving women to clan M, is called the akhmal'k (father-in-law) of the latter, while in relation to clan N, which in turn takes wives from clan M, it -- i.e., clan A, is called tuyma akhmal'k (distant father-in-law); and so the prohibitions lying on clan M are carried over to clan N, i.e., clan A may not take women not only from M, but also from N. The degrees of prohibition, however, do not extend beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree.

The entire future evolution of the Gilyak family and clan lies in the history of the origin of this prohibition. In what way could this widespread prohibition arise? We saw that the Gilyak were not afraid of marriages within close degrees of kinship. This means that the reason must be some other one.
As a matter of fact, in the face of the inevitability of cases when it was impossible to take wives from the clan of the mother, the Gilyak, conforming to the religious imperative, should have, in such cases, considered the most suitable clan that one from which at least the clan of his mother took wives, and, if unable to take them from it, he went to that clan from which this latter took wives, i.e., went by degrees to the akhmal'ki of distant degrees of kinship, just as, within the clan of the mother, in the absence of daughters in the family of the mother's own brother, he went to the daughters of the first, second, etc, cousins of the mother. Thus, the distant akhmal'ki clans were, as it were, reserve clans of the

/44 cont./

614 mother, but it is natural that practically it was inconvenient to 615 extend the prohibitions to the akhmal'ki of all degrees of kin-178 ship, and it was rarely necessary to go beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree, to which the prohibition was limited. But with the appearance of this prohibition, the tri-clan phratry ceased to satisfy the new conditions of the regulation. Exclusive marriage within three clans became impossible, because in a tri-clan phratry (see the table) clan S is the akhmal'k of the first degree for V and of the second degree for A; consisequently, the women of clan A cannot marry into clan S. It was necessary to add to the phratry a fourth clan, D (Dmitri, Dar'ya), let us say. The changes that occurred in our phratry consisted in the fact that Stepan's wife (clan S) would be now Dmitri's (clan D) sister, while the latter would have as his wife a sister of Andrei (clan A). Since in more distant times, the prohibitions undoubtedly spread to the akhmal'ki of more distant degrees, the phratries naturally /45/ had to consist of an ever greater number of clans. At the present time, when, due to the reasons mentioned above, it is necessary in the selection of wives to resort to completely alien clans, the phratry has naturally lost its former, strictly closed position.

It is not hard to imagine how much genealogical information one must have with regard to this complicated, confused system, in order to correctly decide, in each given case, on the right to marry of some member of a clan. And, actually, this constitutes a whole science, to which a Gilyak dedicates himself from his earliest childhood.

IV.

Some Conclusions from the Norms of Gilyak Marriage

171 I have already said that Gilyak kinship nomenclature and 601 their norms of marriage in general do not represent an isolated 582 case. An analogous nomenclature and analogous phenomena of group marriage are found among a mass of primitive peoples in the most remote parts of the world. But the details that I

/45 cont./

174 But the details that I 582 have attempted to clarify here and the history of the develop-601 ment of the institution which I sketched are capable, I think, of shedding light on certain phenomena of primitive marriage which heretofore have been completely isolated and separate.

1) First of all, the clan organization of the Gilyak makes 171 completely clear to us why among many peoples, as, for ex-174 ample, among the Batak on Sumatra, a wife or a mistress is 582 called "a son of the father's sister" -- ibibere-ri-datangi or 614 among the Gond (Gondy) of the province of Satpūras in central India where a marriage between male cousins and female cousins is almost compulsory when the brother has a daughter and the sister a son. These separate facts remained unexplained up to now and are, therefore, perhaps fragments of a once common clan organization similar to the one that I found among the Gilyak (1).

[114] 1. It is remarkable that up to the present time some scientists are skeptical of even the actual fact of the discovery of marriage norms identical with those of the Gilyak. Thus, quite recently it was discovered that among the Hottentot marriage is permitted between a man and the daughter of his mother's brother and, conversely, is forbidden between a woman and a son of her mother's brother (exactly as among the Gilyak). While Kohler, presenting this fact, and the author of the article on Kohler's work in Année Sociologique both doubt the possibility of such norms, even though they were known to McLennan. See J. Kohler,
"Das Recht der Hottentots," in Zeitschrift f. vergleich. Rechtswissenschaft. Vol. XVI. No. 3. pp. 341-342.
and L'Année Sociologique. 11th year. p. 306.

/46/

171 2) The norms of Gilyak marriage explain to us further the 582 strange institution among the Dieri tribe in Australia, where a [125] great council of the tribe, at appointed periods solemnly declares which men and women of the tribe have the right to group cohabitation.

From what we have said above about the intricacy and difficulty of determining the genealogical rights in matrimonial questions among the Gilyak, questions which for primitive man have an extremely serious religious significance, it is clear that there would gradually have to develop a rule whereby the decisions on these questions ceased to be a matter for the individual person and became the function of a competent institution of elders and specialists on genealogy and marriage law.

3) The Gilyak system of marriage explains to us why among many Australian tribes the women in each clan belong to a single [614] totem. In fact, as among the Gilyak, all the women coming in must be taken from a single clan, i.e., they are of a single totem.

4) This same system explains to us why, mutatis mutandis, every kumi and kroki among the Australians finds his wife throughout the territory of the distribution of his tribe; in reality he finds her only in that clan from which his clan must take its wives and in which every woman of the corresponding generation is his wife.

5) It explains to us the strange class system among many Australian peoples, for example, among the Kamilaroi, where ascending and descending generations belong to different classes, and only in the third, among some -- in the fourth, or even in the fifth -- sixth generation, do they return to the class of the fathers.

The Gilyak norms, in spite of all the difference in details from those among the Australians, satisfactorily explain this strange phenomenon.

615 Let us recall again the tri-clan phratry and for clarity call 614 clan A -- Andreev, clan V -- Vasil'ev, and clan S -- Stepanov.
582 Consistent with the Gilyak norms, Varvara's daughter from clan A is from birth considered the wife of one of the Stepanovs (of clan S), and, consequently, her sobriquet will be not Andreeva

/46 cont./

615 but Stepanova; her daughter (a granddaughter of Varvara's), in 614 turn, from birth, as the wife of one of the Vasil'evs (of clan V)
582 would be called Vasil'eva, but, the daughter of this last, i.e., Varvara's great-granddaughter, would have to be the wife of one of the Andreevs (of clan A) /47/ and thus, in the third generation, she would again bear the class sobriquet of her great-grandmother.

582 6) As we have seen, Gilyak marriage to a considerable ex-[601] tent simplifies our understanding of the complicated kinship nomenclature, for in the Gilyak system of marriage many categories of the Turanian system of kinship, which at first sight appear completely independent, are in fact identical, such as, for example, wives of brothers, sisters of the wife, and sisters of the wives of brothers tum out to be the same persons, just like mothers, wives of the father's brothers, sisters of the father-in-law, sisters of the mother, etc.

But these are all facts of a secondary character. It seems to me that the scheme of Gilyak marriage can shed light on certain basic questions about primitive marriage.

1) From an analysis of the norms of Gilyak marriage, we have seen that from the simple, single rule that men must marry daughters of their mother's brother, there inevitably arise by natural necessity such complex institutions as group marriage, the clan, the phratry, and finally marriage prohibitions.

2) An analysis of the Gilyak regulations sheds light on the 583 genesis of the institution of abduction in general and in particu-
614 lar, on the strange institution of mock abduction, an institution
615 which is practiced among such primitive peoples as the Aus-
[171] tralians and the Eskimo, and, furthermore, in such strange forms that it is quite impossible to consider it a simple remnant of actual abduction, as is normally thought. Let us recall again our tri-clan phratry with its norms of marriage. Clan A must take wives from clan V and give up its women to clan S. We shall remember that in the primitive stages of development such obligations are religious imperatives, the violation of

/47 cont./

174 which brings the punishment of the gods. Now let us suppose that 583 clan V, from which A takes wives, has died out, or that there are 614 too few women in it, which is quite in the order of things. Clan 615 A cannot take wives in other phratries, for there each clan saves its women for the clan of the father's sister; the alien clan, even if it had extra women, cannot decide to deviate from this imperative for fear of bringing on itself the punishment of the gods, of the ancestors, for such marriages with those of other blood constitute the greatest of insults. And a similar vengeance threatens the clan who would make use of women of other blood. Marriage is indispensable, however. Two alternatives then remain: either to abduct a woman by force, risking bringing on oneself the vengeance of the gods /48/ to say nothing of the vengeance of the clan of the one stolen, or to circumvent the law, deceiving the gods about the real intentions of one's actions, i.e., a voluntary agreement is reached with the parents of the bride and with her herself, whereby these latter appear to resist the abduction with all their strength, while the bridegroom, in the most conscientious manner, does everything required to give to the marriage act the look of real coercion.

171 Only with such an explanation of abduction can we under-
174 stand why, for example, the Australian kumai, having allowed 583 their daughter to run away with her loved one, set out in pursuit after her and, having caught her, pierce her leg with a spear and beat her half to death. The Australians themselves explain this, not as animosity, but as custom.

This, however, is not all. Among many tribes the bridegroom himself considers it his duty to beat his loved one no less cruelly than her parents; by this he desires to show the gods, and the gods-ancestors in particular, that the capture of the girl was in no way caused by a desire on his part to marry her.

Finally, only with this illumination on the hypothesis of the religious origin of the custom can we explain such a universal occurrence of the institution, which, in the form of mock abduction, is practiced in the marriage ceremony of even civilized peoples.

/48 cont./

174 This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-583 in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also ex-
614 plains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not 615 from the clan of his mother by the term ioth /iot; ioe yoth on 606 p. 76/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

174 Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price.
583 The custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin 614 against the clan of the one stolen, a sin which demands atone-615 ment, by force or by a material fine from the abducter. Among [682] the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third gen-[682] eration inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin, [192] as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tihuind, among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps 174 somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently 583 happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan.
The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the supentitious spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

771 In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/54 cont./

825 The Gilyak never directs his harpoon at a koatka, and
(662) when its dead body is thrown up on the shore, they solemnly bury it in a balagan especially built for this and decorate it with "inau." It is not only these large beasts (the bear and the koatka) that the Gilyak regards with a feeling of religion. however. Sign of the deepest respect are shown toward any animal that falls prey to the Gilyak. The heads of captured seals are decorated with "inau" and solemnly lowered into the sea.
The heads of belugas are put out on poles on the seashore. and likewise the heads of other animals.

The animals whom the Gilyak worship, however, are not 826 independent gods and even deities in general; they are merely the subordinates of the real deities. the "masters" of this or that element. this or that animal. These "masters" in their form and likeness are those same Gilyak who. according to need assume the form of this or that animal. These gods live in the forests. the mountains. and on the bottom of the seas and lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak themselves. have wives children and relatives. like the Gilyak.
they are mortal. For each of the elements one of these gods.
"yg" - master. is in command. It is these masters who send the Gilyak all that he needs each season: sables. bears. salmon.
seals. The notions about these "masters" of each element 825 however. should not be understood in a strictly monistic sense.
826 It is just the same among the Gilyak: in each locality there are simply rich people and among them one kind that is richest just as. in addition to the great gods-masters. every territory. every stream. each has its own "master" who takes care of those Gilyak closest to him (see below on the clan gods).
● (614) The term "master" is strictly an everyday term. /55/ In each clan every man who is outstanding for his intelligence. courage.
and cunning. and consequently richest is called "yg" (master).
and the most outstanding of them is the leader of the clan.

/57 cont./

823 the women rushed to their storehouse to fetch the precious buda
(662) reserved for sacrifices. in order to feed me and my companions 782 and thereby fulfill the will of the Head of the earth. Thus.
thanks to the piece of candy. I. in the opinion of the Gilyak.
not only saved my life. but unexpectedly obtained for the companions and myself a dish which we had not seen for a long time.

782 The Gilyak also has live sacrifices. the objects of which are dogs. A dog is killed. by strangulation. before the season of sable hunting. during the bear festival. before departure for a long journey. during sickness. and generally on the solemn occasions of life. Before it is killed. it is fed. and at that time.
depending upon the circumstances. it is given one or another 796 mission. Thus. during the bear festival. the dog will be told:
"Follow your bear to the highest mountain. May the master love you. Change this hair and come down next year as a bear (155) so that I may see you." When a dog is killed on the occasion of sickness. it is asked to be the intercessor for the sick man before the god to which it is being sent.

Thus the victim is a simple envoy. whose soul. after its death. will reach the master who lives on the highest mountain.

795 Clan gods constitute a special category of gods. As a matter of fact. these gods play a most important role in the life of the Gilyak. and it is most often to them that a bear or drowned offers his sacrifices. In each element there is a clan god. The clan gods are of particular /58/ interest. because in this tribe we can most clearly trace the very genesis of this very common fact of primitive religion. Even among the Greeks and the Romans the worship of clan gods was a common phenomenon.
The clan gods of the Gilyak are not supernatural mythical be-795 ings. as among the Greeks and the Romans. but their very own clansmen who. for a variety of reasons. have entered the clan 795 of one or another god "master." A particularly fortunate com-796 bination of circumstances. if I may express myself thus. is required to attain such an honor. if. while hunting. a Gilyak was killed by a bear. if he fell prey to the waves on the water. if he was murdered or burned to death through his own carelessness.
if. according to the shaman's explanation. a woman died from

/58 cont./

795 a bear's love for her. etc. -- all such persons do not travel to
(614) the ordinary kingdom of the shades. but go over into the clan of
(662) the gods-masters who took a liking to them. of the mountain.
water. fire. etc. and then become the smallest "masters" and protect their people. In this way the clan pal'-nivukh'i -- forest people. tol'-nivukh'i -- sea people. etc. took form. It is to these gods-clansmen that the entire clan offers sacrifices.
These are not mythical gods. not the fictional heroes of the Greek clans. but actual people. authentically living in the 614 imagination of their worshipers. The genesis of the clan gods
614 of the Gilyak sheds light on another dark phenomenon of 825 primitive religions -- totemism. the worship of a certain class of animals honored as the clansmen and even as masters of their worshipers. In fact. as I said earlier. the master of each element and his clansmen. although they lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak. always appear in the presence of man in the form of this or that animal. This bear (people).
the beluga or koatka (sea people). so that the Gilyak as well.
having entered after his death the clan of this or that master.
also assumes the covering of this or that animal. Therefore.
this class of beasts that the chosen person entered is kinfred to the clan of the one chosen and therefore becomes its totem.
614 Since in almost every clan there are contemporaries or predecessors who fell in a battle with a bear or drowned in rivers or at sea. a system of separate totems for every clan could not develop among the Gilyak. Unfortunately I cannot consider this vast question in more detail here: I shall say only that the genesis of the clan gods among the Gilyak clearly shows that it is not totemism. i.e.. not the belief in descent from this or that /59/ kind of animal. that created the clan gods.
as is commonly thought. but. on the contrary. it is the clan gods who created totemism. As we shall see below. we cannot explain the prohibitions of the totemism against using the meat of the totems for food in any way other than the fear of killing some clansman who turned into a totem animal.
614 The religious system of the Gilyak provides many other 171 interesting facts for the explanation of the origin of totemism.

/59 cont./

● 614 as well as of the cult of ancestors. but I shall confine myself here. for the time being. to what has been said. all the more since the institution of totemism has not assumed the same sharply pronounced form among this tribe that it did among other. specifically totemistic tribes. for example. the Australians. the North American Indians. the ancient Egyptians. etc.

614 Sacrifices to the clan gods are offered periodically. All
782 sorts of delicacies of the Gilyak cuisine are prepared by each 796 family prior to the day of the festival. and they are placed 796 in particular vessels reserved especially for this occasion. On the next day the entire population of this clan sets out in boats or. in case of a disturbance on the sea. on foot in the taiga and stations itself on its clan plot of ground near its clan sign. The elder in the clan takes a handful from each dish and throws it. crying out at the same time. "Chibih!" i.e.
"This is for you!" After this the feasting. games. wrestling. and other such diversions begin. In the spring. with the appearance of the seals. the sacrifice for the "sea or river" man is arranged. consisting of the solemn killing of a seal into a hole in the ice. On the Amur these sacrifices are made from a boat immediately after the opening of the river; the boats are decorated with sacred shawls. and gay races in them are arranged.

796 The Gilyak have a great number of clan festivals. but 628 the most important of these is the so-called bear festival. This 614 festival plays a tremendous role in the social life of the Gilyak.
796 In fact. it is not overstatement to say that the Gilyak are
(614) clan arranging the festival takes on itself only the expenses and trouble of arranging the festival; the most important role is played by the outside clans invited to participate in it.
Since a year does not pass without such festivals occurring in one place or another. assembling representatives of many clans for a number of days. these occasions play the same role in the social intercourse of the Gilyak tribe as the Olympics and other games once played in Greece. The winter bear-festival is called a game (chibyf-lekhemd -- the bear game).

/60/

796 This festival has already been described many times.
621 and therefore I shall consider for the most part those features (769) that have not been noted before. First of all. it is remarkable that ordinarily the festival is generally celebrated in memory of a dead clansman. being a kind of funeral feast for the deceased. A very close kinsman of the deceased buys for money or catches for himself in the taiga a bear cub. which is brought solemnly and amidst cries of joy into the sacred the native village. Here a separate framework is built for it out of thick poles and spars and decorated in the corners with sacred items. The feeding of the cub is done. not by its specific master. but by the entire clan: One or another family in turn. takes the honored guest for the duration of the appointed time. cleans the framework. and in general takes care of it in every way. On appointed days the bear is taken from its cage for a walk. This is a great event in the life of the settlement. taking many hours and giving extraordinary pleasure to young and old. The procedure of getting the bear out of the cage is quite complicated. First of all. while the bear is asleep. the cage is carefully pushed through through the spaces between the poles though which end in quickly tightened nooses and are put on sticks. After this they take away a few links of the top part of the cage. providing the bear with the opportunity to stick its head out:
then they put a stick into its mouth. which it violently clenches with its teeth. and at this time they very tightly bind its mouth. After this. it is calmly pulled out of the cage. and an iron ring is put on it. clasping it at its neck.
Long things are attached to this ring on both sides. and several men hold fast to them. pulling them hard in opposite directions: they do not give the bear any opportunity to attack the surrounding people. Only then do they free it of its hobble and take it for a walk.

/61 cont./

796 The eve has finally arrived. This day is called Nar-vakhnku, (769) the day of the preparation of the inau. i.e.. sticks with sharpened ends. which play an important religious role in the festival. These sticks. of various forms and sizes. represent orators-intercessors. which. together with the slain bear will set out to go to the master of the taiga and remind him of the needs of the Gilyak. and will be his talismans as well. Each kind of inau is made in pairs: each pair is spouses. so that they will be happier. and so that they will propagate and multiply.
Some of the inau are ornamented on both ends. on the posts of the arena: some are attached to them at the bottom. While the 796 preparation of the inau takes place. the clan elder. together 614 with the master of the bear. and several clansmen ride out to greet the so-called nar'kh'i. These nar'kh'i are honored ● (614) guests to antiry. His graciousness goes so far that when a (182) guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vo-
mit. the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit.
It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting. dog races. games. fencing with sticks. and circle dancing are arranged.

796 All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspen-(60 G) log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and 275 times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka. which lifts
(659) the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's gues drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yester
the nar'kh'i got drunk two times." the master of a bear once boasted to me.

796 Finally the last day of the festival comes. the day of departure of the nar'kh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kind of viands prepared for their families and clansmen are place (782) on their sleds. At the last moment the nar'kh'i lead several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of hon to the bear's skull. In addition. as a present. they put a spea
a thong. and other such items next to the head of the anima or stuck into it. Again. in farewell. the nar'kh'i are lavishly

/65 cont./

796 On this day. however. no one is allowed to taste the prepar 614 bear meat. This takes place on the next day. which is calle the day of treating the nar'kh'i (nar'kh-arin-ku). «The nar'kh'i sat down ceremoniously along the plank bed. while host solemnly walks among the rows and distributes pieces of (576) bear meat. More gracious hosts feed their guests with their own hands. sticking into their mouths /66/ a huge piece of meat on the end of a piece. Having it to his neighbor to tast (782) what he has started. Only the nar'kh'i are allowed to eat be
(614) meat; and his clan are denied this right; they are allowed t eat only a soup of rice or buda with the fat from the bears' carcasses. This soup is prepared and consumed in enormous quantities.

796 It is considered the greatest honor for the host to feed his 621 guests to satiety. His graciousness goes so far that when a 576 guest who has eaten too much of the fatty soup begins to vo-
it. the host respectfully offers his mouth and drinks the vomit
It would be hard to imagine more refined graciousness. In intervals between feasting. dog races. games. fencing with sticks. and circle dancing are arranged.

All day the girls take turns playing music on the suspen-log and accompany their primitive music with humorous and times very frivolous songs. Not the least role in the feast is played by Russian vodka or Chinese grain vodka. which lifts
the gaiety of the feasters to its apogee. To make one's gues drunk is considered the greatest honor. "At my house yester
the nar'kh'i got drunk two times." the master of a bear once boasted to me.

Finally the last day of the festival comes. the day of departure of the nar'kh'i. Carcasses of bear meat and all kind of viands prepared for their families and clansmen are place their sleds. At the last moment the nar'kh'i lead several dogs into the yurt and tie them around the plank bed of hon
to the bear's skull. In addition. as a present. they put a spea
a thong. and other such items next to the head of the anima or stuck into it. Again. in farewell. the nar'kh'i are lavishly

/38 cont./

82 78 It is not difficult to understand even the raison d'être of this institution which at first glance is strange and confusing.

82 14 Such a binding regulation of marriage conformed as much as possible to both the basic principles of the clan and the individual feelings of the separate heads of families. The clan, at its base, rests on the principle of blood unity. In an agnatic clan this unity will most ideally be attained if all the wives of the agnates are taken from one clan close in blood and, of course, from the clan of their ancestress. This not only satisfies the formal principle of the unity of blood, but confirms the unity of the cult of the ancestors in both lines, so important in the eyes of primitive man.

If we now turn our attention to the psychology of the individual members of the clan, it /39/ fully coincides with the clan where the sons, in accordance with the general rule, remain within the clan and take their wives from outside, it is natural that every mother prefers to have as a wife for her son a woman very close to her by blood and furthermore to assemble within her family women from that clan from which she herself comes. She cannot, however, marry her son to the daughter of her sister, for her sister is either a wife of her husband or of his brothers, and consequently the daughter of the latter is either an own sister or an agnate of her son; all that remains is to marry him to a daughter of her brother, as has become established in reality. For the entire aggregate of the women of a clan it is of tremendous interest that they are all of a common origin and feel behind them the solid protection of the whole clan from which they come.

Such a marriage (of a son to the daughter of his mother's brother is equally in the interests of the father, who thus marries his son to a kinswoman (praplemyanitsa) of his mother. Since the sister of the husband also desires, in turn, to marry her sons to the daughters of her brother, a mother cannot marry her daughters to the sons of her brother, and, thus, an exchange marriage, i.e., an exchange of women, between two such families was impossible, just like a marriage within a family.

/39 cont./

582 614 So far we have considered, as it were, the statics of the question; now let us turn to its dynamics. Let us see how from some very simple beginning, with inevitable necessity, as a mighty tree develops from a single seed, the controversial, confusing fabric of the Gilyak marriage and clan grew up.

The essence of the entire complex system of regulation of Gilyak marriage and the clan, and furthermore the key to understanding it, is a unique fact, namely, the principle established in its day that men must marry the daughters of their mother's brother, in other words, the daughters in each family belong from birth to the sons of their father's sister. We have already said something about the motives that could have given rise to this principle. In any case, its universal incumbency was guaranteed, no doubt, as the categorical imperative of the primitive religion.

This simple rule leads logically to the following:

1) Once every mother has the right to take for her sons the daughters of her brother, her daughters by the same right absolutely must enter the family of her husband's sister, in other words, /40/ every woman belongs to her first cousins, the sons of her father's sister. Therefore, a woman cannot marry the sons of her mother's brother, and a man cannot marry the daughters of a sister of his father: they cannot exchange the women of the family of a brother and of a sister. It is clear that this prohibition does not have anything to do with a fear of marriages within close degrees of kinship, because the daughter of the sister of my father is related to me in the same degree of kinship as the daughter of the brother of my mother, whereas marriage is prohibited with the first and obligatory with the second, a fact that is extremely important for the genesis of prohibitions within close degrees of kinship.

582 614 595 2) Once marriages between the daughters of a brother and the sons of a sister are obligatory, once the former necessarily belong to the latter, certain situations naturally arise in view of the normal quantitative inequality between persons of different sexes, in view of such possibilities, for example, as that a brother has one daughter while his sister has several sons, or, conversely, the brother has several

/71 cont./

796 or the female line; the only kinsmen allowed to kill are the ●614 "zyat'ya" /sons-in-law, brothers-in-law/, i.e., persons married to women from this clan, persons whose blood was 796 never mixed with the celebrating clan. In the second place, 614 the entire carcass of the bear, with the exception of the meat 262 of the head, is given to a different clan, the clan of "narkh'i" and, on the other hand, forbidden to the clan to whom the bear belongs. Once perhaps even the head was also prohibited for the celebrating clan. Are these prohibitions not caused by the totemistic caution against killing and eating the body of a clansman? After all, could not the slain bear accidently turn out to be a clansman of the mountain-man clan and therefore a clansman of those who are celebrating the holiday?
In such a case killing him and eating his meat would be criminal and fatal for the given clan.

But for a different clan, i.e., the clan of the "narkh'i" this is permitted, because /72/ another "master" sends bears to it, its own clansman, so that it is completely safe for them to eat the meat of the bear of an alien clan.

614 The coexistence of such norms as, on one hand, the 262 permission to kill a bear, though not personally, and to eat its head and, on the other hand, the prohibition against the 171 rest of the meat may seem a strange and irresolvable contradiction. Among totemistic tribes, however, we often meet such contradictions. The Samoans, for example, on solemn occasions kill owls and honor them as their deified ancestors, while at the same time they do not dare to touch the meat.
In the works by Spencer and Gillen we read that among the tribes of central Australia, among whom it is normally prohibited, for example, to kill kangeroos and to use them for food, on a certain solemn day two or three of the forbidden animals are killed, and pieces of the meat are distributed among the clansmen. There are many such examples.

/130 cont./

58 agnates, the father or her brothers; she makes her permanent [591] residence in his home, follows him in his journeyings and emi-grations, and before all the world is considered the personal wife of the Gilyak who purchased her and the mother of his 59 children. The children belong exclusively to the father and [85] succeed him after his death. After the birth of the first child, husband and wife cease to call themselves by their former [551] names and begin to be called by the name of the newborn [553] ("the father of so-and-so, the mother of so-and-so" -- teknonymy). The exclusive rights of the husband to his wives [684] apparently are sanctioned by the right of retribution, even bloody retribution, upon the infringer on his conjugal rights.
●[614] The clan is based on the principle of agnation, exogamous marriage. One can travel over the whole territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, long observe their family life, and note nothing extraordinary. In the large winter yurts, the inhabitants occupy their places by families, each living with regard to its own particular interests. Between husband and wife or wives and their children, harmony and tender /131/relations prevail. Cases of a striking attachment between spouses are not infrequent; when one of them dies, the other sometimes lays hands on himself or dies of grief.

In a word, to all appearances we are dealing here with a *601 type of individual family which is generally accepted as being 121 patriarchal and in any case not polyandrous. Such were my 125 own personal impressions at first. But my first inquiries in the [59] realm of kinship nomenclature awoke serious doubts in me, and I therefore determined first of all to make a detailed study of this aspect of their relations. The study of the kinship nomenclature, it appeared to me, could be most successfully accomplished by a systematic census of the population. With [114] this objective, I undertook during the winter of 1891 my first census of the Gilyak villages on the western shore of northern Sakhalin, and as a result I discovered their complex classificatory system of kinship and their peculiar form of group marriage (1).

[113] 1. At the time the account of this was

/135 cont./

*601 or the differences are of an insignificant phonetic character.
184 Thus, for example, "ytk, ymk" -- father, mother -- are 197 completely identical in all dialects; "ruvn, tuvn" -- brother (eastern dialect) are slightly changed to "ruf" in the western dialect; "og:la, og:lang" in the Tym' and the eastern dialect of Sakhalin are equivalent to "o:la" in the western dialect. In cases where the terms are completely different phonetically, this is due either to borrowing from very near neighbors, as in the previously mentioned "app" and "ivy," or to the formation of corresponding terms from different synonyms common to all dialects. Thus, for example, "shankh" -- woman in the eastern dialect has been formed from the common word "an kh" -- female, and "um-gu" -- woman in /136/ the western dialect has the same root as the common word "ym(k)" -- mother; in exactly the same way "ut-ku" -- man in the western dialect has the same root as "ytk" -- (father), and the corresponding az'nych in the eastern dialect is from azh -- male, etc.

[104] In the table of kinship nomenclature and the explanations for it, we shall give the terms according to dialects and territories, indicating in parenthesis the dialect of the Amur with the abbreviation (A.D.), the dialect of the Tym' -- (T.D.), the dialect of the eastern shore of Sakhalin --(E.D.), and of the western (W.D.). From here on in the text we shall always use the first of the synonyms of the eastern dialect.

Now we proceed to the explanation proper of the kinship
*601 terminology. We only forewarn the reader that the Gilyak ●614 reckon kinship through the male line and that the agnatic 104 family is only a cell of the strictly organized, exogamous, [611] agnatic clan. We also ask the reader to remember that at the mention of this or that term without any special indication of whether it is used by males or females we shall imply that these terms are used identically by both sexes; in other cases the sex of the speaker will be specifically indicated.

/136 cont./

●614 Forms of kinship. According to the basic structure of Gilyak 602 marriage law, relationship by marriage must coincide with kinship. The Gilyak distinguish two main categories of kinship, which may be called: agnate kinship and cognate kinship. The first embraces all persons bound together by a common origin from one forefather, that is, all individuals born or adopted into one or another clan. Upon marriage, women pass into the clan of their husbands. There are two kinds of cognate kinship: the first embraces that clan or those clans to which the women -- agnates of a given clan -- are given in marriage; the second embraces that clan or clans from which a given clan or its separate members have drawn their wives.

The persons bound together in agnate kinship are united 614 under the common name "k:khal-n'ig:yvyn" or simply k:khal -- 615 the people of the clan, clansmen (from k:khal -- clan, n'ig:yvyn -- 602 person). With respect to the first group of cognates, i.e., to the members of the clan or clans which take or have taken their wives from the k:khal-n'ig:yvyn, these latter and their whole clan are united under the common designation of akhmalk (fathers-in-law) and, conversely, ymg:i (sons-in-law /zyat'ya, "sons-in-law" or "brothers-in-law" in Russian/). On the other hand, in relation to the second group of cognates, i.e., that clan or those clans from which they themselves take women, they are ymg:i (sons-in-law) and, conversely, akhmalk. Both cognate groups in relation to the first, and all three among themselves, bear /137/ the characteristic designation pandf (from pandynd -- to be born), that is, consanguineous, bound by a common origin (1) through women. Thus, relationship

[114] *[601] 1. Schrenck (III, p. 23) quite erroneously asserts that kinsmen on the father's side, i.e., agnates, members of one and the same clan, call each other ngafk, and that kinsmen on the mother's side call each other amal'. In reality, both terms, on

/137 cont./

614 615 602 *601 114 the contrary, designate exclusively relationship either through the mother or through the wife, but under no conditions on the father's side. Kinsmen through the father bear the name already mentioned by us: k:khal, k:khal-n'ig:yvyn.

614 602 Thus, relationship by marriage and cognate relationship are completely identical concepts among the Gilyak. We shall see how this has come

614 *601 602 about upon examining the marriage norms. Now, let us proceed to an examination of each category of kinship separately.

Agnate kinship, kinship within the clan. Within the clan the Gilyak distinguish only three lines: 1) the ascending generation "the generation of my fathers"), without distinguishing between direct and collateral lines, since the brothers of the father are called by the same term as own fathers; they only distinguish the generations of the ascending line; 1st generation, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, etc.;

2) the descending generation ("the generation of my children"), in which by children is understood not only the descendants of the speaker and of the whole class of his own brothers and collateral brothers of all degrees, but all the subsequent descending generations of these persons;

3) within each generation the lines of collateral kinship, embracing the class of brothers and sisters (own and collateral), the so-called class "tuvn."

In addition, in each generation of clansmen the class of husbands and wives is distinguished.

The class of brothers and sisters ("tuvn"). For a better understanding of what is to follow we shall begin with that class called tuvn (2). The peculiarity of this term consists first of [184] [197] 2. A term borrowed from the eastern dialect; in the western dialect it is ruf.

/137 cont./

614 *601 602 all in the fact that it embraces persons of both sexes alike; it equally signifies brother and sister. Another peculiarity -- still more important -- consists in the fact that under tuvn are understood not only own brothers and sisters, i.e., the children of one father, but also the children of all brothers of the father, own and collateral of all degrees of kinship, i.e., male and female first cousins, second cousins, etc. in the male line. Thus, within the clan, all the male and female agnates of the same generation are brothers and sisters; male and female cousins in the male line and likewise a married woman and the wives of the brothers /138/ of her husband are tuvn

*601 602 in relation to each other. But a man, as we shall see, can have tuvn outside his clan as well, namely, the children of those persons outside his clan whom he calls father and mother (see the class of fathers and mothers). Within this class there is one large and important subdivision that plays a leading role in both terminology and sexual norms, namely, the one for those persons who are older than the speaker or person referred to and persons younger than he, namely, "akand, aki" -- elder brother or sister (tuvn) and "as'khand, as'kh" -- younger brother or sister (tuvn). For the designation of the elder sister, in view of the peculiarity of her position in sexual rights, there is in addition the term "nanakhand, nanakh, nankh" -- identically used in reference to her by both men and women. Certain special terms for separate categories of this class, however, have been developed. Thus, there is a general term to designate the concept of "sister" in the class sense, namely, ranr: (same root as rankh -- sister). One meets (very rarely, however, and only in poetry) the term "kivung, kiun" -- brother (1). Descriptive forms are [538] 1. "Chikhvs' kivung khendra" -- "I considered you a brother," says the heroine to her beloved in one song. "Kiun" could also be formed from the rare form akikhun.

/139 cont./ Every Gilyak, man and woman,

*601 [184] uses one and the same term for "mother" (ymk and synonyms), not only for his own mother, but also for the following groups of persons: 1) all the "sisters" /140/ (female tuvn) of his mother; 2) all the wives of the "brothers" of his father (1);

[197] [563] 1. The sole exception that I found during the time of the census in the settlement of Kol' was one case in which the wife of the older brother of the father is called by the Tungus term yvej, which is explained by the presence in the settlement of persons of Tungus origin.

3) all the wives of his father, i.e., his stepmothers; 4) outside the clan: all the "sisters" of persons of the akhmalk class (concerning this, see below).

[197] [184] [614] The class of "wives" within the clan. The designation most in use for wife in both dialects is an'kh, an'g:ej. Within the clan the Gilyak gives this name, not only to his official wife, but also to all her "sisters" (i.e., female tuvn), to the wives of all his elder "brothers" (i.e., aki), and, finally, to all the sisters of the wives of these last. To the wives of the class of younger "brothers" (as'kh) the Gilyak gives the name of jokho, jokh /see yokh, p. 76/, the same term which the father-in-law or mother-in-law applies to his or her daughter-in-law /nevestka, "daughter-in-law" or "sister-in-law" in Russian/. Only an insignificant

[171] number of Gilyak on the Amur, due to their proximity to the Olcha, took from the latter the special designation ivy for the wives of all brothers without distinction (2).

2. Among the Olcha, a man calls the wife of his older brother yvy.

It is especially characteristic that "wives" of the tuvn class, no matter who they may be by origin, call one another "sister" (tuvn), and, depending on the age of their husbands, one calls

/140 cont./

*601 the other nankh and as'kh -- older "sister," and, conversely, -- younger "sister."

The class of husbands. The class of husbands corresponds to the terminology of the foregoing class -- "wives." Within the

[614] clan of her husband the woman gives the name of "husband" (pu, ivn, o'kono, etc.), not only to her official husband, but also to the representatives of the class of his "brothers" (tuvn),

*601 184 197 with, however, the following variations. The eastern Gilyak and a part of the western Gilyak differentiate between the younger "brothers" (tuvn) of the husband and the elder ones; a woman calls the former pu, ivn, o'kono, i.e., as her own formal husbands, and she calls the latter atk. The Gilyak of northern Sakhalin and the shoreline of the continent do not differentiate between the younger and older brothers of the husband, calling them alike pu, o'kono. Only the Amur Gilyak have a special uniform designation for all the brothers of the husband -- n'orej (= n'i -- my + orej -- husband), a term which sounds like the Goldi kinship term oro.

*601 614 The class of the descending line. The class of the descending line within the clan, the class og:lang, og:la, is completely defined by the foregoing terms of the class of fathers and mothers. Within his clan every man gives the name of og:la, not only to his own children born of his official wives, but also to all the children of his "brothers" (tuvn), just as /141/ a woman gives the name og:la not only to her own children, but to the children of all the "brothers" of her husband without distinction; but the term og:la is applied not only to the first generation of individuals, but also to all the generations in the descending line, not only one's own, but also those of the whole class of tuvn. Thus, the Gilyak gives the one and the same term og:la not only to his own children and agnate nephews, but to all of their descendants, i.e., grandsons, great-grandsons, etc. Here we see the same phenomenon that we find in the terminology of the ascending line, where the one term "atk" defines all the generations above father and mother.

/69 cont./

796 accident that the death of a relative, i.e., the fact of the 825 extraordinarily malicious designs of an evil spirit, forces him to catch or buy a bear cub, whatever the cost. That a bear
[787] by its mere presence drives away evil spirits may be seen
[755] from the single fact that during the bear festival the shaman
[756] is forbidden to consult in his dreams his kekhn (see below) about curing a sick man, i.e., driving out the evil spirits residing in him, for the bear will be offended; he himself can drive them away with his own strength. Analogies to
[171] such beliefs in the purifying influence of the bear and of many other animals are to be found in vestiges of our own survivals and ceremonies. As is well known, in Little Russia /Ukraine/ there existed the custom of leading a bear through the village on certain holidays for purification... In our grand stables the custom of keeping goats, who are supposed to protect the horses and the grooms from evil power, has
[614] been preserved up to the present. And so, similarly, the clan that feeds a bear performs an important social function, securing all their own against the evil designs of their strongest, though invisible enemies. Unique religious sanitation, but the only kind available to primitive man!

Let us consider the meaning of those ceremonies that accompany every case of bear killing. First of all we should say that the Gilyak does not consider the killing of a bear a sin. In spite of all his respect for it, he is convinced that in the first place those bears that fall prey to him are sent to him by the "master" of the taiga, for whom the bears play the same role that dogs do for the Gilyak. "The bear is the dog of the master of the mountain," such is the formula of the [974] Gilyak. In addition, the bear loses nothing by its violent death, for death to it is only leaving its body to the Gilyak, while its soul -- that living duplicate -- then gaily runs to its master as if nothing had happened. Therefore no expiation whatever is required here. But the bear, even though only the dog of a forest man, is nevertheless a creature of a higher order, of a higher rank, than man. From the point of view of primitive man, there is nothing derogatory to the sacred

/70 cont./

796 slain bear, but the head is always respectfully divided among 825 the clansmen to whom the bear belongs. This eating must 261 be looked upon, not as a simple act of eating, but as taking into one's body the mighty qualities of the bear. A woman, [562] for instance, cannot partake of the heart of the bear, which imparts courage, a quality completely useless to her, and therefore such eating, as aimless, must be offensive to the bear.

796 Thus the religious significance of the bear festival amounts 825 to the following: 1) feeding the bear gives /71/ the settlement
182 security and protection from evil spirits -- a very important 775 matter if we take into account the views of the Gilyak with 774 regard to the origin of sickness and of death (see below);
2) eating the "deity" imparts strength; 3) the soul of the slain animal, pleased by the honors, may independently and through its "master" do good things for man; 4) it -- and this is of the utmost importance -- is an envoy, a transmitter of all kinds of gifts to the "master of the mountains," on whom 796 the welfare of the Gilyak depends. With regard to the last
825 point, it is important to remember what we said about clan
614 gods. Every clan has clansmen among the "mountain people," 775 i.e., clansmen who sometime in the past fell in a fight with a bear and were then taken into the clan of the "master of the bear." Every such clansman in turn becomes a small "master," a god-protector of his clan. Actually, every clan receives its catch, not directly from the "master of the mountains" himself but from this, his clan god, who specifically resides in the hunting territory of his clan. Thus, the presents sent through the bear are actually sent, not to the supreme "master," but to the nearest "master of the mountains" -- clansman.

796 That is why the celebration of the festival is purely a clan 614 affair. This also perhaps explains two extremely characteristic, but puzzling facts concerning the bear festival. In the first place, not only is no member of the clan arranging the festival allowed to kill the bear, but even the clansmen of women who are wives of the members of that clan are not allowed to, in a word, none of the agnates in either the male

/141 cont./

*601 In addition to the stated normative cases, the term og:la is frequently applied outside of the rule as a term of endearment to other categories. Thus, a woman frequently applies this term to the son of the sister of her husband, while a man applies it to the son of the brother of his wife, although normally completely different designations are established for these persons.

We shall note two more special forms of designation in this class: one is a descriptive designation of a "kinsman" of the descending line -- os'kyr: og:la -- and one designates primogeniture, ykych, but neither of these terms play any role in either the general system of terminology or the sexual norms.

*601 602 ●614 Cognate kinship. Now we shall proceed to the kinship terms for persons outside the clan, to cognate kinship, which is the key of this system. We have already said that in the Gilyak kinship system relationship by marriage and blood (cognate) kinship are identical, that a special kinship through relationship by marriage is not known to the Gilyak classificatory system. For a better understanding of this strange fact, we begin our survey of kinship outside of the clan with kinship through the mother, that is, with kinship with members of the clan and the whole clan from which the mother of a person came.

First of all, it is noteworthy that all the sisters (tuvn) of my mother, not only own, but also of the class of "mothers," are the "wives" (an'g:ej) of my father and of his class of tuvn. Corresponding to this, all the "sisters" (tuvn) of my mother and of my class of "mothers" are also my "mothers" (ymk), while I and my "brothers and sisters" (tuvn) are their "children" (og:la). On the other hand, my relations to the brother of my mother and his tuvn are even more important. Just as my father calls all the "sisters" of my mother his "wives" (an'g:ej), so I (if "I am a man) from birth call all the daughters of the brother of my mother and their "sisters" (tuvn) -- an'g:ej -- my "wives," and, conversely, they call me their husband (pu); their children call me "father" (ytk), my official wife --

/141 cont./

*601 602 ●614 mother (ymk), while /142/ we call them our "children" (og:la). As for the remaining clansmen and kinsmen of the brother of my mother, the following terminology has been established. If "I" am a man, I and all my "brothers" -- tuvn and my descending line call the brother of my mother and all his male clansmen -- atk, akhmalk (uncle, father-in-law /wife's father/); the wife of the brother of my mother, her "sisters," and the wives of the tuvn of the brother of my mother, as well as the wives of the ascending line of the brother of my mother achk, ytik -- aunt, mother-in-law /wife's mother/, grandmother; the sons of the brother of my mother and his tuvn -- akhmalk, navkh; conversely, all these persons call me -- ymg:i (son-in-law /zyat'/) navkh; my wives, as well as the wives of my clansmen, these persons, according to generation, call either "sisters" (tuvn) or "daughters" (og:la), but our sisters and daughters -- by the one term "niece," n'ern, and, finally, all my clansmen call all the male clansmen of the brother of my mother akhmalk (father-in-law /wife's father/), and, conversely, -- ymg:i -- son-in-law -- a survival from the time when there was exchange marriage. This last term is very characteristic; it is from the same root as umgu -- woman, oma -- mother, and testifies to the fact that the term son-in-law /zyat'/ is associated with the idea of cognate kinship, with kinship through the mother.

But especially noteworthy is the fact that the kinship terminology established between me and the generation of the brother of my mother is not limited to the individuals of our common generation, but is correspondingly repeated as well between the persons of all our ascending and descending lines, so that if I, a man, call the daughter of the brother of my mother my an'g:ej, so does my father in turn call his sister, i.e., the daughter of the father of my mother's brother, "wife" -- an'g:ej. In the same way, my son calls the daughter of the son of my mother's brother his "wife," etc., in a word, it is as though every wife of a clansman were actually the daughter of the sister of his father /sic./

/142 cont./

*601 602 ●614 Thus, kinship through the mother establishes, not partial kinship of the family of her husband with her own family, but an indivisible kinship between both clans, extending to each member of each of them. If my clan is A, and the clan of the brother of my mother is B, the latter, as a whole, will be called the akhmalk of A, while A, in its turn, is the ymg:i of B. And, what is especially noteworthy, this relationship remains permanently between both clans. Clan B can no longer under any circumstances be converted into the ymg:i of A. This is evident from the reciprocal terminology of the clans. The designation "akhmalk" of clan B originated, as we have seen, from the fact that members of clan A have whole classes of "wives" (an'g:ej) in this clan; conversely, among the women of clan A the males of clan B only have either sisters (tuvn), "daughters" (og:la), or /143/ "nieces" (n'ern), but not "wives" (an'g:ej), and for this reason, clan B cannot become A's akhmalk.

The terminology for kinship through the mother defines another form of cognate kinship -- kinship through the sister of the father. As long as she remains in my clan, I call her by the agnate term nankh (elder sister, aunt), and she calls me as'kh (younger brother), but upon marriage she and the clan of her husband stand in the same relation to me and my clan as I and my clan stand in relation to the clan of the brother of my mother, i.e., the husband of the sister of my father and his "brothers" (tuvn) call all the sisters of my father "wives" (an'g:ej), and, conversely, they are called "husbands" (pu); my daughters and those of my tuvn are the an'g:ej of the sons of the sister of my father and their tuvn and are the jokh (daughters-in-law) of all the ascending line of the husband of the sister of my father; the men of my clan, according to the class of the ascending line, are either the atk, akhmalk, or the akhmalk, navkh of the clansmen of the husband of my father's sister, while they are our ymg:i, navkh, and the women of that clan are either our agnates -- "aunts" (nankh), "sisters" (tuvn), "daughters" (og:la), or "nieces" (n'ern); in a word, my clan is the akhmalk clan, while the clan of the sister of my father is the ymg:i clan to us.

/143 cont./

*601 602 ●614 The terminology of this group is the central point of the whole kinship terminology, for it is according to its pattern, i.e., the pattern of the kinship relations between a man and the brother of his mother, that the entire kinship nomenclature of the marriage relationship in general is constructed. Whomever the Gilyak marries, between him and his clan on the one hand, and his wife and her clan on the other, the kinship terminology established is the same as if his wife were really the daughter of the brother of his mother. Conversely, whomever a Gilyak may give his sister to in marriage, the entire kinship terminology established between the clans is the same as if the brother-in-law /zyat'/ were truly the son of the sister of his father. This is why Gilyak terminology does not recognize kinship through relationship by marriage, for the father-in-law /wife's father/ in any case is the same as the son of the brother of the grandmother, a man's brother-in-law /zyat'/ is the son of the sister of his father, the father of the brother-in-law /zyat'/ is the son of the sister of the grandfather, and so forth. And, consequently, all members of both clans are blood kinsmen.

Thus, keeping in mind the kinship nomenclature of the group of the brother of the mother and the sister of the father, we have a ready scheme for any marriage combination between a husband and the clan of his wife, between a wife and the clan of her husband, between a man and the clan of his married sister, etc. According to this scheme, the relationship of a man toward the clan of his wife, whoever she may be de facto in origin, must, as a general rule, be the following: my father-in-law and /144/ his ascending line, as well as the corresponding classes of their tuvn, are related to me as atk and akhmalk, their wives -- achk, their descending line of the male sex -- akhmalk and navkh; I am their ymg:i, navkh. The sisters of my akhmalk'i are my mothers (ymk), their husbands -- my "fathers" (ytk), I am the son (og:la) of both; similarly the "sisters" (tuvn) of my wife are the "wives" (an'g:ej) of myself and my "brothers" (tuvn), their husbands are my "brothers" (tuvn). Their children call each of us "father" (ytk)

/144 cont./

*601 602 ●614 and "mother" (ymk), and call each other "brothers" (tuvn). On the other hand, my sisters and daughters are simply nieces to the men of the clan of my father-in-law, and therefore no one from the clan of my father-in-law can become an ymg:i of my clan.

[178] At the present time in certain instances breaches have begun to appear in this well-shaped, though strange system of relationships between the son-in-law /zyat'/ and the clan of the father-in-law, specifically, when some clansman takes a wife who is not from the clan of his mother or is not even from the customary akhmalk clan, in the case of certain clans the terminology loses force in the third generation, but this is a deviation of the newest order.

*601 614 Now, before we finish with this system, we must underline two more important peculiarities still further complicating this already complicated system. We have seen that the relationship between the akhmalk and ymg:i clans remains constant, so that the members of the first clan -- let us call it A (if A is the akhmalk of B, then B is the akhmalk of a third clan, C, and gives its daughters to the third clan) -- must, in turn, have their own akhmalk clan or even clans (let us call it C), while the second clan (let us call it B) must have its own ymg:i clan or even clans (D). Thus, the following kinship terminology is established between these four clans: Clan A gets new ymg:i clans (sons-in-law /zyat'ya/) in the person of the D clans, while clan B gets new akhmalk clans in the person of the C clans. These secondary clans, in distinction from the first, are called tujma (distant); for example, tujma akhmalk -- distant father-in-law, tujma ymg:i -- distant son-in-law /zyat'/.

Finally, in view of the fact that at the present time it is not prohibited for various persons of one clan to take wives from various clans, each such marriage establishes in relation to each new clan a whole complex fabric of akhmalk-ymg:i terminology, i.e., each clan as a whole can be the akhmalk and ymg:i of a whole series of clans.

/150 cont./

684 for the man, and more or less bloody for the woman. But all this concerns only cases involving a married woman. Sexual 836 relations with an unmarried woman or with a widow, if it is with [583] the permission of the woman, do not provoke any reaction, even on the part of the father or brothers of the wife, notwithstanding their extreme interest in the bride price which is received when a woman gets married; I, at least, did not happen [684] to hear of repressions in such cases. A reaction on the part of the kinsmen of the woman occurs only in a case of coercion; 582 then there is the possibility of duels and suits for ransom. Also, at the present time there are no prohibitions against marrying a person of this category, i.e., persons not bound by kinship.
835 It is another matter with individuals who are bound by the classificatory terms of kinship. Here there appears on the scene a complete system of limitations and prohibitions.
Here, against the violators of the prohibitions, there appears on the scene both a social reaction and the categorical imperative of religion, under the influence of which there have developed suitable instincts which have turned artificially created norms into natural human feelings. We shall dwell on this aspect of Gilyak psychics in more detail later, when we speak of sexual morals. Now we shall turn to the norms of prohibitions and limitations themselves.

These prohibitions and limitations, it turns out, fully correspond with the kinship nomenclature. Only those persons who, according to the established class terminology, are mutually reckoned in the classes "pu" and "an'gïej," that is, /151/ who from birth call each other "husband" and "wife," have the right to sexual relations with one another and to enter into matrimony. All the remaining classes are placed under unconditional prohibition.

835 What are these prohibited classes? First of all there is the 614 extensive class of ŋkhal, i.e., the persons born into one common agnatic clan. The Gilyak clan is absolutely exogamous; among the agnates, as we have seen, there are no classes that call each other "pu" and "an'gïej"; neither marriage nor sexual intercourse is possible among them.

/151 cont./

835 And therefore we must come out in the most categorical
• 614 manner against the assertion of Schrenck that the Gilyak clan 114 is endogamous. "Affiliation to the clan," says Schrenck,
"does not play any role whatever in the most important phenomenon of their life, namely, in marriage... the Gilyak freely permit marriages between Gilyak of one and the same kal'a (clan)" (1). Elsewhere he states even more definitely:

1. Schrenck, II, pp. 23, 24.

"only own brothers and sisters and the children of two own brothers cannot marry" (2). This absolutely false assertion

2. Ibid., p. 6.

would be completely incomprehensible coming from an investigator who had spent about two years in contact with the Gilyak, if it were not for the fact that Schrenck did not command the Gilyak language and had to make himself understood through a guide. On the basis of many years of association with the Gilyak, in their own language, and of an especially thorough study of marriage law, I can categorically refute this absolutely groundless and antiscientific assertion of Schrenck's; both marriage and sexual relations between persons born in one clan are absolutely forbidden.

835 We turn now to the particular classes, within as well as outside of the clan, which are excluded from the right of sexual relations and marriage.

Class of the ascending and descending lines. Classes whose members call each other atk, achik, ytk, ymk, nankh, and, conversely, ogila, i.e., the classes of grandfathers and grandmothers, fathers and mothers, agnates and cognates, uncles and aunts -- on one hand, on the other -- their descendants. Thus, intercourse between ascending and descending lines is excluded not only in the direct, but also in the most distant collateral lines as well: sexual intercourse

/154 cont./

835 class terms, i.e., the norms in force between the children of a brother and sister extend to the children of brothers and sisters in the most distant degrees of kinship and relationship by marriage. Thus, an exchange marriage between the children of brothers and sisters, as is practiced, for example, among the Tungus peoples, is not permitted; sons have rights to the daughters of the brother, but the sons of the brother are prohibited for the daughters of the sister, and this is true for all classes of tuvn. This norm, which seems of specialized im-• [614] portance and affects only brothers and sisters, plays an enormous role in the norms regulating the sexual relations between entire clans, as we shall see in the next section.

835 It is especially surprising that the aforementioned pro-614 hibitions which regulate the relations between the children of brother and sister are extended not only to the class of their children -- cousins, but also to both clans in their entirety. The rights and prohibitions which bind together the children of a brother and of his sister and their cousins extend to all the generations of both clans; namely, in each generation, as we have seen in the foregoing section, all the men of the class of tuvn in the clan of the sister and all the women -- tuvn in the clan of the brother call each other reciprocally from birth pu and an'gïej, and they, in fact, have the right to sexual intercourse and marriage. But the men from the clan of the brother and the women from the clan of the sister are absolutely prohibited for each other in all generations and call each other nanakh (elder sister) if she is in an ascending generation, and n'ern if in the same generation, while the women call these men akhmalk. Thus, the women from the clan of the married sister are prohibited for the entire clan of her brother. It is still more surprising that these norms extend to the clans of the son-in-law /zyat'/ and father-in-law in general, even though the fathers of the spouses are completely alien; it is enough for one member from clan A, let us say, to marry a woman from clan B, even though this woman and the members of her clan are completely alien to

/154 cont./

835 clan A, and the relations established between these two clans
• 614 are the same as if the father-in-law of the given man were the brother of his mother; the whole class of "sisters" (tuvn) in each generation of the clan of the father-in-law are the wives of the "brothers" (tuvn) of the clan of the son-in-law /zyat'/, and, conversely, the wives of the latter are prohibited for the former.

/155/ The kinship nomenclature corresponds completely to these norms; atk, akhmalk -- designate the mother's brother and the father-in-law in general, ymgïi designates the son-in-law /zyat'/ in general and the sister's son or even any male of the sister's clan. This norm leads to very complicated consequences. It very often happens that separate members of one or another clan, A, we shall say, have taken wives from several different clans and in turn have given their women to several different clans, and at once in relation to all these clans those same prohibitions that we had in the first case when there were only two clans concerned, become valid for clan A, i.e., the women of clan A are forbidden to all the clans from which its members have taken their wives, and, conversely, the women of all clans whose members have taken wives from A are forbidden to clan A. This inconvenient regulation is aggravated still more by the following limitation. Clan B, let us suppose, from which my clan, A, takes women, in turn takes wives from clan C, and at once this clan C, having become the akhmalk of clan B becomes also the akhmalk of my clan, A, and therefore wives from my clan are forbidden not only to clan B, my immediate akhmalk, but also to clan C, which, as we have seen, is called, in contradistinction to the first, "tujma akhmalk" -- (distant father-in-law), and on the Amur -- turŋ'gï akhmalk. But this phenomenon also has its converse side. If the quantity of prohibited clans for this or that clan increases proportionately as the number of clans which take women from it increases, nevertheless, on the other hand, as its members begin to take wives from various clans, the number of permitted

835 /155 cont./
• 614 women increases correspondingly in these clans of father-in-[198] law, because in each of these clans there is a whole new [161] class of wives -- an'gïej. Nevertheless, the extension of prohibitions to clans of akhmalk'i of the most remote degree has naturally brought about within a small-sized tribe, with a population of scarcely four and a half thousand, entirely understandable constraints, leading to some limitations of the strict principle, namely, that the prohibitions at the present time do not go back further than the clans of akhmalk of the third degree, and, if one clan or another takes wives from many clans, then the prohibitions are limited to the second generation, and, if an acquired woman dies childless, then even in the second generation the limitations fall away.

835 The class of jokh. Finally, one more class prohibited to men, called jokh, remains. From the kinship nomenclature we know that a man gives this name to two completely different classes of women, namely, on the one hand, to the class of wives of his ogila (descending line), and, on the other hand, to the class of wives /156/ of his as'kh, i.e., of his younger brothers (tuvn), and sisters of these wives. As concerns the first class, we have already noted its prohibited character in examining the prohibition between persons of the ascending generations and the wives of those of descending ones. The prohibited character of the second category is not so absolute.
From the kinship terminology we know that with respect to the wife of the elder tuvn various forms of designation are practiced [184] in various places. In several places on the Amur, on the coast of the mainland, and on the northwestern coast of Sakhalin (if "I" am a male) one and the same appellation (an'gïej -- wife) is used for wives of the younger as well as of the older brother, and in such places sexual intercourse is permitted with all wives of brothers. But this arrangement is not the dominant one; the dominant arrangement must be considered that of designating the wife of the elder tuvn as an'gïej, i.e., the same name that one gives to one's own wife,

/161 cont./

835 All these categories of "wives" and "husbands" are fo
[601] from nominal /162/ categories. Behind these class term (pu and an'gïej) there are hidden two important real right
1) the right to individual marriage; 2) the right to sexual intercourse (group marriage).

Let us examine each of these rights in particular.
The right to individual marriage. Above all, the categor pu and an'gïej are bound by the right to marry, in other w out of the whole circle of persons bound together by kinsh terms, only these alone have the right to join in individu marriage with each other; all the other categories of kins groups are prohibited from marrying each other. But this right is not exhausted by the merely negative feature -- t absence of a prohibition on matrimonial ties. Certainly the eyes of the Gilyak the mnemonic significance of these terms is of great importance in itself, for in view of the e treme complexity of kinship relations a firm knowledge o the marriageable classes is the only guarantee against vio tions of the very strict taboos on marriage in the prohibite degrees of kinship. Nevertheless the mnemonic-permissi significance of these terms does not at all exhaust their le content. Prohibitions against marriage, as we have seen, absent also among persons who are complete strangers to each other in the kinship relation, and nevertheless, for persons of these categories to call each other pu and an'gï before marriage is not tolerated. The right to individual marriage between persons in the pu and an'gïej categories is not a naked nudum jus; this right, which is simultaneo an obligation, is a debt for both parties concerned. This ligation is seen first of all in the category of "brothers" a their individual wives, who are, as we know, joined mut in the relationship of pu and an'gïej. By the general rule • [587] widows of "brothers" (own and collateral) cannot leave th [614] clan, and they become, according to the disposition of th clansmen, the wives of the brothers who have survived the husbands, completely independently of the wishes of these brothers; none of them can decline the widow assigned to

/145/ cont.—

In those clans where the "older brothers" are excluded from marriage with respect to the wives of "younger brothers," the widows are ordinarily assigned to one of the "younger brothers" of the deceased, but here also, in the absence of "younger brothers," one of the "older brothers" is obliged to accept the widow, without the right, however, to sexual intercourse with her.

But the typical aspect of the marriage-rights relation between the pu and ankyel is not concealed in this extremely common institution of the levirate, about which /165/ we will speak in detail. The levirate marriage is not even a less exceptional phenomenon and embraces only one insignificant side of the relationship. The more characteristic aspect of the right-obligations of marriage between pu and ankyel lies in the other classes of this category, which are well-known to us from the kinship terminology, in other words, in the conditions of the normal marriage. This right-obligation character of marriage between pu and ankyel has, it is true, been considerably shaken under the influence of causes about which we shall speak further on — the Gilyak do take wives outside of the aforementioned categories, but these marriages seem do not represent the favored, characteristic form, even even the contemporary marriage. On the contrary, both the contemporary customs and the ancient epos equally indicate that perfect marriage between these classes of pu and ankyel marriage was obligatory and the most satisfactory of all from the specific point of view of the Gilyak. In order to show how imperative this consciousness of the obligation of marriage between persons of the classes pu and ankyel is, it will be sufficient to introduce one example from a story I recorded. In this story, they tell about a battle between a young clan and a mysterious werewolf-shaman. The fight ends with the werewolf-in-chief receiving a mortal wound and returning to his yurt. On his deathbed he remembers that he is a distant akhmak of his target, that is, a member of that clan from which the clan of the killer has the right to take wives, and of the very category of persons of that clan whose daughters are the ankyel of the slayer. Then he immediately orders the slayer to "take my daughter into his house, that is, "the sister whom blood vengeance is obligatory, although the killing was unpremeditated, the man whom it was the greatest sin to allow into his house, and in the presence of the assembled members of the clan he solemnly declares: "Although this man has killed me, give him my daughter. Do not fail to carry out my wish after my remains." Such is the force of the ancient categorical imperative of marriages between the categories of pu and ankyel. This imperative is also active nowadays. We shall make a full analysis of this terminology in connection with the theory of marriage later on. For our purpose now it is necessary to remember the following facts: 1) the wives of clansmen, according to their generations, call each other either ankyel or younger "sister" or "aunt" and "niece"; 2) all the agnate kin of the wife are considered, according to generation, the "father-in-law" of all the clansmen of this /167/ family; 3) the man calls the sister of his "father-in-law" his "mother," and he calls the daughter of his mother's brother wife (ankyel). Judging from this, 1) the wives of all the members of a given clan must be taken from one stock, and, consequently, in each generation they are sisters (own and collateral). 2) the clan of these women, for each individual man, is the clan of his mother, and the wife of each individual man, must be the daughter of his mother's brother. This we see in actuality, notwithstanding all the deviations of modern times, the causes of which will be made clear later. The ideal of the clansmen is to have women from one clan, from one clan of common *akhmak*s. If this turn out to be impossible and it is necessary to take to wife another clan, then once again it is preferably to that clan which is already the akhmak of a given clan; that is, that clan for which the individual clansmen, fathers and grandfathers, at an earlier date took their wives for same reason or other. Under these conditions, for each individual person the most favored by their touching tenderness, their devotion and selflessness. Toward a young, beautiful, and pleasant ankyel the "father-in-law" sometimes behave better than toward their own children. "One must feed a son-in-law," runs the religious formula of relations between "father-in-law" and "son-in-law." "I run to this dry formulation is hidden a rich content. Not only in times of poverty does a "son-in-law," sometimes with his huge family, move in to live with his father-in-law, getting a living from him without any payment for a period of months and even several years, but even in normal times the "son-in-law" is always welcome in his father-in-law's house, a favorite guest in the house of his father-in-law.

/164 cont.—

/166 cont.—

We have already stated that the Gilyak youth loudly and happily pass their time in the settlements of their "fathers-in-law," finding in every yurt the most hearty welcome and the greatest hospitality, and when the hunting begin, that "son-in-law" is invariably a participant in the undertakings of his "father-in-law," and when he returns to his own home, he carries with him, in addition to the usual gifts, also his share of the catch. At solemn moments of life, for example, at the bear festival, the "son-in-law" are in the foreground among those who are invited, and it is to them that the honor of killing the bear is presented. In an arduous moment in warfare, the "father-in-law" and the "son-in-law" are obliged to come to the aid of each other in battle.

In order to evaluate fully the religious background of these peculiar relations between "fathers-in-law" and "son-in-law," it is necessary to keep in mind the wide meaning that the Gilyak, with a purely primitive passion for the broadening of their original taboos, have given to the term "father-in-law." "Father-in-law" (ankyel) and "mother-in-law" are the whole set of the "fathers-in-law" is considered to be not only that clan which is the akhmak of a man's blood relatives, but also all the other clans from which even one kinsman has chanced to take his wife. Thus, each man can have several clans

/171 cont.—

"Thus, each man can have several clans of "fathers-in-law," and all the agnates of these clans, according to generations, are considered ankyel — his wives and his sons-in-law, his kinsmen. So it is in the kinship terminology, and so it is in life.

It will be necessary for us to consider in detail later how this relationship is established.

For the present, we think, quite enough has been said to see that in the sphere of individual marriage the appellations pu and ankyel have played and still play an enormous role, symbolizing in themselves the remarkable institution of the right to marriage — one of the many benefits which the clan institution has given to the Gilyak.

Now we shall indicate only the practical significance of this institution of the right to marriage at the present time. For the overwhelming majority of the Gilyak, marriage is the most difficult matter of life. Not only in the fairy tales, but also in the /172/ epic "it is a business of unusual difficulty." First of all, there is the extreme shortage in women among the Gilyak, according to calculations made on the basis of the census that I took, for every 1,000 male inhabitants there are 700 females; on the isolated shores of the Sea of Okhotsk, it is 694 females, while in Siberia, for every 1,000 males there are 800 females, and, according to the census, this significant percentage of the Gilyak, namely, the wealthier individuals, keep from two to four wives. Therefore, a pregnant maiden is subjected to severe reproaches on the part of her father, who demands either that the same the seducer, or the destruction of the fetus, or the killing of the newborn infants. However fatal the moral position of individual women is in such cases, in practice the business /173/ is much simpler. In the first place, many women, as we have seen, are married from childhood on, and, in the second place, they have the same desire as few women that every girl is already married by the time seductions become dangerous for them. Finally, those who are not married and freely indulge in sexual intercourse with men extremely rarely have an affair with just their know, and ymgal is the closest person to an akhmak and to his wife. An ymgal is a preferred hunting companion (another and wife). He is the dearest guide, the closest friend, the most delicate dishes to him. He makes them still happier for a special reason. With their clansmen-brothers-in-*akhmak*s /175/ and their sons can neither converse nor joke, but the ymgal is a legitimate interlocutor, with whom they may make merry, make hearts' content. And in such surroundings there are dozens of maidens — his ankyel, with whom he may openly converse, joke, and, when the opportunity presents itself, have sexual intercourse.

/173 cont.—

Now we shall turn to the relations of the pu with their *ankyel*s.

In the kinship terminology we know that a man's married ankyel is his wife, first of all, the individual wives of his "brothers" (tunyi), which, among the Gilyak speaking the western dialect, refer to all men, while among the Gilyak speaking the eastern dialect — only to the elders; further — all the married "sisters" of his own wife, finally, the married sisters of the wives of his tunyi — a huge category, including many dozens of persons distributed throughout the clans of Gilyak settlements. Concerning these last two groups — the wife's sisters and the sisters of the brothers' wives — one must make the following reservation: usually, in agreement with the general norms of Gilyak life, the sisters marry persons of the clan to which their husbands belong, but, due to deviation from the traditional norms, it may turn out that the sister of one's brother's wife or the sister of one's own wife is married to a complete stranger, or even to someone who is an accidental akhmak (1).

1. An accidental akhmak is what I call a man from a clan from which one of the kinsmen of the speaker has by chance taken a wife secretly, rather than from the clan from which all the kinsmen usually take a wife.

In these cases the norms of sexual relations, and the terminology as well, are the same. Among the majority of clans, in both cases sexual intercourse with these women is legitimate, the participants call each other pu and ankyel, and their children call each other tunyi and the sons of their mother and their husbands correspondingly "mothers" and "fathers." But among other clans, mainly among clans who are neighbors of the Amur, the arrangements is different: the sister of a man's wife marries his akhmak, then sexual intercourse with her, as in general with the wife of an akhmak, is absolutely prohibited, and the husband of the sister calls her achik (mother-in-law). But if she marries a completely alien man, then the relations between them are as between aliens, i.e., sexual intercourse is not considered a sin, but neither is it legitimate. What is remarkable, however, is that the offspring of both families are in all cases, even in such /174/ relations, considered to be tunyi (brothers) (1).

1. I shall give an example which depicts very well both the relation of such tunyi (i.e., the children of sisters whose husbands are aliens to each other) among themselves and their mutual relations towards their wives.

Wremgin and Hibi are individuals of two different clans (ekhal), one from the clan of Kiyu, the other from the clan Khoi, but their mothers were tunyi, i.e., sisters from one and the same clan. And nevertheless, notwithstanding the fact that their fathers and they themselves are not persons of alien clans, they call each other tyrn, because their fathers were married to sisters and hold the same sexual intercourse, aqd, as tyrn, they do not date of intercourse as joke with each other (see below, the prohibitions); their wives are considered yuk (sisters) to their children, and HIM, as did younger, has the right to sexual intercourse with the wife of Wrength.

/174 cont.

1 Shtenberg—280 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910/1933 RKE Gilyak RKE

/174 cont.

/184 cont.

levirate. Then, in order that the woman remain in the clan of her deceased husband, she is, according to the decision of the clan council, to any character the ascending or descending degree of kinship with her late husband.

Ordinarily the very idea of sexual connection with persons of the forbidden categories evokes an instinctive disgust. In the rare instances where feelings of love arise between such persons, the Gilyak regard it as the inspiration of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural and only to be feared. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a female dog, as the animal most proper to personify the same. Ordinarily lovers in the forbidden categories stay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how Ykhl her elder sister called her a "bitch" for her love for her brother, and called her father a "devil," and how all — her mother, father, and sisters — urged upon her the absence of the individual spouse (mutually, the object of her criminal passion, her uncle, could be her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the two cousins might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

The feeling of sexual repulsion toward persons of the forbidden categories has been transformed into an instinct, like the very similar feeling toward one's mother or own sisters in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by that amazing ability of the Gilyak to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the group-husband or group-wife of his fellow enjoy this right. Married men resort to it in their own interest usually only in the case of some sort of particular passion for this or that group yukqtr, but outside of their settlement, when they happen to be away from their individual

/191 cont.

Why, for example, do the wives of the most distant tribal groups that may be completely alien to each other, call each other each other sisters? Why do I, a man, call my father-in-law, Gdagdgn, as well as a complete stranger, my "father-in-law," and under the same conditions a woman call her mother-in-law the "sister of her father"? Why, if I am a man and marry a woman who is a complete alien to me and to my clan, from that moment on do all the sisters of her father, even the sixtieth and more, become my mothers, and no one from her clan can marry the women from my clan?

Why is it that the women of my clan cannot marry men of my clan, but women from his side, from his clan, take a wife, but any clan from which this latter clan takes wives? Why we could do apparently perfectly normal only in case a man can have male and female agnates (sons, daughters, brothers, fathers, and mothers) in clan complexity alien to him have some about "his confusion and apparent absurdity can be explained only by the fact that the primitive, simple, and logical system of kinship, as we know it, has been changed, then, also created around itself by a peculiarity natural to the human mind, a complex and complicated system. On the other hand, under the influence of historical conditions that are still not sufficiently clear, the

CONTINUED
FROM PRECEDING
FICHE

/200 cont./

847 *174 171 murdering the girls are possible. Such examples are well-known among the Toda tribes, in spite of the fact that the number of males is greater there than the number of females.

583 *174 10. Likewise, with this arrangement the institution of bride price is impossible under normal conditions. Payment for the bride is not permitted; otherwise the obligation of marriage would be merely fictitious. This is still to be seen among the Gilyak today: no matter how avid the Gilyak may be for bride price, it is not permitted in cases of marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother.

582 *174 In order that such an essentially exogamous system might be preserved and function in all its purity, a whole series of favorable conditions is necessary. First of all, a whole complex of favorable economic, social and sanitary conditions is required in order that, on the one hand, in propagating themselves the various families of the phratry should be able to maintain themselves on the common territory; and, on the other hand, that the increase should exceed the losses of the families, and that there should be no cases of extinction of entire clans constituting links in the phratry. Furthermore, some degree of isolation of the tribe from alien influences is necessary, so that the religious imperative of obligatory marriages within the phratry may be preserved in all its rigor. Finally, it is necessary that there be preserved economic conditions under which, on the one hand, the social equality of the members of the phratry would remain more or less the usual phenomenon, and, on the other hand -- that under the influence of new economic conditions there should not be engendered one or another temptation to make woman the object of purchase and sale.

*174 614 178 166 [582] The preservation of all these conditions among primitive peoples in the course of a long time inevitably encounters a whole series of obstacles. And so it has been among the Gilyak. No matter how much the Gilyak prize the primordial abode of their forefathers, economic conditions force individual persons, individual families, and sometimes even a whole

/201 cont./

161 Still more destructive is the process of depopulation. We 177 are speaking not of the gradual dying out of separate families, 614 but mainly of the process of catastrophic depopulation. This 731 process is of comparatively recent origin, for it is an im-
174 mediate consequence of clashes with cultured peoples, first Eastern and later European peoples as well. These peoples, together with their alcohol and exploitations, have brought the Gilyak a whole set of communicable diseases with an especially destructive effect in their non-immunized primitive surroundings. We have already discussed the ravaging effects of this process. It is sufficient to say here that whole clans died out before my eyes, and one not infrequently meets clans in which only one or two individuals are left. It must be borne in mind that the process of depopulation does not by any means strike clans equally, so that at any given time one clan may remain untouched, while another may lose a considerable number of its members.

161 War also has an effect similar to that of diseases and
614 various other causes. Although according to the interclan
72 rules the women are spared and the number of men who are 174 killed is limited, nevertheless /202/ in the heat of battle the rules are not always observed, and thus a military epopee can also lead to the destruction of a clan.

174 Contact with other peoples, both primitive and more 177 highly cultured, must have acted in an indirectly destructive manner. As a general rule, the contact of outlooks broadens intellectual horizons and weakens the strength of religious imperatives. A representative of a higher culture looks down on the institutions of a lower race, and the representatives of the latter gradually begin to observe their own institutions less rigorously themselves. At first separate individuals begin to violate the law a little, and they gradually begin to draw after them many others. The [582] Gilyak themselves assert that with the coming of the Russians their marriage regulations were considerably weakened. But even before the appearance of the Russians the Gilyak had contact with various other peoples.

/225 cont./

* 835 At the present time, when it is permitted to take wives 601 from different clans, all the brothers (own and collateral) are still the group husbands of their wives, who often turn out to be sisters. And we have seen that even when sisters marry persons of different clans all the consequences of group-marriage are still preserved, and their children are considered brothers and sisters.

The structure of the Gilyak family thus affords us the [114] opportunity to establish the very genesis of the Hawaiian family, from which Morgan constructed the punalua family. This family originally did not consist of a group of several brothers who were married to their wives in a group marriage, or, on the other hand, of several sisters in a group marriage with their husbands, who might be non-kin to each other. Such a family could not have created the Turanian classificatory system of kinship, for it presupposes the possibility of several groups of brothers or sisters, each group participating completely independently in a group marriage in which the other groups did not share; consequently, common designations for all the brothers according to their marital relations could not have been formed.

* 835 The Gilyak family in its pure, original form gives us an
● 614 actual picture of this family. The family is an intraclan
* 174 organization. Therefore, each group-family represents a generation of all the brothers of a given clan (own and collateral) joined in a group marriage with a whole generation of women from another clan. These women are necessarily sisters, for the daughters of clansmen-brothers, as we have seen, are necessarily the wives of the sons of the sisters of their fathers. Now when, as we have seen, by virtue of [108] /226/ the causes that we have mentioned, this marital obligation became weakened, and brothers began to take wives from different clans and women began to marry into different clans, sisters might turn out to be members of a group marriage with husbands who were not kin to each other, and brothers in the same kind of marriage with wives

/226 cont./

* 835 who were not kin to each other, with this difference, that the
* 174 collective of sisters, upon marrying into different clans,
● 614 would be broken up into several groups, as in the punalua 108 family, while the collective of brothers, always remaining in the clan, would be preserved in its entirety. And since
* 835 the Gilyak family is the most ideal form of the punalua 601 family, it is natural that the Gilyak terminology be the
* 174 most complete form of the Turanian system. Actually, we find in it classificatory groups that must have existed in the Turanian as well, but which were lost with the loss of the [114] system of marriage. For example, in that Turanian form which Morgan once considered the most complete, namely, the Tamil, the two extremely important classificatory terms -- "husband" and "wife" -- are not found.

* 835 The Tamil system, according to Morgan, developed 601 under conditions where brothers had common wives, and
* 174 sisters had common husbands. Correspondingly, in the 171 Tamil system a man calls by the name father, not only his own father, but also all the brothers of his father, and he calls not only his own mother, but also all her sisters his mothers; in like fashion, he calls all the children of the brothers of his father and of the sisters of his mother, brothers and sisters. Corresponding to this, there must have also existed a general term "wife," by which a man would designate not only his own wife, but also her sisters and the wives of his brothers, and likewise a general term "husband," by which each woman would designate both her own husband and his brothers, and the husbands of her sisters.

114 In reality, these general terms do not exist either in the 601 Tamil or in the Iroquois systems. Thus, among the Tamil, 171 a man calls his wife en mainavi, the wife of his brother enanni, en maittuni, the sister of his wife en korlunti, en maittuini; there is the same lack of correspondence with the term "husband" (1).

1. See the table in Morgan.

/237 cont./

I shall proceed to the Tungus nationalities who are predominant on the Amur and spread out to the north up to the shores of the Bering Strait. The marriage norms of these nationalities have been studied by me principally among the most isolated tribe, namely, among the northern Orochi, and I had an opportunity to compare and supplement this information with the data collected among other peoples of the Amur region.

In spite of the fact that in their original mode of life as nomadic hunters and reindeer-breeders these nationalities differ considerably from the Gilyak, settled fishermen and dog-breeders, nevertheless we find a great deal essentially similar in their classificatory system and norms of marriage. As among the Gilyak, the clan is based on paternity /paternitetа/. In each generation of a given clan, the men and women are elder and younger brothers and sisters. The children of these classes are common sons and daughters and brothers and sisters to one another. The clansmen-"brothers," own and collateral, live in a group marriage with their wives, just as among the Gilyak of the eastern dialect, i.e., the younger with the wives of the elder. Here, as among the Gilyak, they prefer to take wives from a single clan, from which one may conclude that again, as among the Gilyak, that marriage from a single clan was once obligatory.

Group marriage also exists with the wife's sisters who are married to members of another clan, but, by analogy with the brothers' wives, among some tribes this marriage includes only the younger sisters of the wife. In two respects group marriage among the Tungus tribes is much broader than among the Gilyak. First of all, each man has a right not only to the wives of his elder brothers, but also to the wives of the younger brothers of his father, whom he therefore calls by the same class term as his elder brothers, namely, aki, a'ga. On the other hand, marriage to the daughters of the younger sisters is allowed and thus that category of nieces is drawn into the circle of the class of group wives. It is

/247 cont./

weakly developed. Among the Gilyak there are very few such outstanding, passionately devoted hunters as are to be found among the Tungus. Nor do the Gilyak, especially during the past half-century, possess the heroic emotions of war. Indeed, what the Gilyak called wars in ancient times were in fact nothing more than sporadic clan skirmishes motivated by vengeance or, even more frequently, were over women. The Gilyak have never known war as a profession, as the favorite occupation of youth. It is natural that their emotional energy should be principally directed toward sexuality. The Gilyak begin their sexual life with the onset of puberty and devote all their leisure, all their thoughts, to women, the more so since by far not every Gilyak, as we shall see, finds it possible to marry. The bachelor youth is not content with the women to whom they have rights in their own settlement; they do not stop with the circle of women to whom they have rights by law. The only category of women before which the Gilyak halts is the class of women prohibited to him. Neither length of time nor immensity of distance will deter the Gilyak from his romantic adventures, if he can but find his fill of feminine society. The young man sets off most eagerly of all, of course, for the village of his "fathers-in-law" --akhmalk'i but he is not averse to undertaking a journey even to completely alien villages. During the time of my travels, young men frequently voluntarily joined me, offering me their assistance without compensation for many weeks, and this was done in the hope of finding occasion for romantic adventures, since this was not so very difficult. Owing to the Gilyak's traditional hospitality and eagerness for any news, the doors of every home are wide open to each new arrival. Thus, the Gilyak feels at home everywhere. A few hours after his arrival in some settlement, he has already managed to spend some time in every home, everywhere relate his news, to which the men and women listen with equal avidity, and has already managed to let his glance fall on some woman who has caught his fancy. The rest is a matter of his amatory experience and art.

/265 cont./

preserved in the form of remnants even among peoples who by now have shifted to paternity, for example, the peoples of the Caucasus, where a tribesman has the right to steal his uncle's horse, if the latter refuses to give it as a gift. Among the Altaians the saying that "a tribesman is worse than seven wolves" has been preserved to this day.

Moreover, the role of the brother in giving his sister in marriage is quite characteristic. In many cases, it is not the father, but the brother who plays the main role in this affair; the agreement to the marriage depends on him, and the bride price is handed over to him.

Not a few other extremely indicative traces which may be considered remnants of maternality have been preserved in the language and customs. Thus, if a Gilyak wishes to say that he is married, that he has a wife at home, he says: n'i-umgarvo ivrà, literally "I have a wife's village" (n'i -- I, umgar -- wife's, vo -- village, ivra -- there is), an expression completely corresponding to the present-day way of life of the Ainu, among whom to this day maternality has been preserved, and often husband and wife live in different settlements, and the former shows up to live with her for several months, and then he returns to his own settlement, so that a man has, besides his own native settlement, still another settlement where his wife lives.

Another example: the term for designating a person's origin is the expression pandos', literally "root of birth." This term indicates not the clan of a man, as would naturally be expected under the contemporary agnatic system, nor the settlement in which he was born, but the place of his mother's clan. It is interesting to note in this case the reverence with which the Gilyak regards the homeland of not only his mother, but also her female ancestors. No matter how distant such a settlement might be, every man tries to find an occasion to visit, and more than once my /266/ Gilyak companions during the time of my travels amazed me by the tenderness and 192 584 [199] orthodox marriage. For an agreement concerning an orthodox /271/ marriage with a young girl there is even the special term tkhagund (eastern dialect tygnydz).

/270 cont./

584 602 [593] Persons participating in the betrothal. On the side of the groom the representatives are: 1) father and mother; 2) brother of the father; 3) elder brother of the groom; 4) husband of the sister of the father. The role of the latter individual is explained apparently by the norms of orthodox marriage. According to this last, the husband of the sister of the father is the father of the husband of the sister of the groom. Since by the norms of Gilyak marriage his daughter cannot marry the brother of his daughter-in-law, the husband of the sister of the father considers it his duty to promote the marriage of his closest akhmalk, the brother of his own daughter-in-law. If the father is dead, he is replaced by one of the urdla n'ivukh (honored persons) among his clansmen. Since the marriage is considered the affair of the clan, there frequently participate, in addition to these persons, several honored clansmen. When the betrothal involves a very wealthy person, the honored clansmen come in several boats, bringing with them at once the articles of the bride price, and frequently, if the delegation plus the rich bride price makes the proper impression, they immediately take the maiden away with them upon the conclusion of the negotiations.

584 602 614 [556] [583]

584 554 556 [533] The bridegroom also attends the betrothal. If he is all alone, or if, on the contrary, he is quite wealthy and renowned, he can become betrothed by himself. In one song the maiden sings to her beloved: "Holding my hand, betroth me."

595 584 614 Matchmakers are unnecessary in the case of a married man who wants to marry a second wife. Then he himself usually goes to the clan of his first wife, but often the latter herself goes to her own clan or to another one (if there are no suitable candidates in her own) for the selection and betrothal of a new girl-friend for her husband.

593 584 614 [602] /271 cont./

The bride is customarily represented by the father and mother, but for the final decision the attendance of representatives of the clan is required. The latter, both those of the bride and of the groom, intervene in the negotiations, but their participation is rather passive. In resolving the question, aside from the consent of the father and mother, the wishes of the brothers play a part. Frequently the wishes of the latter are decisive. Here is a remnant of maternality.

593 584 [538] In the epos the role of the brothers stands out in sharp relief. In one story which I wrote down, a father, when his son informs him of his intention to give his sister in marriage, replies: "Do thou but think upon it only after hearing the counsel of your younger brothers!" It is noteworthy, also, that the role of the mother, despite the fact that women generally /272/ do not participate in community affairs, is no smaller in matrimonial affairs than that of the father. This, however, is the case only on Sakhalin; on the Amur the wishes of the bride are not considered, although the negotiations are conducted in the presence of the maiden, who sits silently in her accustomed place among the trunks with her dowry and waits for the decision concerning her fate. Ordinarily her role begins when the matter has already been decided, and it only remains for her to submit. And if she does not have a lover to whom she has promised herself, and if the bridegroom is more or less attractive in appearance, she ordinarily tosses off the laconic phrase: "Since you wish this, is it for me to contradict!" But it may happen that the maiden, upon the appearance of the matchmakers with the bridegroom, immediately runs away and does not return until the departure of the matchmakers, and then the matter frequently ends in naught (1). The bride, however, appears on the scene at the [171] 1. It is interesting to note that among the Negda, whose customs, as a result of ancient matrimonial ties, are as a rule similar to those of the Gilyak, considerable differences were noticed by me.

584 184 [593] [562]

/278 cont./

583 554 735 chance to establish an independent economy. But there is another side to the coin -- it is almost impossible for a poor man to settle down with a family, and, consequently, an independent economy. But to a certain degree the rights of group marriage and the possibility of leading a common domestic life with his brothers come to his rescue. Everyone's dream, however, is to settle down with his own family. Usually the clan in the persons of the well-to-do clansmen comes to the rescue of the poor man. But not every clan has rich people, and, besides, there are persons whose clan has died out. The only solution then is to obtain a wife by work. Usually such a transaction is entered into by a family in which there are no offspring of the male sex, and it is as though the son-in-law were declared an adopted son, although, as a member of another clan, he cannot be an actual heir. Methods of lightening the payment of the bride price are practiced: a wife is purchased in small installments with yearly payments until her majority. But also in the purchase of an adult, /279/ installment buying is sometimes practiced, depending on the contract. A curious means of paying the bride price is the case of payment with the bride price of a future daughter. I know of such a case. The Gilyak Kanka married the sister of the young boy Pletunka. He did not pay a bride price, but he promised to support his widowed mother and to hand over to him the bride price of his own future daughter. And the agreement was fulfilled. Pletunka was about twenty years old when Kanka gave his own daughter in marriage, and he handed over the whole bride price to Pletunka.

[183] [614] [476] 583 554 452 735 583 735 554

583 614 [627] As a matter of principle the bride price belongs to the clan. At a difficult moment of life, for example, if it becomes necessary to pay blood money, each clan-member takes part with his shagynd. But usually the bride price is distributed among the brothers, although not proportionately; the youngest, as heir to the house, usually receives the smallest share. Besides this, the elder brother buys a wife for the younger brother before his own marriage, so that the younger brother does not need the shagynd for bride price. Along with the distribution of the bride

/281 cont./

583 584 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry. Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 614 [686] /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 686 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

[596]

/285 cont./

117 Settlement of Mayya. 1) The clan of Yugin. His clan is 614 also in Vayr -- they are the masters of Vayr, but it happened that 103 one brother killed his brother, and then they separated and divided the fire: "If friend kills friend, who will be born?" 2) The Beldy clan are former Goldi who came down three generation ago. 3) The Polmk clan. Gilyak from the river near Mikhaylovskiy. They have been living here for five years (1896).

Settlement of Mongol'. The Valdzu clan from the village of Val' Orosugbu -- from the same village where the wars were. Dz:aj from the village of Dzhay.

The Valdzu are four generations /kolena/ from Uval'-khotin on the Sungari -- Solodo. When they arrived here, they found only the Sigdyli (nami) clan, but these all died out (1896).

Settlement of Koyma on the upper Amur. 1) The Choril came from Tro -- one to Kol', a second here, a third somewhere else. 2) Bajal -- the Manchu or Solodo clan from Kozima. The Bajal seem to be the first who lived here; later on they were called to Kizi, and then they came back and they were given a starosta.

Settlement of Geri. Kern -- khal-Dea. Runaway Chinese [169] came here on a raft during a war and attached their raft by a [363] hook, formed a clan of their own, and then became Gilyakified. Later the Manchu came, confirmed the name of this clan, and appointed starostas. Dua-Tvanbfing (Pat) Ajumka from Tymi-fing.

117 /286/ Settlement of Puli. Samagil -- two generations from 103 the Gorin. The father of the informant raised reindeer. 2) Tumuli -- 173 from Dzhongli, near the Perm ones: Goldi.

Settlement of Ukhta. Tyvl-fing -- inhabitants of Tyvl' -- Ulcha clan (Ulcha khala). They left for Kol' and formed Tyvl-fing, but came back by way of Lake Chlya (a three-day trip) -- "six fathers since we came back," i.e., six generations ago. 2) Dea -- burn their dead; ancestors of the narni, went down to Kol' and came back as Gilyak. Dea -- Kern-khal. Dzhatala -- the settlement of Udyli.

/286 cont./

117 Settlement of Mykhyl'. Ygna (Langr) -- Kugi from Rui (now 103 Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin).
173 Settlement of Lyyvo (third pad'). Dea to Koyma, pure Ornyr (Ulcha from Sakhalin), came "long, long ago."

Settlement of Akhcha. Arkhong kugi (Ainu). Came to the Goldi and formed one clan with them (they gave to a Goldi the wife of a dead brother). They, however, live in Tebakh, from which they came to Akhcha five generations ago, as well as to Chil'mi.

117 Settlement of Tyl'mi. Khok-khal was taken into Kern-
103 khal on account of the war (before the arrival of Russians). Khok-173 khal killed Kalmfing, an inhabitant of Kal'ma, over a woman.
628 Khok-khal was small. Then the murderer said to his kinsmen:
682 "There are few of you; leave me, let them kill me." The Kal'ma people came and surrounded the house. He got through a chumashka with kaluga /Huso douricus/ oil. Then an old man opened a window for him, and he jumped out; the brother killed him from behind with a spear, but he managed (before that) to kill another with an arrow, and again a casus belli. It was then that the Kern-khal adopted Khok-khal and gave it its widow; they broke the fire and bought a bear.

117 Settlement of Tvarvo at the mouth of Petrovskiy Bay. The 103 Alrong clan -- Kugi (Ainu), which several generations ago mi-
614 grated here from the south. This clan is also in Tebakh.

Another clan, Narlaf, came from Nyura two generations ago (1896).

117 In Taura, Chil'ba, and Tyr -- the Goldi and the Negda speak
103 their own language. If the father is Goldi and the mother Gilyak, 191 each of the parents speaks to the children in his own language, and the children speak both languages.

In the family of the Gilyak Kando the children for the most part speak Goldi, the easier language (1896).

117 Settlement of Tyr, Tyri. Khal Khok (Hóinchá) came here
103 and departed. Six generations of it live here. According to a 173 legend, a long, long time ago its clan (Chukchajl on the Amgun)
[614] came from the upper reaches of the Amur. The leading party

/287 cont./

117 they saw in their dreams that during the daytime when no one 103 was present the tiger slept with the little girl. Six times he slept, 173 six times "a boy was born." Then they argued and separated in 539 different directions. Four generations have lived here. The Tyr branch adopted the Kugi. The Goldi also have their clan (1896).

117 Settlement of Kuk, ten and a half kilometers from Kal'ma.
103 Chilba-khal (Goldi) -- speak Gilyak and bury their dead in the 361 ground (1896).

Settlement of Tkhnalo (two kilometers from Kuk). Kern-khal (it is also in Tauro, Tyl'ma, and Takhta; 1896).

Settlement of Kabachi (three kilometers from Tkhnalo). Kern-khal, Takhta-fing, Chalym-fing (1896).

Settlement of Takhta (four kilometers from Kabachi). 1) 614 The former Khydz:yr clan. One family speaks Gilyak; they bury [103] their dead. 2) The Choz'm clan /288/ (from chozmudz: -- to [361] peck in a flock, like birds) Nag: ramlandz: (nag: -- lair and fish milk) came together. The Choz'm are poor people. They quarreled with some Gilyak and entered into a clan union with another clan and merged into one clan. Choz'm also live in Kal'ma. There are also Choz'm (1) in Pilavo. The Tvan-fing and the Chilba-fing have Goldi laws and language. Kalma-fing. This khal is to be found also in Chil'mi and Khez'; they seem to have come from Pilavo. Kern-khal came from Tyl'mi; two Manchu, woman and a man, were sailing on a raft and shouted: "sinch arikhal munydz:nŋ? which clan will draw me up on the bank?" They were seized with hooks on the raft.

1. See below, "A Legend about Pilavo," 1910.

117 Settlement of Chil'ma. Chilma-fing from Pilavo, near 103 northern Sakhalin. One clan of Chilma-fing is from northern 614 Pilavo. Three brothers: one went south (Pilavo); another came here; the third went to the Goldi (1896).

/288 cont./

117 Settlement of Pilavo-khez' (five kilometers from Chil'mi).
103 In this settlement exclusively the Pilavyng clan (1910).

Settlement of Khez'. Exclusively the Pilavyng clan.

Settlement of Tebakh (Tevkh in Gilyak). Three yurts in 117 all, about 30 persons. The Arkhong clan -- Ainu; came from 103 Kosunaya on the Ptonga and set takh -- a sharpened stick; from 162 behind came a man, and the stick fell in the direction of Iski. The Arkhong clan is to be found most of all in Tebakh, further in Akhcha, Chil'mi (one house), and in Iski (1910). The Ignan together with the Arkhong who live in Akhcha constitute one clan: in Akhcha -- the Goldi half, -- the other half in Tebakh, (1896).

117 Settlement of Machala, opposite Khez'; two yurts of 103 Negidal (1910). In 1896 the Khez'-ping and the Negidal (Ry) lived here.

Settlement of Pachi (Bachi). Twenty-two families, about 117 100 souls. Nine Russian houses and two Uigryf. In it, the 103 clans: 1) Tva-bing (Tva was the settlement beyond Mkhyl' near 162 Pat). 2) Aimkan live in Plakh (Pilavo), below Mariinsk. They 614 used to live on the Amgun, but the brothers fought and several brothers left for Plakh, taking a piece of the fire -- tuur rodzz -- "to make a fire." There they became Ornyr, and then, a long time ago, in the times of the Japanese, they migrated from Korsakov to Tevkh and Kal'vo. There are two old lezing here, and also one in each of the following places: Kaki, Mago, Vasin Cape, and Tamlavo. 3) Pyri-fing clan (two yurts), an old village opposite Kal'vo. In the past, a long time ago, Amgun lived here. The green pine forest -- Tuuz; in Ukhta -- the Olcha (1910).

Settlement of Nykikh Khez'bin (one from Pilavo), on the 117 channel Nyy Machalŋ. About 20 Gilyak here, and also Amgun 103 N'askhagil, who in Gilyak are called N'as'khon. Two from 162 Pilavo settled here in the last ten years (1910).

/289/

117 Settlement of Kal'ga (the Gilyak Kalvo). Two clans:
103 1) Four yurts Lezing-ran-tva-bing (from lezing + tan, -- maste 614 The Lezing-ran are a Tva-bing generation (hyn'izlykh nyz'i). They caught many bears and had a large lezing. They quarrel while still in Tva and left long ago for Tamlvo. Now they are in Eg:li (Yali) and in Mago. 2) Pyrifing: three Lezing and three Uigryf (1910). One woman, Ry -- umgu -- female Negidal. 3) Lezgrang from the Sakhalin Tamlvo. 4) The Pyrifing Ornyr came from above; the oldest clan is here. 5) Narmlang from above, near Khabarovsk; the Goldi (1896).

Settlement of Mokraya (Mokhrvo). Clans: 1) Narmlang (Ornyr:) -- Pyrifing (Ygdymsyl from Kizi', where there are man Here, three houses of them; they have lived here for four gen-[162] erations. 2) Lezgrang -- one house, 17 persons. All of the Gi seem to have come from the Amgun (hynk) and settled down o the Amur. One Uigryf (1910).

Settlement of Mago. Clans: 1) Mot'-tan (Ornyr:); 2) Lezgrang (one house); 3) Naromlang; one house, three famili (1910).

Clans: 1) Lezgrang, 2) Pyrifing, 3) Tyvlafing, 4) Hutyv from the Tym' River, 5) Narmlang, 6) Pnarnung (1896).

Yoom-bal' -- a mountain six and a half kilometers abo Vaydy; in former times Gilyak from the settlement of Yoom lived here. On the left bank of the Amur, beyond Yoom, ther is a small bay, and beyond it a high bank with bare white k:aned'zh dzif (limestone) (1910).

Settlement of Vayr (Vaydy), in 1896 there were three cla 1) Keg:n, 2) Hirlung (Hirlung and Shafping), 3) Lumr-ping. N only 12 Ornyr, 10 Gilyak, 17 Hirlung (see also below), 13 Sha and 7 Lumr-ping are left. The Keg:n -- Olcha are from the settlement of Aur; four generations are in Vayr. There were t brothers, the eldest brother took a Hirlung wife; he was follo clan to change residence and to withdraw more and more from their kinsmen. Before my eyes, in the course of a few years, whole clans -- family after family -- in search of more advantageous hunting and fishing sites, moved to the most remote regions, from the Tym' to Taraika (in the territory of the Ainu), to the Amur, etc. Discord between clansmen and wars play a specific role in the dispersion. In the chapter on the history of the clans we saw what a huge role these factors played in the shuffling and distribution. A clear illustration is presented by the history of the Pilavo clan that we introduced; from /201/ the southernmost outlying districts of the Gilyak territory, bordering on the Ainu, they migrated first to the northernmost part of the western shore, near Cape Marii, and from there a part of them moved to the lower reaches of the Amur and, finally, to the middle Amur, almost in the environs of Khabarovsk, where they became completely Goldified. It is true, all the numerous branches of this so widely scattered clan, although they have not even preserved any ties among themselves, have remained exogamous up to the present, but to continue their old phratral marital relations has been completely impossible for them. To a greater or lesser degree, such phenomena are taking place even now. This is precisely the reason why in real life, just as in the epos, it happens again and again that a Gilyak must travel hundreds of versts to find a wife from the proper clan, but such individual acts of heroism cannot be performed by everyone, and willy-nilly there remain exceptions. Most often such a lone person is obliged to have himself adopted into an alien clan and to marry the widow of a member of the adoptive clan and thus completely separate himself from his old phratry.

/200 cont./

If it is not just unmarried individuals who move, but whole families, then their offspring willy-nilly begin to enter into marital unions with the nearer clans.

/266 cont./

174 611 614 186 reverence with which they approached a settlement where, according to them, one of their female ancestors had once lived.

In several places to this day, to a question about origin, the Gilyak point to the places from where their mothers and wives came. For example, in the settlement of Nyyvo at the mouth of the Tym' river on the eastern coast of Sakhalin, they reply to the question about the origin of the inhabitants of that settlement, "We are Nyurskie," i.e., come from the settlement of Nyur, which is on the northernmost tip of Sakhalin, and, when I asked for an explanation of this strange answer, it was explained to me: "Because we take wives from Nyur."

Thus, these people reckoned their origin according to the place of the homeland of their mothers, for, as we saw above, the wives of the Gilyak are taken predominantly from the clan of the mother. I shall introduce still another interesting remnant.

553 184 614 611 Usually at the present time children are given names according to the clansmen of the father. Such is the general rule, but there are still places (for example, the settlement of Nanivo on the west shore) where they give names according to the brothers and clansmen of the mother; thus, it is as though the children were members of the mother's clan.

602 611 174 [582] [614] All these are remnants which are entirely out of line with the agnate organization of the contemporary Gilyak clan, but they are remnants which are intimately bound up with the present-day psychology of the Gilyak. For the Gilyak themselves they are not remnants; this is made clear mainly by the marriage norms, according to which spouses are cousins, the children of brother and sister, and the members of each clan preferably take wives from one and the same clan, so that the psychologies of paternity and of maternality cross each other, and in the main between male and female lines there does not exist that gulf which is present in those agnate organizations where the Gilyak norms of marriage are not in effect.

/269 cont./

584 582 my children and your children also be akh not give your daughter to my son, you wi the old law, that will be bad. Let us do e ing to law ('live pure')."

[583] After such a reminder, rarely does an even though this obligation entails the loss such cases they either do not give a bride a very small one, if the akhmalk is not an Unorthodox forms of concluding marriage.

177 178 614 433 556 [582] circumstances led to the destruction of ort in the clans of akhmalk'i. One of the cau lation of the clans from which they took w pelled them to marry women of alien clan perhaps the most important, was an econo about by their contact with the cultured p East, a contact which gave impetus to the hunting pursuits for commercial exchange.
formerly had no value, such as the skins o became objects for which one might obtai of luxury, such as expensive cloth, valuab ornaments, but also food and spices, such and, finally, alcohol and tobacco. Even Gilyak clearly remember the time when sa to run around fearlessly in great numbers n dwellings, and no one /270/ killed them, ferred to dress themselves in dog hides. A in exchange for these beasts it became pos

177 178 556 582 584 [584] the most desirable objects. A tremendous took place in the psychics of the Gilyak a ships of the people among themselves. If dream did not go beyond attaining the rep person, urdla n'ivukh, i.e., an outstandin his catch with his tribesmen, now urdla n'i synonym for "rich man," whose dream wa quantity of luxury objects. Self-interest a peared upon the scene, as well as the desi malk'i. If you do l completely break everything accord-

yone refuse his duty, of property, for in price, or they give ancient one.
The most varied hodox marriages ses was the depopu-ives, which com-
s. Another cause, mic one, brought eoples of the Far development of Objects which
f the sable and fox,
n not only objects le weapons, and as rice, groats, nowadays the bles and foxes used ear the Gilyak since they prend all of a sudden sible to obtain change inevitably d in the relation-formerly a man's utation of a good g hunter who shared vukh became a to amass a nd boasting ape to excel others

/270 cont./

in one's own wealth, although it only amounted to the possession of several pieces of silk material, Japanese sabers, and so forth. There appeared on the scene a tendency toward differentiation. The rich man desired to associate with and become related to only rich people. In the question of the choice of a wife there appeared new dictates. One demanded of a wife that she be from a family of equal wealth and, consequently, of an equally high social rank. And now, even in the ancient "tylgund" -- legends -- there is heard in matrimonial dealings the expression: "He (or she) is not my equal." On the other hand, wealth allowed one to manifest a special fastidiousness in the choice of a wife, to seek women who were famous for their special qualities, who were outstanding for their beauty, their domestic talents, their artistry in sewing, and other feminine tasks. But once marriage came to be practiced between members of alien clans, the former simplicity of concluding marriage vanished. There appeared on the scene the new institution of bride price, which introduced into the institution of marriage the element of purchase-sale; besides this, marriage between persons of alien clans demanded preliminary negotiations and the procedures of betrothal. We now turn to these institutions.

The terms of betrothal. The procedure of betrothal is expressed by various terms, denoting literally, "to agree, to come to an agreement about the bride"; hence, the matchmaker -- "the man who makes an agreement"; bride -- "future wife"; groom -- "future husband." For us, the terms for groom and bride are particularly interesting. With orthodox marriage there is no special term for groom and bride, for according to the right of birth the groom is called pu -- husband, and the bride -- an'g:ej. The term jokh, which is used nowadays to designate the bride, is entirely inadmissible with orthodox marriage, for, as we have seen, with orthodox marriage jokh is a term of prohibition for sexual intercourse. Thus, the term itself shows that the procedure of betrothal arose after the weakening of the regime of orthodox marriage.

/289 cont./

by two brothers. The Keg:n -- came from southern Pilavo. Recently arrived Olcha are here also; the starosta arrived here 12 years ago. The Keg:n arose from the Goldi from Sofisk and the Ainu from Kryus-pal', their ancient settlement (1896). The Shafping are Amgun from Dal'dzhi; many many generations ago their fathers spoke Amgun. The Hirlung are the old inhabitants. Their clan is in Chil'bi and Kekhrvo (the Orochi). The Chilbifing are the Ornyr from Kekhrvo -- the Lumr-ping came from Udyl' (Hurulong in Gilyak). There is no more of this clan in any other place (1910).

They came to be one clan in the following fashion: An Olcha married a Keg:n widow, and then he bought a bear for a dead man. Without taking a woman, it is impossible to become a (common) clan. When the clans united, they had one Lezing and one Uigryf ("sinning" house, i.e., forbidden.

Settlement of Yali (Eg:li), four kilometers below the settlement of Mokraya; seven yurts. Clans: /290/ 1) Lezing-ran (one house); 2) Chilng-fing (Kedu'-Orel' -- lake), probably Negidal; 3) one family from N'anivo (1910).

Amng-khal, Narmlang, Jarli-fing (Goldi from the Khungari), Jegni and Njenkhajfing. With regard to the origin of the last clan, there is the following legend. One Goldi brother wanted to take off the or (see below, the settlement of Kol') from a girl, and another suggested killing her. The killer left for N'enkha (near Nikolayevsk).

Settlement of Kaki (13 kilometers from Vaydy). Before the epidemic there were 20 houses here; 5 yurts. Three Russians, one Uigryf. Clans: 1) Tvabifing -- 14 persons. 2) Amng from the Amgun: only three persons were left, the rest died. Three houses died out during the last epidemic (1910). 3) Kegnang from Choma. 4) The Tvan-fing. One old man says that he is down from the Goldi, another from the Ul' River near Avra. 5) Amn-khal -- Goldi; they came from above; the first master of this village; this is the oldest khal. In the past this was a large khal but then all of its inhabitants died out (1896).

Settlement of Chkharbakh. Torkhung-khal (1896).

/290 cont./

117 Settlement of Tebakh, a village some 20 years ago (1896).
103 Vas'. Cape Vasin. 1) Levkh-ping. The cape lies next to 614 Nalevo; 2) Derkhr-vun (1896).

Kuklya and Meo. The first master of the village before the [162] Russians was the Keg:n clan; now nine persons are left; they live in Vas' (1896). Meo-fing, from Khayma above Bogoroditskoye (1896).

Settlement of Kol'. Clans: 1. Miera-fing. Miera -- the oldest khal -- this Chvunung khal (Larun) came from the north from the Ali River (a two-day walk from Shantar -- Kyvrmif); then the khal separated, and part of it went to Sakhalin (Larun, [133] Ylevut). It takes women from the khovnung. The Ali is a river as broad as the Amur. A long, long time ago Y'lur and Gilyak were one khal. They heard that the Aleut, too, raise dogs and hold the bear festival. 2. Tigr tor ping. A man sailed on a hovykh (raft) down the Amur. The Machinskiye Gilyak caught [582] him and brought him here in a boat. Takes women from the Perkhvung. 3. Kedz:ung (from Petakha) -- takes women from the Khovnung. 4. Perkhvung (from Sakhalin). Takes women from the Khovnung. 5. Nynkhaj-fing and Khovnung from the settlement of Kyr beyond Sofisk where the Nynkhay River is (they came from there -- chinirokh). There is here in Kol' one khal from Khovnung. It takes women from the Langr. 6. Khovnung (Goldi). Two brothers quarreled and decided to divide the or -- chain and stone on the little girl of one of the brothers, and then killed her.
[582] They have an Ainu dagger with a silver handle. Take women from the Snarnung. 7. The Snarnung take women from the Perkhrvung. 8. The Tyvliing -- from Ukhtr, near Sofisk (Ornyr). Takes women from the Perkhvung.

/291/ The old man Nashg (86 years of age): his clan has lived here for at least 150 years, in his opinion, eight generations. At the present time his khal is Snarnung. His ancestor came from the Amgun; at the mouth of the Amgun he set up a post, but it fell down. He traveled with his family to Lake Chlya and crossed to here. Now his clan is on the Amgun -- N'as'khajl. He came on foot. He also broke the fire. He bought the Tyyv River (a tributary of the Kol') by exchanging his sister for it (1896).

/297 cont./

but we have daughters and in-laws, and it is necessary that everybody know, and therefore necessary that we should celebrate a common bear festival." Each k:khal should buy one, or better, two-three-four bears. They agree. They buy a bear and prepare mos'. The bear is fattened as fat as possible; they feed it about two years; they prepare mos' and buy racing dogs. The time for the festival finally arrives: they play games, wrestle, then kill the bear. Before the killing of the bear, an old man is selected -- he does not have to be the bear's master; he is the nga khez'-ni'vukh; he cannot decline. He says the word to the bear: "Chi pilá pal´ urgur p'ach adz: kukujá pkhylava:r chajpidugujá!" -- thou, big mountain (mountain man), shake off well our Gilyak dust. Turn around so that I can see you."

They killed it, cut up its meat (the bones must not be broken), brought it into an isba, and boiled the meat. They compete in a "race" -- vardz:. They call together both clans, men and women, and distribute the bear meat to all. As a rule, the elder consults with the master on how to divide the bear. The main bones are the two tibial bones -- tereng, and the two pelvic ones -- pyjkh. The tibial and the pelvic bones are given to the most honored persons. It is a sin to give the head and the kidneys to the young people, the kidneys are very important. The khlaj n'ivukh then says: "K:khal m´ekh:r: ólagu k:khálgu umguólagu umgugu-tokh itdz: furará; navat m´er: chuz´n´akhr: ngar: /298/ n´akh:r: munakhana. K:khal itdz: furará: "umgu n´i ó:la, utku n´i ó:la, umgu n´anak, n´i n´anak, n´i nanak´ar. Nafkhá-chi n´anak furará navát, chiagr. Ni ykyn furará n´an ch´ach´ek munakhana." Another representative answers: "Agitlá, pilymra siktumù mer: vará tyngyztá ching ag:yr: ningrota, ningagr vara chingrodá, n´ishak lyt k:khal, k:khal munakhaná." "To the children of the two clans, to the clans to the little girls and the women I say: 'Now we shall become common meat and common blood.'" The clan speaks thus (1): (Every) woman is my

1. Evidently, one representative of a clan to another.

/298 cont./

614 796 539 child (daughter), (every) man is my child (son), a woman -- an elder sister (also aunt) is my sister (my aunt). Now thou, comrade, art called sister; thou, too. I am an elder brother, but I shall now also become your younger." "Of course. We all equally did great things together. You also helped us and we also helped you equally. Once we have formed a clan, we shall become a clan.

"Elder (i.e., the person chosen for the distribution of the meat; he may be young)! Think well; do not give the good to big girls, to big sisters (aunts), or to sons-in-law /zyat'ya/. Give much to the big people, less to the little girls, feed the kidneys to the big old man of the clan, serve the head; distribute the back fat equally, do not share unequally. Give the tibial bone to the elder sons-in-law, give the pelvic bone to the sons-in-law. "Pilynga urgur kymlyjá, umguolagu pilý, nanakagù pilý, ok:ongú-tokh urlý chus´ ngokh ta rozgujá, pila n´ivukhdokh malg:ógur khet´ijá umguolagudokh khiskioguja! K:khalgu pila, hejmartokh, tafut jarjá k:orkh khet´ijá. Tereng pily okhomdokh khitirá, pyjkh n´yn´yv póradokh khet´ijá, mur:k ngokh vará rozjá ta rozgujá..."

614 796 After preliminary consultation, a certain person finally brings in the bear and hands it over to the important person, who then, in the presence of several urdla n´ivukh (good people), inquires: "Why?" The person who brought in the bear answers: "I want to enter into ceremonial brotherhood." "All right."

Next k:khal are consulted without him. During the festival the new clansmen buy dogs and prepare food. During the eating [606] the son-in-law says analogous things, while the fathers-in-law call him father-in-law, brother-in-law, etc. At the end of the festival they give the adopted one their own flints -- tugur:, but they do not give him the real uig tuur (the tabooed fire). There are no more than two or three uig tuur in a village. They light the fire at a bear festival; on a hunt only the urdla n´ivukh takes it when he goes for bear.

/298 cont./

614 A bear festival is held also for other reasons, /299/ for 796 instance, for reconciliation with one's son-in-law /zyat'/, k:khal 606 or alien. If a person offends his son-in-law, for example, in 627 making a purchase, he keeps silent, and the k:khal keeps silent, they will continue to sulk until a bear festival is held by the offender for reconciliation (urla lytnydz).

796 A bowl, hyl, for the head is necessary for each new bear 415 festival. The head of the bear is always placed in a new bowl, while the old one is used for meat and the like. Anyone can prepare a dish for the bear festival. The bowl for the meat is bound with the penis of the bear. A bowl from which the bear is fed for the last time in the yurt, and always on the side opposite the door, is called pukstov-n´ir.

796 When a brother gives his sister a bear as a gift, he himself 431 is not permitted to bring it; he must come after it with pomp. [231] The bear is greeted with zadz-chadz music. When the master feeds his bear for the last time, he says to it: "U´rur humyjá! Wingan úrur humyjá--live well! When you go, live well."

The gift giver does not shoot the bear and departs as soon as the festival is over, without even tasting (a morsel), while he must bring with him mos' and all kinds of dishes.

796 When a bear falls sick, then they hold pylng-tvysk and prepare uig, mos', from all sorts of delicacies and all sorts of berries. Luk: -- a dog which has been born specially for the uig.

[782] When a dog is sacrificed, its skin, head and bones are laid [184] in a wooden frame near the lezing where the bones of the bear are placed. Some clans hang bear heads on trees. This place is called k:ork ngangof.

V.

Slaves

567 The son of a slave remains free to the neck (i.e., his head [196] is free), his grandson -- to the belt, his great grandson -- to the feet; in the fourth generation -- the descendants are "pure." [683] Then he is a k:khal, i.e., a kinsman of the master, and if anyone [614]

/299 cont./

567 calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore [683] when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he [614] replies quietly: "Pilavon k:khal purará hokhagirn os´ krygrys" (1)

1. Krygrys -- an Ainu slave; akh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root [195] slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your neck, while there you are impure."

/300/ If a krygrys bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, an economy, and part with him, he would still be considered a krygrys, impure. Every krygrys was considered a k:khal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was avenged, and he participated in the sacrifices. A good krygrys [692] is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khlaj-n´ivukh; older women have the right to participate in a trial (th are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings.

A krygrys woman cannot demand a share in court, becaus she is married. Nor can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, akh, has the same rights as the krygrys. [682] A free one is kistylygy n´ivukh ("pure"). The killing of a slave [614] is punished by the clan. When drunk, they revile the murderer: "If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila k:our big mountain bear, mer edr: -- tiger), fight with him: it would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated us. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courag in front of your wife." The women in particular attack him. Even at the present time, however, the descendants of the [162] krygrys are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Takhta.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase [582] of Ainu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

/302/

595 A person can take two sisters as wives. Brothers may take 58 widows without distinction. It is best of all to take a wife from the clan of one's mother, and then one can even get her for nothing, and even if a payment is required, it is less in any case. In the past one did not pay for a woman if she was from the clan of one's mother. It is not permitted to exchange women between clans. Here, too, one's daughter is given for sale to the wife's brother, but the latter cannot demand this.

582 There is a prohibition against the descendants of one's sister down to the fourth generation.

• 614 In Vaydy (see above) there are Gilyak of the Hirulung clan 173 who have entered into a union k:khal n'akh:r: with the Khydzyr' in Chil'bi. Formerly, they lived together in the same locality and belonged to the clan of the tiger. There is a Gilyak clan which has become related to a snake (there are snakes on the Amgun; they were seen on the Amgun by Putyun) (1). There are also Goldi who are kin to snakes.

[114] 1. In the text, "boa," but, judging by note 6 on page 222 in Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora /Materials on the Study of the Gilyak Language and Folklore/, this is a mistake in the notes on the journey.

538 A young man from Vaydy fell in love with the wife of a 839 Korean, a Gilyak woman, and enjoyed reciprocity. She went to the town with a fish; the Korean stayed to guard the potatoes. Then the lover went to the town. They met and spent two weeks in the town. She came home -- her mother also liked the Gilyak.

The Korean demanded that his wife sleep with him, but she resisted. At night the Gilyak woman ran outside and slept with the Gilyak. The husband gave her a beating; her mother and brothers tried to protect her; the Korean complained, why did he take a Gilyak woman. He killed the Korean (settlement of Mago).

/302 cont./

578 Quarrels and methods of reconciliation. If a son-in-law /zyat'/
627 has beaten his brother-in-law /shurin, wife's brother/, he must (present) a pack of racing dogs (three to five; they are sold only in packs) -- kylyn k:an. The first dog is kyly-k:an, the second -- k:akh, the third -- jerkhpe-k:akh, the fourth -- tyly-k:akh. If the first is sold separately, all of them will be useless. They are placed at a certain distance (10-15 paces) from one another and in reverse order, namely, the first -- kyly-k:an -- last, farthest away, and she must catch up with all of them and the object is that all should come together at the same time, and,
[435] if the kyly-k:an arrives first, then it is not suitable. The cost of a pack is up to 100 rubles. The son-in-law /zyat'/, in case of [437] a fight with a brother-in-law /shurin/, gives him such a pack of dogs as a present, and, furthermore, he brings them himself or, if he is ashamed, through another, and they cannot be returned, [435] except if the dogs are poor. On the other hand, if a brother-in-law /shurin/ offends a son-in-law /zyat'/, he gives for reconciliation a silk robe (35-60 rubles) or a bear as a present.

578 /303/ Quarrels within the clan. N left his wife, received back
• 614 his bride price, and began to carry on with Russians and so forth.
627 The old men assembled and decided to take the woman back, but the father-in-law did not agree: "A woman is not a dog, to try and throw away." Nevertheless, she was purchased for a certain young man. Then N, in Khez', began to storm and threaten because they took his abandoned wife. But they replied to him: "You did not buy her yourself but with your father's money" (clan money). The matter ended by their giving a racing dog, fur, and two bottles of vodka.

695 The oath. Oath -- simbi chakhci lambe -- in Goldi, chkhyz'u
685 nyydz:rá -- in Gilyak.
825 One must kill a wolf (lygyz') and saw, in order, the tendons on both hind legs from the heel to the knee, and ask: "Where is the tendon for the thief? (ennikhrongz'? ennikh -- heel, tongz -- tendon), where is the stolen tendon? -- jeng:az' tongz' shamdzhna?" The tendon that twitches is taken out secretly and

/303 cont./

685 dried and preserved until there is an argument about a theft.
695 They seek a man who understands the oath -- chkhyz'u n'ivukh, [825] and this gift is passed on by inheritance (now the best clan is the [424] Chkhyzyl clan; Il'ya Tobonka from Chil'bi belongs to it). If
• [614] outsiders try, then it is a great sin.

A thief frightened by the threat of the oath arrives in the village of the plaintiff with his khal'gu -- clansmen; they make a large fire on the bank.

The plaintiff and his people also come out to the campfire; he shouts: "Pryja', mygja', n'i heg:at pkhalgun polagun prydz:rá chigry' tuur pugutá enan'ivukh, jugut prydókh kaukrá, par:k prydz:rá. Ni sidzymral'ó, sidz:jejmraló cherakh jot'in (prydz:rá) helá eg:ur pkhog:e jakhgujá," i.e., "Come, come down, I and my kinsmen are frightened, I came here with my children; a fire is lighted on your bank; no strangers came with me, we came alone (I do not know anything). I came to you to ask what is the matter (what is the guilt). Well, hurry up and tell me what is on your mind." That one sends an envoy -- khimu n'ivukh'a (a leader during war) with a spear, on which he leans instead of a crutch, and he begins to speak. The thief sends a khimu-n'ivukh'a. Nothing results, and it is necessary to take an oath. The visitors and the local people then arrange themselves on both sides of the fire. The "juror" is also present at this point. They argue: "Ni valchg:aj n'erakh elvg:az'ó -- if I lie, let it go badly for me."

The juror slowly begins to warm the tendon in the fire, the thief begins to twitch, and then he confesses (pyimdz). "Yrk pyimdz: vurará. Navat taktó jakhojló. Ching vark kymlyvé" -- "I confess, /304/ for what else can I do. Think about it yourselves." If it is a false accusation, then the real, absent thief would begin to twitch.

The victim is paid whatever he demands, and, if the thief is poor, the victim is given a woman. The juror is provided for at their discretion. The juror, when they take out the tendon, says to the crow and cat: "I do not know whether it is true or not, do not harm me, for you, too, do not know. If this actually is the perpetrator, let the harm be to him." "Ni tajorá mykyslu jag:yd-lu ta-n'erokh tokh elyvgujá. Chi narl'ár: chan majg:okhaná. Mykyz' mra lytyng ivg:aj huktókh elyvg:az'o." While they argue, a crow (ves') and a cat are thrown into the fire alive. If the crow caws, the man also caws and gets into the fire. If the cat mews, so does the man.

/304 cont./

An oath is performed for an inveterate criminal, wishing him death; the thief will twitch in any case. The crow and cat, while they are burning and still struggling in the fire, are told: "Chi tajrodz: furará n'ivykh lerý mra chi unakhana uikhyndor hy nivukhdokh elyvgujá." "You do not know, you will suffer for a petty offense (i.e., you will serve as an example to the Gilyak), following the law of sin, let it go badly for that man."

Only a certain khal knows the oath with each particular animal. There is a clan whose k:khal is a wolf -- kekhr: ping chnarpung. They caught a wolf. They went hunting seals. The wolf was sitting on the ice, and it had been carried into the estuary. As soon as the hunters saw it, they approached the bank, bow first. That wolf came and sat on the bow of the boat. They wanted to kill it, but took pity on it. They let it off and let it go. Sometime later these same (people) were hunting, and a bear attacked them. Then that wolf appeared, began to circle round, attacked the bear and saved them. Thus (it happened) many times. This wolf multiplied and was frequently encountered (as a rule there were few wolves there). Chnar-pung do not kill a wolf, but whenever they see one they feed it. When the hunters, having killed many seals, leave the whole carcasses, the wolf spoils them, but if a Chnarpung is left, then he does not spoil them. They journey into the taiga, and the wolf goes along close by; they leave yukola, mos', and so forth there. The Chnarpung may call him atk. Wolves, like tigers, are of two kinds: docile and not docile.

This same wolf tendon is used in another way. When something is lost, they fashion a stuffed doll, like a man, out of a rotten piece of wood and place a seal bladder on its head. They bind its neck with a wolf tendon, and at night they walk around and knock in the corner of the first yurt, saying: "Pyz' nyngjá -- look

Amur

824 /312 cont./
778 Only representatives of the clan, k:khal n'akhr:, gather 782 at the place where the chédzigr stands. They bring rice, buda, [614] a pig, and vodka. Before the tree there is a bench /labaz/ for dishes. The pig is slaughtered, and its blood is sprinkled around with the comment: "Kur, indyjá -- god, look!" No images of any sort are made on the tree.

The tree is also a road. Everybody gives to the tly-n'ivukh; the sacrifice goes along the tree, then along the thread which goes from the tree and serves as a trail. They start a fire in order to tar the pig. They do not feed the fire, but they do protect it, do not stamp it out. It is absolutely necessary that the sun shine during a sacrifice, and therefore it is occasionally necessary to wait. When a balagan is placed in a new place, they make a new chédzigr.

796 Tlyrokh -- Sacrifice to the sky. Everyone assembles in one yurt.
782 Early in the morning they set out in search of a larch (for the chédzigr), while the women prepare various dishes; then the tree which has been brought in is made fast, and all the dishes are [184] carried in Chinese or Japanese dishes. There are villages where the tlyrokh is never made; in Tevkh only a red dog pag:r kh:an:, is slaughtered instead of a pig and a cock. They tie it up to the chédzigr, strangle it, cut out the heart and throw it upward, treat one another with vodka, and rub the chédzigr with vodka. They celebrate once a year in January -- chamlong. The "word" during tlyrokh: "n'jongarja kinynguch: humguja", kholafti lygyguja," i.e., "please, that I live well, that there be no sickness."

Then they make a new birch bowl (han'gar:), place it on the ground, and put the sacrifice in it. Ski, a stick, and a crossbow (narródz:) are placed there; the "word" (prayer) is not said, and they quietly leave. At home they "make" a fire, and when everything is cooked, all the sacrifices are placed between coniferous branches and then placed between two forked pieces of wood (tuurg'a'vk); the fork is thrown into the fire and [illegible] taken back. This fork is placed under the head at the end of a [789] [776] hunt to protect against the milk'a (the evil spirit). In /312/ the

/320/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Sakhalin Gilyak

I.

Religion

773 Cosmogony and the spirits-masters. Kurn, the master of the uni-
[776] verse, created everything; in the past everything was water; he "made the earth, the stream, and the tree." "Working" the earth, Kurn lost his reindeer, which turned into Lavro-pal. The large rivers are the tracks of his reindeer, while the small streams (were formed) as he waved his lash at the reindeer -- tlangi-z'ach:.

821 The sky -- tly -- is like our earth, but it moves, turns first [772] with one end, then with the other. When the sky moves away from us with its sunny end, night falls.

The stars: the largest are as large as a yurt. They are white, and therefore they cannot be seen during the daytime; in the light of the sun they become pale.

The sun: shines at night in Mlyvo (the world beyond the grave).

793 People descended from a tree: the Orok from a birch, the 824 Gilyak from a larch, the Ainu from a fir.

• 776 The master of the mountains and of the taiga, Pal' n'lgyvyn, 614 looks like an Ainu. Each clan has its own Pal n'lgyvyn.

821 Thunder lives in the water in winter, and Pal'-nivukh pierces him in the eye through the water; in summer thunder attempts to avenge this. Since Pal'-nivukh has the ability to turn himself into the most minuscule creatures and to get under the skin (?) (1)

1. Illegible. S. Sh.

of a person, a Gilyak, when his finger itches during a thunderstorm, immediately lets some blood; otherwise thunder will kill the man in order to kill Pal'-n'lvukh who has gotten into the finger (a story by Gibel'ka, heard by him in Nyyde).

/328 cont./

764 To be burned is better than to be buried.

766 The one made the first mos' for a drowned man is not burned after death, but buried in the ground.

A drowned person, if he is of another clan, is not burned, but is inclosed in sticks.

If the deceased was murdered, he is not carried into the yurt, but is placed beside it. Near the place of the cremation of the murdered person, they place a "vagn'" -- a tree with the roots /329/ upward. Those who have been killed are carried off the field of battle by both sides to their villages.

764 If a person dies in a balagan, he remains there (until the funeral.

A raf (a little house with a little door, over the grave) is 764 made in a month, or in two, three or four months, when there is 349 time. A raf cannot be set up in winter or spring, for the earth is frozen, and in autumn as well. During this time the deceased is absolutely not fed. A raf is prepared by common efforts.

On the day of the preparation of a raf, as on the day of [784] cremation, all forms of work are prohibited for the clan members.
• 614 It is prohibited to fish, to go hunting, to make a dog sled; it is prohibited to sew, even to "make one's head," i.e., to comb one's hair, but one can sing songs. Members of alien clans are allowed to work if they did not observe the work on the construction of the raf, but the members of the same khala, if they know that a raf is being made, even if they live in a different settlement, are forbidden to work. The master who helps in the building of the raf does not receive any reward; that is a sin.

The walls of a raf are made of boards. The roof is made as on an actual house. In the middle there is a k:khak:, a double board with a stopper which closes an aperture -- kylmyz' (navel). The sharp stoppers go through a round piece of birch bark which is placed over the aperture. In the upper section are stuck a spear, arrows, hooks, and a knife. The k:khak: is wrapped in a piece of drel' of a trapezoidal shape and fastened, tied to the navel; the upper part of the k:khak: remains bare. On top of this, in front, there is an apron of the same shape, which is decorated

/338 cont./

752 thank you!" If they do not exchange them, then one of them 789 will drown. After this they become friends. One must rescue [572] an alien khal, and even good Russians (not the tramps), but a
• 614 drowned person from another clan is not cremated, but is sur-[628] rounded with sticks.
[766]

After the rescue and the shavynd procedure, the shaman must /339/ carry out his procedure: he sends his spirit kekhn to Tol for a small soul, which lies there on a small bed.

When a person who was drowning returns in a boat rescued from death, he and his wife must break the old chumashka and make a new one. If it is not broken, husband and wife will die.

766 A man who drowned or one who was eaten by a bear will [785] be a god.
[776]

A drowned person is placed in a boat; the kinsmen get into another boat and float without rowing; they let the first boat, with the deceased, go ahead, and the deceased is cremated where it carries him to the bank. Hooks are used for pulling the body onto the bank. Inau are placed near the place of cremation. When the Tymovsk Gilyak travel to Tro, upon seeing the inau they throw chukh-chugynd (sacrifices) into the stream.

752 A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacri-
782 fices a dog to Pal-n'ivukh and makes chukh-chugynd.

/347 cont./

101 spring up even between primitive peoples is curious and yet characteristic: the Tungus with indignation and proud contemptuousness deny their kinship, not only with the Gilyak, but even with the Orochon, saying: "We are the Tsar's people and baptized, while the Gilyak and the Orochon eat dogs!"

101 829 The Gilyak themselves include themselves in the Mongol-Manchu tribe, asserting that the Gilyak and the Manchu are "khal-nyakhr" ("khal" -- clan, people, tribe; "nyakhr" -- one). The Gilyak also consider the Chinese and the Japanese kindred peoples, saying that a Manchu was "ytk-utgu" (father, ancestor, man), and a Japanese was "ytk-umgu" (ancestress, woman), an assertion which will be clear from the material below. The Sakhalin Gilyak speak a language in common with the 199 language of the Gilyak /348/ living at the mouth of the Amur and on the continental coast of the Tatar Strait, but quite distinct from the language of the Lower Amur Gilyak and the Tungus.

103 127 As to the question of the appearance of the Gilyak on Sakhalin, there is no doubt that they are arrivals from the conti-

174 nent. The materials of the 1891 census and observations and interviews with the Gilyak equally confirm in this case a conclusion which could have been made a priori. The census first of all proved that the settling of the island by the Gilyak went from the north to the south. The ancestors of the Gilyak of the settlement of Tyka, for instance, came from the settlement of Nyur, which is the northernmost settlement on the western shore of Sakhalin. Of the two foremost clans in the settlement of Arkyyvo,

[614] one comes from the settlement of Nyanivo (in the north of Sakhalin), the other from the settlement of Tanga, whose inhabitants in turn belong to the ancient clan of the settlement of Choma (on the continent), etc. The census further proved that each clan of the Sakhalin Gilyak is only a branch of a clan which lives along the continental coast. Finally, the language,

[184] religious beliefs, customs, and morals and manners of the Sakhalin Gilyak are identical with those of the Gilyak of the continental coast,

/353 cont./

601 614 This form of family-kin relationship serves as the basis for the social organization of the Gilyak and is the basis of their clan organization ("khal'" -- clan, also clansmen).

From what has been said of the primitive family of the Gilyak, it is obvious who constitutes their clan. All of the brothers (of all degrees of kinship) of the father of some Gilyak NN are his fathers (ytk), their fathers are his grandfathers (ate), their children are his brothers ("ruvn"), their grandchildren are his children ("ola"), and mutually. It is this huge family of grandfathers, fathers, children, brothers and sisters that constitutes the clan of the Gilyak. It is understandable that a clan so constituted [162] may be composed of a great number of people. In one clan in northern Sakhalin, I counted 150 people, and this is only a branch of a clan which lives on the mainland.

But the clan of the Gilyak is organized on the male basis. Even though the children of a sister of NN's wife are his children (ola) and they are considered brothers of his own children, if these sisters of the wife are married to Gilyak of a different khal', then they, i.e., the children of these sisters, will be alien to the clan of NN. Similarly, only the wives of clansmen and their unmarried daughters belong to the clan, and, conversely, when married, a woman passes over to the clan of her husband, while the dissolution of the marriage brings her back into her father's clan. Here are the principles which regulate the life of a clan:

1. The clan has only four degrees of kinship: grandfather and grandmother (atk and ytik), fathers and mothers (ytk and ymk), brothers and sisters (ruvn), and children (ola). Clansmen call one another "khal'" in contrast to aliens. To distinguish own brothers from own kinsmen of the first degree of kinship, the word khal' is added, so that clan brothers are /354/ khal'-ruvn, clan fathers -- khal'-ytk, etc. The elder of the clan, whose role will be described below, is called "khal'-geymar." Clansmen as thinking and acting social units bear the name of "khal'-nivukh."

/354 cont./

614 2. Marriage within the clan is absolutely forbidden. This is a basic and inviolable principle of the clan. However broad the marital rights of the Gilyak are with regard to women of the categories mentioned, however broad the views of the Gilyak are on the relationship of men and women in general ("love forgives everything"), within the clan neither marriage nor adultery is encountered, even as an exception.

614 587 3. The wife of a deceased Gilyak is transferred, following the decision of the clan, to one of the ruvn of the deceased, generally to a younger one; even though she be assigned to a ruvn who is older than the deceased, he is obliged to support her, although he cannot live with her as with a wife. But under no circumstances can the wife of the deceased pass to the persons in the ascending or descending line of kinship from the deceased, i.e., to his khal'-ytk, atk, ola. Generally speaking, as a rule, a woman living as a wife (de facto), with someone may under no circumstances belong to anyone in the ascending or descending line of kinship with her first husband. This rule is observed as strictly as the prohibition against internal marriage. Therefore,

614 [829] it is easy to understand why a Gilyak looks on many marriages concluded among us between near relatives as incest. From this it follows that it is of the utmost necessity for a Gilyak to know all his clansmen, who are often very numerous and, in addition, scattered over the most distant parts of Gilyak territory. This knowledge of his own clan constitutes one of the elements of the

[867] mental upbringing of a Gilyak. This knowledge passes from father to son, it is renewed with life, and is the possession of the

[623] whole clan. In doubtful cases of kinship, the questions are decided by the elders in the clan.

614 73 4. The khal' supports all the old people, the sick, the incapacitated, and other helpless persons. Generally this is done by the nearest kinsmen, but, in the absence of such, the person is supported by that yurt of the khal' where he wants to live. "We do not have any beggars," one Gilyak told me, "if someone is poor, he is fed by the khal'."

182 /354 cont./

614 796 5. The members of the clan are bound together by common sacrifices and festivals. The "festival of the bear," known to

[874] everybody, is held, not by an individual settlement, but by the clan, even though /355/ guests from other clans are invited to take part. The bear is bought by someone in the clan, but all the expenditures in connection with the festival are covered by the clansmen. These expenses often reach a sum of several hundred rubles. Clansmen assemble from all directions, as well as great numbers of specially invited guests from other clans, who have to be entertained and fed for many days, and not only they, but their numerous dogs as well, devour a great amount of food during the festival. The opinion that the bear festival has a religious character or that the bear is considered to be divine or a spirit by the Gilyak is completely unfounded. The bear festival is purely a

[224] clan festival. Naturally, there were times when a successful attack on a bear, an attack conducted in those days collectively, by the whole clan, was a real triumph for the clan, which devoured the huge beast at a common feast. Since the attack on the bear was most conveniently made in winter when the sleeping animal was captured in his lair, the custom of celebrating this holiday in winter was perpetuated. The experience of centuries evolved a full ritual for the festival, which, like everything old, assumes in the eyes of the barbarian the character of something sacred and inviolable.

[782] All the sacrifices during the festival are made, not to the bear, but

[776] to the god of the taiga, the master of the bear -- "Pal'-nivukh."

[825] It is also understandable that the bear itself has acquired a position of honor: Its meat cannot be thrown to the dogs, it cannot be eaten with seasonings, etc. "Pal'-nivukh" himself will exact revenge for such offenses, ordering other bears to bite especially [562] hard. To sum up, the bear festival is a clan festival, and, on this basis, women, as the nonpermanent element of the clan, are not present at the killing of the bear, although they

614 participate in the eating of it. The fire in the stove in which

392 the meat of the bear is cooked is started only by the clan

[252] steel. A touching custom among the Gilyak is

/355 cont./ A touching custom among the Gilyak is

614 392 169 connected with this steel. When a clan is divided and part of it emigrates to another place, the elder in the clan (khal'-geymar) breaks off a half of the steel and hands it over to the elder among the departing clansmen. With this steel the new settlers will light the fire on a new hearth at the bear festival, and it will be handed from clan to clan for the same purpose. Hence the expression "to break the fire" came to signify the separation of the clan. This custom reminds us of Greece, where those leaving their native land to found new colonies used to take with them the sacred fire of the home altar.

614 225 782 [562] Another clan festival is held in the spring before the hunting of the seal. On this occasion, too, the expenses of the refreshments are borne by the /356/ clan. With the approach of evening, when the moon rises, the entire male population of the clan (again the women are excluded) goes to the seashore. Here, in long troughs, they bring all the choicest viands which, carefully prepared, had been left untouched for the moment of the sacrifice. Then all those present squat down and each throws into the sea a handful from each trough as a sacrifice to the deity, pronouncing the customary formula of prayer: "Kur niongu-khia!" ("God, please!"), after which they gather in one yurt, where the refreshments begin, in which the women take part.

614 682 628 6. The khal' guarantees life and security to each of its members from encroachment on him by the individuals of another khal'. The means is clan vengeance.

[177] The settling of Russians in the region, it is true, has weakened considerably the efficacy of this institution, but has not destroyed it. Every murder, intentional or unintentional, calls for clan vengeance. The closest clansman of the murdered man -- his father, son, or brother, and in their absence his other clansmen -- must, in the figurative expression of the Gilyak, "raise up the kindred bones" (nyn'vo yozynedzh), i.e., kill the murderer or at least some person of the male sex of his khal'. And the wrath of vengeance is so great that not even newborn children are spared. I have heard that the unhappy mothers of such children, out of fear of the avenger, have resorted to

/296 cont./

The following case occurred in Macha (the left bank of the Amur), opposite Kal'ma. The Gilyak set out to hunt and built a balagan; coming back they saw a great number of people. Then they ran away undetected, gathered together people from all the villages, and set up ambuscades in different places behind the rose-willow trees. When the Russians came out, they shot them all.

Sometimes the Gilyak used the following method of fighting: They tied a cut tree trunk in such a way that it leaped out and struck the legs, and the enemies fell; then they completely killed them off (the settlement Kaki).

Recollections have also been preserved about the relationship between the Chinese /297/ officials and the Amur natives. The Goldi even paid for dogs, the Gilyak -- per person; the Chinese officials collected by whim, and their khalki (boats) with people had to be fed. In exchange for this, they gave receipts which gave one the right of entry into the town of Sungari (Ychkh-khotin). Otherwise the natives would be tortured in the town. The storyteller, a Samagil, in his youth went without a receipt; he said that they paid 40 rubles for a fodder /kormovogo/ man and 20 rubles for an ordinary person, and one sable from each person.

IV.

The Union of Clans and the Bear Festival

Two clans come together -- k:khal m'ek:r: vytch. They come together in a single yurt; outsiders may also be present. They discuss, and, if there are no obstacles (for example, they have not taken wives from one another), the khlaj nivukh declares that the two clans may join into one. The other representative answers: "It is true, we have accomplished great things together; you also helped us, and we also helped you. Once we form one clan, we shall become k:khal." He says: "There are no obstacles. Our sons and daughters will be our brothers, are excluded from acts of vengeance. It is understandable tha from the first moment of the murder there begins a painful, burdensome period for both clans. The clan of the murderer l under a true sword of Damocles, awaiting a stroke from any corner, at any time, and in any place. The clan of the slain feverishly tracks down its victim, who is on the lookout and in case does not intend to give up his life cheaply. At the same in the first minutes immediately after the fateful murder, the of the murderer sends some person from a neutral khal' (necess neutral; a clansman would be killed) to the clan of the murde man with apologies and an offer of ransom. But not always, a in any case not speedily, is accord obtained; sometimes years pass until, weary of the unsuccessful hunt, the clan of the ave consents to a reconciliation.

I shall describe one of the many variants of the procedur reconciliation and ransom. Each of the hostile clans selects fr some neutral clan an able and eloquent /357/ man ("khlay-ni literally: orator -- from the verb "khlayndzh" -- to speak, an the noun "nivukh" -- man). These will be the intermediaries tween the parties. Each clan provides its khlay-nivukh with a gown, a cap of the same material, bow and arrows, a spear, a sometimes a Japanese saber. This is, so to speak, the official uniform of the intermediaries. One fine day, an armed deputa of khal'-nivukhi (clansmen), with the avenger and the khlaynivukh at their head, appears near the hostile settlement. The somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. F here the khlay-nivukh of the avengers sets out for the village o the murderer, where in one yurt his assembled clansmen khal'- nivukhi), with their orator at their head, await the emissary. latter, having sat down and lighted his pipe (necessarily with h own flame), begins to set forth the demands for ransom. The role of the khlay-nivukh consists of stipulating as much as poss
The clansmen of the murderer reply with excuses and with a pl for a reduction of the conditions of the ransom. But the khlay-

/370 cont./

his wife half to death. Even his ruvn, in such cases, does not escape without a severe lecture, while among the Amur Gilyak even the ruvn finds no mercy. But such bloody vengeance is absolutely required only when the seducer is caught in flagrante delicto. Fear of Russian justice has weakened the force of this bloody custom, and frequently in such cases the matter ends with a sound thrashing. The modern method of securing a wife gradually worked itself out from the old clan arrangements, from the collective and individual abduction of women from another clan and the subsequent reconciliation by means of a ransom, transformed in the course of time into the modern bride price. But even today the custom of the abduction of women exists among the Gilyak of both Sakhalin and the mainland. In part it is a corrective against the coercion of womanly sensibilities in the contemporary form of marriage, in part a reaction against the purchase of wives, not possible for every Gilyak. When a Gilyak comes to like a woman, either a maiden or a married woman, and for one reason or another it appears impossible to obtain her in a peaceful manner, /371/he arranges things with a group of his clansmen, and one fine day (usually in the summer) when the men are out of the yurt, the boat of the abductor draws near the settlement, and, profiting by the absence of the men, they bear away the desired woman. Abductions sometimes take place by preliminary agreement with the woman, or sometimes without her assent and even against her will. A substitute, or counter, produce counter-abductions, even with an armed hand (I know of one instance where a group of 14 men armed with spears and guns broke into the yurt of the elder of a settlement at night and bore away a woman), but in the event of failure the matter ends with reconciliation and the payment of bride price. Not infrequently the abduction is performed by the father of the woman himself, or at his instigation, in those instances where the son-in-law does not fulfill all the conditions of the bride price and at the same time does not voluntarily return the woman he has purchased. To this day the Gilyak regard the custom of abduction as a normal phenomenon: it astonishes no one and is censured by

/372 cont./

583 property of the whole family, but the personal money earnings of the son-in-law, as well as the sables and foxes that he obtains through his efforts and skill, remain at his disposal, which makes it possible for the son-in-law to attain an independent standing in time. But in general the payment of the bride price by labor is not frequently encountered, for the sale of the woman is too enticing a prospect for her kinsmen, and moreover the Gilyak have not yet grown accustomed to asking for the labor 583 of others. The bride price is paid to the father of the bride, or,
614 in his absence -- to her brothers, if they are adult, otherwise -- to their guardian, i.e., to that clansman-ruvn to whom they, along with their mother, have passed; in the absence of any brothers of the bride -- to that same ruvn of whom we just spoke, that is, the one to whom the mother of the bride has passed; in the absence of such -- to the brothers of the father, then to the distant clansmen-ruvn, but in general to clansmen of the male sex. Originally the bride price was always given, not to a separate individual, but to the kin(clan). And even now always among the Tungus, fellow tribesmen of the Gilyak, the bride price is paid to the "nasleg," i.e., the clan. And this is perfectly natural, since originally the bride price was a ransom paid to a whole clan, which was avenging the abduction of the 580 women. This primitive significance of the bride price is re-
614 flected in the custom whereby the wife of a deceased Gilyak al-583 ways remains in the clan of her husband and passes, according to the decision of the clan, to one of the brothers (ruvn) of the deceased (only to a younger brother, however, and only in the event of the unwillingness of the ruvn to marry the widow does the return to the clan of her father, while the children remain in the clan of the husband. The obligation of the clansmen-ruvn
614 with regard to the widows of their deceased ruvn reminds one of 672 biblical story of Boaz and Ruth. The bride price is either paid all at once or in part in advance and in part some time after the bride moves to the home of the groom.

583 There are instances of the sale of children of the female 584 sex. A Gilyak purchases for himself or for his young son a young

/379 cont./

556 with a feeling that is strange for people with a primitive mode of life. There is fear and respect and even reverence in this feeling. That a rich man should injure fear and respect is a thing easy to understand, but the feeling of some sort of reverence has its own peculiar source, not completely alien, however, to our understanding. In primitive society the rich man ordinarily had his personal talents to thank for his material success -- hence the respect for him. But since all human success is at the same time a gift from the god, the rich man also stands out as their favorite, their chosen one. The degree to which the Gilyak are inclined 556 to attribute supernatural origin to wealth can be seen from a widely 171 diffused legend among them concerning a certain Tungus, still living today, who amassed his wealth by unscrupulous exploitation and robbery, a legend which affirmed that this virtuous man /380/ had secured his wealth thanks to a golden rain which showered down upon him when he was hunting in the taiga. And this golden rain was, of course, a favor from the god to his favorite.

605 Since the Gilyak have notions of property, these naturally 432 exist among them contracts of purchase and sale, barter, loans, 437 etc., but most frequently of all, of course, these contracts have 434 the character of barter.
426

Two words about debt obligations. The Sakhalin Gilyak 422 does not borrow money: his debts arise principally from the non-fulfillment of one side of the property obligations of a contract.
[184] Interest is charged only for property, however. Interest is known [D97] only to the Amur Gilyak, who borrowed it from the Manchu, but even among the Amur Gilyak interest is extorted only for the loan of money or sable skins, but never for loans of any other nature. The 614 popularity of debt obligations among the Sakhalin Gilyak con-
[672] sists, first, in the fact that there is no period of expiration with regard to debts (complaints about the payment of debts incurred 30-40 years before arose not infrequently), and secondly that in the event of the insolvency of a debtor and his closest relatives or after the death of these persons, the clan, in the person of the clansmen, answers for the debts. The fund from which debts are made good, in the event of nonfulfillment of the conditions of a

1: Shternberg--548 E-5 (1890-1897,1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

[The eastern coast and the Tym' Basin]

/388 cont./

162 The ratio of the number of males to that of females (416:287) is such that there are 694 females per 1,000 males. In Russia there are 1,023 females per 1,000 males, and in Asia as a whole 960
165 females per 1,000 males. The infant mortality rate is 33.7%.
231 Every Gilyak, on the average, has two dogs and each adult Gilyak, 422 three dogs. There is very little hunting equipment, especially 411 guns, on the whole.

The Tymovskie and the Okhotsk Gilyak belong to 18 clans (2), 614 162

2. The property of each person has been [I26] transferred to this or that clan, the figures on the number of clans, etc.

of which especially numerous clans are: Chuy-guy in the settlement of Chayvo (114 persons), Ady-Tymovskiy (156 persons), Mymyzi in Nyyvo (94 persons), Urlandzh in Chayvo (55 persons). The most notable settlements in population are: Chayvo (151 per-361 sons), Kekhrvo (86 persons), Nyyvo (46 persons), Yelshrvo (61
103 persons), and on the Tym' -- the trinity of settlements, Ady-Tym' 162 and the neighboring Khomrvo and Plyuvo (106 persons), not counting the immigrant population from the western coast, Moz'bvo (Rykovskoe, 56 persons), and others. Communication between the 20 first two of these settlements, Chayvo and Kekhrvo, is extremely 361 difficult; aside from the shallow water, the journey is difficult [484] because in several places it is necessary to carry the boats over long stretches of dry land. As has been mentioned above, there is communication from the settlement of Kekhrvo to the village of Pomr and the western shore.

133 North of Kekhrvo the coast is uninhabited, and summer
484 travel to the north is extremely difficult and completely impossible along the shore itself for lack of any means of transportation 484 across the wide mouths of numerous bays. The only means of 432 transportation is on reindeer by way of the taiga and over the mountain ridges. If one adds to this the fact that a draft reindeer makes its way with great difficulty in the summer, it is clear how difficult and slow such a journey is.

/653 cont./

428 nearest male relatives of the deceased, that is to say, brother's and father's brother's sons, or nephews and cousins of the first 428 and second degrees, but always only on the father's side. The 428 Gilyak say that in such a case the inheritance belongs to the kall 614 of the deceased. To explain this, I must point out that they 601 make a definite distinction between the relatives on the father's side and those on the mother's side: the former are called ngafk and they alone are regarded as related by blood; the latter, on the other hand, are merely called ömal or ömal, which means roughly "friends." The wealth of the kall, that is, the customary term of address which the Gilyak use among themselves as well as to a stranger, and which one uses them, whereas the much more meaningful naifkâ is only rarely heard and then only when they are speaking to one another. The totality of the ngafk, the paternal relatives of a Gilyak, constitutes his kall. This word, however, does not mean merely tribe /Stamm/, kin group /Geschlecht/, kindred /Sippe/, but also name. At kall, then, is exactly the same as a kin group bearing the same paternal or family name among us. It is the Goldi hala, which originally designated only a family relationship, but later, used by the Manchu government for administrative purposes, it was given a meaning going far beyond the family, which will be discussed in detail in the next section. The Gilyak, however, who were always outside Manchu rule, have been hardly affected by this /654/ and cling to their original conception of the kall, which is restricted to the family in the manner indicated above.

614 In view of all this, it might be expected that they also have special names for their various kin groups, and, indeed, I do not doubt but that they do have them. I never heard them use one, however. This may perhaps be explained by the fact that, as a rule, only the closest members of a kall have personal relations with one another, and they are aware of their membership in the same kin group without the common kin-group name. Moreover, the practical significance of this membership is considerably reduced for the Gilyak, in that it plays no part whatsoever in one of the most important family occasions, the conclusion of marriage, for among them, as has already been

/654 cont./

614 mentioned (1), and differently than among a number of other

1. See p. 1035, above.

peoples, members of one and the same kall may marry each other.
562 From the description of the Gilyak law of inheritance it became 428 evident how greatly the male sex is favored over the female sex among them and given preference over it. According to this description the woman not only has no right to an inheritance, but is herself inherited, first, as a girl, from the father to the brothers, and then, as a widow, to the next brother of her deceased husband, so that she can never make arrangements for [592] herself. The only thing left for her is to establish for herself, as a wife and mother and through the means and talents given her by nature, an influential and recognized position in the house, and among the Gilyak she succeeds in this to a not inconsiderable degree.

171 A law of inheritance very similar to the one among the 428 Gilyak is found in the case of another Paleo-Asiatic people, the nomadic Koryak, whose chief possessions consist of their reindeer herds. According to Ditmar (2), among them, too, only the sons inherit the property of the father, and, to be sure, in equal shares, but the daughters receive only those reindeer which have come from the animals presented to them when they were born. Furthermore, among them, too, upon the death of an unmarried brother, 171 the surviving brothers share equally what he left. But if the de-587 ceased was married and leaves a widow, she goes to his youngest 428 brother as a wife, if he is unmarried or a widower, and, if this is not the case, to the second youngest, the third youngest, and so forth, always under the same conditions. On the other hand, she may never become the wife of an older or already married brother of her deceased husband. Hence, if among her

2. Bull. de la cl. hist.-phil. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., Vol. XIII, p. 125; Mél. russes tirés du Bull., Vol. III, p. 33.

428 /654 cont./
587 brothers-in-law none fulfills these two conditions, she becomes 171 free and may marry an outsider if she so desires (3). /655/ In [113]

3. The custom that the widow of the older brother goes to the younger brother, but the widow of the younger brother becomes free is also found among the Samoyed of the Turukhansk region (Krivotshapkin", "Eniseisk. okr. /The Yenisei District/," Zap. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., 1863, I, Res. and Mat., p. 178. Tret'yakov", "Turukhansk. kraj /The Turukhansk Region/," Zap. Russ. Geogr. Obshch. Po obshch. Geogr., Vol. I, 1869, p. 403), among the Yakut (Sauer, Kap. Billing's Geogr. astronom. Reise nach den nördl. Geg. Russlands, p. 164), and other Siberian peoples.

428 In 171 principal, therefore, the Gilyak law of inheritance is very similar 428 to that of the Koryak, though still a few degrees more unfavorable for the female sex.

614 While we saw above that among the Gilyak the paternal 607 relatives enjoy rights that are not available to the maternal rela-625 tives, on the other hand, they also have obligations which the latter do not have and which more than ever characterize them as blood relatives. This obligation appears with the practice of blood revenge, which is still widespread among the Gilyak. Like all primitive peoples, the Gilyak, too, adhere to the principle that every act of bloodshed committed against a human being requires retaliation in likewise bloody fashion, either by himself or by his relatives. And they believe no less firmly that if this requirement is not met, the person or persons guilty of the omission are bound to be punished by misfortune, all kinds of hardship, or even death. This notion, generally widespread among them, exerts a powerful decisive, and enduring influence upon the behavior of both parties, the active as well as the passive one, in committing acts of bloodshed. It is in the interest of the attacker to commit his act from ambush in as unexpected and startling a manner as possib

/655 cont./

614 and then in swift flight to reach a safe hiding place offering pro-602 tection, in order not merely to escape immediate revenge in 628 this way, but also to make it more difficult or even impossible for the opponent to carry it out in the future and thus expose him to the unavoidable evil consequences of neglected blood-revenge. The Gilyak therefore usually executes an act of bloodshed resolved upon in his heart in the most treacherous manner with the ngawla-dshakko, the large knife which, always worn at the belt, arouses the least suspicion and which he can most easily and inconspicuously plunge into his opponent's side while he is sitting beside him in apparent peace and eating a meal or smoking a pipe. Having fled to his native village, he will henceforth avoid setting foot in the village where he committed the act of bloodshed and will also carefully avoid its inhabitants elsewhere. The victim, however, if he has escaped with his life, henceforth thinks only of how he can take revenge on his enemy without delay, for the more time is wasted, the worse he can expect the consequences of his neglect to be and the more fraught with danger the future
159 looms before him. The power which this constantly nourished 628 superstitious fear can exercise over the mind and the entire being of a primitive man was vividly brought to my attention in one case. The Gilyak Nenjdan, a respected man in his village (Allof), who visited me occasionally in Nikolayevsk and to whom I owe many an interesting bit of information concerning his people, was one day, when he appeared before me again after a long interval, in a strikingly downcast and depressed mood: his otherwise erect and quite stately figure, such as I seldom found among the Gilyak, appeared somewhat stooped, his eyes looked straight ahead, staring and sad, and words would not come. Since I would not desist from directing various questions to him, he finally broke out with the words, "I must die soon," and when I then asked whether he was sick and what ailed him, his answer was, /656/ "Not sick, and yet I must die soon." This thought seemed to dominate him completely, and then he told me the following. On a trip to the Manchu, while trading with them, he quarreled with a Gilyak from Kaki. The matter finally ended peacefully, however, and he regarded it as closed and forgot it to such an

/656 cont./

159 extent that after their return home he once traveled from Allof
628 to Kaki and stopped at one of the houses there. His host and hostess, well known to him, were quite friendly toward him; in the evening, however, after he had eaten the meal offered him, a man lying next to him on the sleeping bench, the very one with whom he had had the quarrel, suddenly thrust his knife into his side. Returning to Allof, he soon recovered from his wound, but his blood enemy had set out for Langr the following night, accompanied by a relative, and had not been seen again. Meanwhile two years had passed, during which he himself had in vain gone to the greatest trouble to find any trace of him, but he could not go to Langr itself, because he is a stranger there, whereas his blood enemy would have the secure protection of his relatives. Thus, even in the future he had no prospect or hope of getting rid of the obligation for blood revenge weighing upon him, "and therefore," he concluded, "I must die soon." I do not know what happened to him later, for I did not see him again, nor did I hear anything about him. Undoubtedly, however, the psychic condition in which such a superstitious fear of death puts primitive man can have a fatal effect simply through its influence on his physical condition and his behavior in the manifold dangers through which his life moves. And in this way, as well as in consequence of the universally practiced logic of post hoc, ergo propter hoc, the superstition connected with blood revenge is constantly nourished and spread.

614 Carrying out blood revenge is in part made easier and in 602 part more difficult for the individual because it is not restricted
628 to those who directly participated in the act of bloodshed, but also more or less involves their relatives and imposes certain obligations on them. Among the Gilyak, however, these obligations do not extend to all the relatives, but only to the ngafk, the paternal relatives. Without any qualifications and with all the consequences, they are faced with the obligation for blood revenge if the person concerned lost his life through the act of bloodshed, either immediately or as a result of wounds received, and is therefore no longer able to carry out the revenge himself. It must then be carried out by the son, brother, brother's son,

/656 cont./

614 grandson, etc., depending on the degree of kinship. No ngafk 602 of the person slain can refuse to accept this obligation if it is his 628 turn. On the other hand, if the person wounded by the act of bloodshed comes away with his life, the carrying out of the blood revenge remains reserved for him, but his ngafk have the duty to help him by finding out the whereabouts of his enemy, trying to arrange a meeting with him, and helping as much as possible in carrying out the revenge, indeed, if need be, even stepping in for him. Quite similar obligations exist, on the other hand, for the ngafk of the perpetrator of the act of bloodshed. /657/ They must do everything to thwart the designs of their opponents and to protect their relative from the revenge threatening him. Thus blood revenge with the demands and obligations growing out of it creates a strong family tie which arouses and preserves the consciousness of solidarity and homogeneousness in all members of the same paternal kin-group. The larger a kin group is, and the stronger this consciousness is in it, the more protection and help it can offer each one of its members. It is therefore understandable that the members of a paternal kin-group like to live in one place or within easily accessible proximity and also that those members who, as children and as a result of a second marriage of their widowed mother, moved away with their stepfather do not like to become estranged (1).

1. See p. 1062 above.

The solidarity of all the ngafk among one another with respect to blood revenge further offers each individual and especially the members of larger kin-groups a certain guarantee [157] against wanton bloody attacks. And this is of no little significance in view of the easily wounded, vindictive temper of the Gilyak, treacherously reserved, but quickly resolved on an act of bloodshed at a favorable moment. Most of their blood feuds, however, arise from serious motives, especially from the abduction of women so common among them and the conflicts brought about by this. Often, however, only petty motives, an imagined insult or insignificant damage to property or profit, as, for

/657 cont./

614 example, in the above-mentioned case of Nenjdan, drive one to 602 bloodshed, and then the instinct of self-preservation may keep many 628 a one from plunging into the hornets' nest of a strong and large kin-group. Quarrelsome and rapacious members of such a kin group, however, confident in the protective power standing behind them, may be goaded on all the more in their wantonness and may let themselves be carried away to commit acts that lead to blood feuds or that are a direct challenge for blood revenge, as, for example, is said of the Tammla-wo Gilyak on Sakhalin by their countrymen on the Amur. On the whole, however, this abuse does not nullify the beneficial effects which blood revenge with its rules has among the Gilyak, in that with the legal relations still unregulated, it gives the individual a certain amount of protection, and, to be sure, it strengthens the basis of every social arrangement and development, the family.

Concerning the family relations of the Amur peoples living
648 adjacent to the Gilyak, the only ones who, as was pointed out
198 at the beginning of this section, can be spoken of here, I must limit myself to a few statements tied in with the above remarks about the Gilyak.

/658/ In the preceding chapters the high degree of equalization that has taken place between the Olcha and the Gilyak in all aspects of the external life has been discussed -- an equalization which must be regarded as an assimilation of the former by the latter. This kind of equalization has also taken place with regard to the family relations of the two peoples, which, in fact, become the basis for the most penetrating and enduring manifestation of this assimilation, both externally and internally.
[582] And the medium that served and still serves to bring about this equalization may be clearly discerned, namely, the frequent mixed marriages which have taken place between these two peoples since the Olcha migrated to the Amur and, after the loss of their reindeer, settled down there as fishermen in the immediate neighborhood of the Gilyak, marriage which even today are concluded between them continually. In this manner the

/709 cont./

*796 beside the other hearth where the host and a few other guests sit.
574 In this case, however, it is regarded as the bench of honor because it is closer to the bears and in full view of them. On it, therefore,
[123] as Judin told us, there are even more ufsch to be observed than elsewhere in the house, and when, for example, we wanted to make some notes in our journal about the bear festival and draw some sketches of it from there, he asked us with great politeness to sit on the longitudinal bench for that, because in the other place this could easily be seen by the bears and might be resented
516 by them. The guests sat down with their legs crossed under them in two rows on the bench: the older and more dignified ones immediately along the wall, the younger ones along the edge of the bench. Between the two rows sufficient space was left for a path on which the bowls traveled from one end of the bench to the other, in that they were put on the bench from the floor at the left end and came back again at the right end. When one bowl had moved along a bit, it was followed by a second, a third, etc. The number of the various dishes, however, was fewer than that of the bowls, for many a dish was repeated again after a couple of courses. It is strange that the host himself does not take part in
●[614] this meal, and similarly all the relatives on the paternal side, in other words, the so-called ngafk, are excluded from it with him, while the maternal /710/ relatives (amal or armal), as well as the friends and acquaintances, may participate in the meal. Judging by the quantity of foods and bowls that traveled back and forth, it was a very copious meal that Judin set before his guests. Nevertheless, most of his guests, after the end of the meal, went to another house in order to eat there, and this went on from house to house throughout the village, so that even the ngafk of a particular host probably do not come off badly.

Those Gilyak, however, who stayed in Judin's house, mostly younger people who had spent the night leading the bears around and therefore were probably tired, took advantage of the pause after the feast to renew their strength with a few hours of sleep.
*796 The quiet lasted but a short time, however, for soon the women 541 began their routine morning activity, feeding the dogs, and then,

The Nivkhi

775

Footwear, robes and overcoats were made of 231 specially prepared skins of carp, Siberian salmon and pike, as well as seal 237 and elk skin, dog-fur, etc. 302

Before the Revolution, neither men nor women cut their hair; they wore it braided—the men, in a single braid, the women, in two braids.

Social Relations and Religion

Problems of the ancient social order of the Nivkhi are particularly 114 interesting in connection with the study of the origins of the family and marriage. Thanks to the well-known works of the Russian ethnographer L. Ya. Shternberg, we have a detailed description of the clan organization of the Nivkhi (or Gilyaks, as they were called in the past) at the end of the last century. Shternberg conducted ethnographic studies of the Nivkhi for a number of years, and collected materials which attracted the attention of F. Engels. Engels wrote about Shternberg's work in a special article, "A Recently Discovered Instance of Group Marriage" (first published in Die Neue Zeit, 1892, and later, as an appendix to "The Origin of the Family, Private Property, and the State").

The Nivkhi were divided into exogamous clans (ekhkhal), of which there 614 were several dozen. Most of their names were taken from rivers, such as: Mylung, i.e., "those who live on the My River," Chombing—"those who live on the Chom River," and so on. Already in Shternberg's time, the Nivkhi clans no longer represented territorial and economic entities. A Nivkhi village was inhabited by members of various clans. However, the Nivkhi clan preserved many forms of sociality as among clan kinsmen, expressed chiefly in family and marriage norms, and in religious rituals and customs.

The Nivkhi clan was patriarchal, with but a few relics of the more 160 ancient matriarchal order. These relics included the special relationship with the mother's brother, who took part in receiving ransom for the murder of his sister's son, and also the custom of sending gifts and a share of every catch to sons- or brothers-in-law—which may have been a remnant of matrilocal marriage.

The Nivkhi clan was a group of kinsmen along the male line, bound by strictly observed rules of clan exogamy: mutual duties in payment of blood-money (ikhusind), which replaced the vendetta among the Nivkhi; participation of clan members in the payment of bride-price and burial expenses; and the common clan cult (clan fire, clan organization of the bear festival, the clan storehouse for ritual objects, etc.).

In distinction to the Tungusic-Manchurian peoples of the Amur region, the Nivkhi took their wives, not from the clan to which they gave their women, but from a third clan. Thus, each clan was bound by marriage ties to at least two other clans. For example, the Khyyygnung clan took its women from the Kegnang, the Kegnang from the Tykfing, and the latter from the Khyyygnung. This was connected with the Nivkhi rule, which, in distinction to those of their Tungusic-Manchurian neighbors, permitted a man to marry the daughter of his mother's brother, but not the daughter of his father's sister. The clan from which men of a given clan took their wives was the former's akhmal'k (father-in-law); conversely, the clan to which the women of a given clan were given was called ymg'l (son-in-law). Hence, the Nivkhi themselves defined the clan as follows: "We have one (i.e., a common) akhmal'k (father-in-law), one ym'gi (son-in-law), one fire, one bear, one ikhusind (blood-money), and one sin."

/357 cont./

of the avengers, stubbornly insisting on his demands, departs in anger. The khlay-nivukh of the murderer goes after him and tries to enter into negotiations with his comrade-in-arms. More than once the two diplomats seat themselves on the ground and light their pipes, each with his own steel, until they finally reach the camp of the avengers, where the negotiations continue. It sometimes happens that the khlay-nivukhi move back and forth in this fashion from one camp to another for two or three days. Finally an agreement is reached. Now the company of the avengers begins to draw near the settlement, and out to meet them come the clansmen of the murderer, and both sides finally stop, facing each other within the distance of a bowshot. From one side, accompanied by his khlay-nivukh, the avenger steps forward, in gala attire, with a spear and a drawn bow; from the other steps the slayer, also with a drawn bow, side by side with his khlay-nivukh. The bow of each adversary is aimed directly at the heart of his enemy... A momentary flare-up -- and blood may flow. But the khlay-nivukhi strictly restrain the adversaries, speaking over and over again about peace and forgetting. And this is not merely a ritual, for there have been cases where in that minute the avenger has boiled over with wrath and slain his enemy on the spot. Then the adversaries simultaneously throw down their arms, run toward each other, and embrace. The reconciliation has been achieved, and the clansmen of the avenger, together with the latter, peacefully enter the yurt of the slayer, where the stipulated objects of ransom are laid before the plank beds and where /358/ excellent refreshments have been prepared. In another variant, the avenger and the slayer stand close, facing each other, each with his spear resting against the breast of his enemy; when the khlay-nivukhi call upon them for reconciliation, each of the clansmen on each side leads a dog between them, and then these animals are killed with spears (blood for blood).

/358 cont./

614 628 682 It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khal' of the murderer participates in the payment, each according to his means. A 614 628 682 murder within the clan finds its avengers among the closest kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i.e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

614 628 628 [537] The khlay-nivukhi obtain as a reward for their labors their fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Re- [762] venge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

614 628 72 [177] One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but the recollection of them lives in the popular memory; they tell of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/358 cont./

614 628 72 in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack was ordinarily made at night. In expectation of it, the whole adult male population, armed, /359/ gathered in one yurt. The women and children remained alone in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the women, children, and also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each [342] yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurts. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. If a smaller number had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, had to consider itself satisfied. For the [501] eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

411 Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the eloquent testimony of the heavy spears with silver fretwork, guarded today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than mere decoration.

614 597 7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopts persons from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came [927] to their assistance with the right of adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted en masse. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/359 cont./

614 599 family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered in the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had been adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must be fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

614 426 8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

614 428 9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, the clan is the heir).

614 736 768 10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. We have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased man's "ruvn" his widow and children should go. Before the gather- [963] ing of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

614 627 In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settled, not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals of different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the [685] affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled

/361 cont./

614 317 617 591 present; frequently, by special agreement with the father-in-law, the son-in-law moves to the clan of the former for joint work with him (more detail about this below).

614 764 12. The khal' has a common cemetery, closed to those of other clans. It is known to all that the Sakhalin Gilyak have the custom of cremating their dead. Before the day of cremation invitations are sent to all the clansmen of the deceased, and only an extraordinary obstacle will keep a Gilyak from the performance of his last duty to a clansman. When the "living" fire, obtained in this solemn instance by means of friction, has destroyed the remains of the deceased, they construct a low, little shed, closed on all sides, over the place where the ashes and small pieces of bone of the corpse remain, and at its side, a short distance away, they construct a tiny yurt, or rather a wooden box, an arshin square, with a roof. In this box they place the cup and dish of the deceased, his pipe, a wooden doll, ornaments (if it were for a woman), and other trifles. Thus there arises a whole row of yurt-tombs of the clan. When the clan lives in various settlements, they bury the deceased in his village. But wherever the Gilyak may die, his ashes must rest side by side with his clansmen. If a man dies in alien territory, they immediately communicate the fact to his kinsmen, who come and bear away the body for cremation in his homeland. If the affair takes place in the summer, they preserve the corpse in a cold place until wintertime, when they bear it away on sleds to his homeland. But even if /362/ it should prove necessary to cremate a Gilyak in alien territory, nevertheless they carefully pick up one small bone, tie it to a piece of wood, and send it off to his homeland. There they 614 765 make a shed over it and construct a yurt by its side. The death of a clansman calls for mourning. Men and women undo their braids for a longer or shorter time, depending on the closeness of kinship and love for the deceased. Some wear mourning throughout their lives.

/362 cont./

614 182 Thus it is that kinship and social bo to his clan. Without some particular nee abandon the settlement of his clansmen,
No matter where the Gilyak may grow ric his homeland. The writer has seen Gilya [177] completely Russified, who had grown up i Russians, but who, having married, settle to the settlement of their clan. And this Gilyak does not find it absolutely necessa yurt, since in any yurt of his clan there w three square arshins on the plank bed for t man. He does not even need a boat and find owners of these things, with whom he basis of equal rights. The inevitable affi to the great clan union has placed an inde tire spiritual make-up, on his character, [155] development. The custom of judging all entering into the interests of his clansmen bility in matters of vengeance, these com sacrifices, this fraternal bond of numerou children, and finally the necessity and pr yurts together with dozens of one's fellow compels the Gilyak to live continually in must have developed a social, communal character, sensitive in matters of honor.

342 354 521 Enter one of the large winter yurts in the north, enter one of these anthills o and you will be pleasantly surprised. The only by the flame of the stoves; in the far dark, but you will hear the sedate conver the loud talk of the middle-aged, merry music of the youth. Here boredom has n onds attach the Gilyak d the Gilyak will not the tombs of his clan.

ch, he finally returns to k who had become in service among the ed down and returned is so easily done. The ry to construct a vill always be two to the family of a clansa net; he will always e will go fishing on a liation of every Gilyak elible stamp on his en-customs, and intellectual jointly, this necessity of , this mutual responsi-mmunal festivals and s fathers, brothers, and actice of living in large
-- a necessity that the eyes of others -- all this , loquacious, serious

, which are so frequent a winter's evening, huge yurt is lighted up corners it is completely ation of the old men, aughter, the jokes and place...

/368 cont./

766 ceremony is not observed, namely, when a person falls victim to a bear. There is a whole ritual for such cases. I shall be brief. Immediately after receiving news of the Gilyak's misfortune, they set out in search of the bear, following its fresh tracks. After they find and kill the bear, they place the slain person astride it and solemnly carry the bear and its ill-starred rider to the settlement. They immediately begin to /369/ build a large balagan in which they place the bear and its rider. The balagan is enclosed on all [782] sides; they leave only small openings in which are placed small [769] troughs with sacrifices, which are at first renewed very often and then less and less frequently (in a year). This epopee is fully completed only in the third generation, in the presence of the clans-men of the slain man, with the final sacrifice of several dogs at 182 the source of the local stream. The meaning of this whole procedure 766 is, I think, the following. The bear is killed in conformity with the principle of revenge (the kindred bones must be raised). The posture of the slain man (astride the bear) is the symbol of the triumph of revenge. Leaving the slain man in the pose of a rider and honoring his memory for generations stem from a desire to crown the brave members of one's clan with a halo of fame. It may be that all this is done for the edification of the youth. Sacri- [782] fices are made to Pal'-nivukh, in this case to propitiate him so that such misfortunes will not be repeated in the future. This example shows, incidentally, that the Gilyak are very far from regarding the bear as a god. The last respects paid a person who has drowned are also accompanied by a special ritual. He is burned, it is true, but without fail on the seashore. The boat in which he drowned is no longer used. In the presence of the entire [614] clan a rich sacrifice is made to Toll'-nivukh on the shore. A new [782] yurt is built, in which the parents of the deceased or one of his brothers settle. Again in this case, the procedure is to foster contempt for danger, and, on the other hand -- to propitiate the capricious god of the sea.

797 In conclusion I must say a few words about the spread of Christianity among the Gilyak. On the entire western shore I have met only two baptized Gilyak, who took the "sacred"

among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal'-geymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations ago), was the social leader, the starosta of the clan. His successor was the khal'-geymar next to him in years. The intervention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But the khal'-geymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where years play a special role in the competence of the judgment.

11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to remember one another, to visit one another, and to lend one another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year befall him, and he will go to spend some time with clansmen until matters improve. On the western coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pyanovo, Tangi, Tyki, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in a settlement. This partly arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fishing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many sons-in-law to emigrate to the clan of their wife has greatly aided the mixing of the clans. This latter custom, possibly a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands entered the clan of the wife, and not conversely, as is done at

9: Hawes--209 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 614, 627

"The Gilyaks are, as we have seen, divided into tribes, viz. the Tim, Tro, and west coast people, besides the mainland or Amur Gilyaks. These tribes are sub-divided into khala, or clans. Each khal consists of a family circle. The limits are vague, but include grandfathers, uncles, etc. The eldest representative of the khal is the chief, and the members are to be found scattered in many villages. Each village has its council of elders, to whom the injured apply. In cases of mortal offence, both parties, the criminal and the eldest male of the injured man's family, march out against one another with bows and arrows ready strung, but the council sitting around urge them to end the matter peacefully, and ordinarily they succeed, the rivals embrace, talk peace, and the criminal pays a heavy fine.

The Russian authorities wisely refrain from interference, and look to the richest man in each village, whom they term the starosta, to keep order, etc."

615

615 PHRATRIES--presence of one or more unilinear kin groups, each of which embraces two or more sibs; affiliation (e.g., matrilineal, patrilineal); regulation of marriage (e.g., exogamy, agamy, endogamy); distinguishing characteristics; origin and traditions; organization; prerogatives and obligations of members; relations between phratries; etc. See also:
Marriage regulation . . . . . 649 Totemism 779

1: Shternberg--81 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/41 cont./

582 614 3) Since in every family sons must marry daughters of a brother of their mother, and daughters -- sons of a sister of their father, it follows that from the time of the establishment of this custom all the descending posterity of each pair of ancestors in all lines eo ipso form a closed group, prohibited from one another maritally, an exogamous organism, a clan, and, depending on whether the men go into the clan of the wife or remain in their own, either a maternal or paternal clan prevails.

At the present time, among the Gilyak a paternal, agnatic clan has been established.

4) Such a clan rests not only on the negative tie of exogamy, but also on valuable positive bonds, on the common rights of clansmen to the women of the blood clan of their ancestress, the mutual rights of group marriage, and, finally, on the obligation to save their women for the clan that took the sisters of their ancestor.

If we take into consideration the fact that marriage regulations among primitive peoples, among whom the cult of the ancestors and, consequently, blood ties play such a tremendous role, become religious imperatives, it will become clear that the clearly indicated mutual rights and obligations cement the clan union.

In particular, the important cementing element of a clan is also the fact that all the women coming in (wives of clansmen) are taken from one clan and are either one another's sisters(own and agnate), or aunts and nieces. As for men, the clansmen, they represent in each generation a group of brothers (own and agnate) married to a group of sisters and cousins from the clan of their mothers, i.e., to their first cousins, /42/ in relation to whom they have reciprocal conjugal rights.

We have already spoken about the effects that these customs have on the kinship nomenclature.

614 615 5) The clan, therefore, is not a self-contained organism. The existence of each clan is organically bound up with the existence of at least two clans, blood kindred with it, one the blood clan of its ancestress, from which it takes its wives, and another clan which took the sisters of its ancestor and to which it must give up its own women.

1: Shternberg--82 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/42 cont./

615 614 The first of the latter two clans in relation to the third bears the name akhmal'k (father-in-law), the second navkh or vmri (son-in-law /zyat', "son-in-law, brother-in-law"/). All three are pandf (cognates) to one another. Thus, every Gilyak is an organic member not only of his own, but of a tri-partite, blood, tri-clan union, forming, in the literal sense of the word, a phratry (1) (phratry -- brotherhood). In this triple "brotherhood"

582 614 1. The Gilyak phratry has nothing in common with the one of Morgan, for within it mutual marriages are not only allowed, but were obligatory.

all the men and women of each generation are actually brothers and sisters (cognate male cousins and female cousins, see below).

Specifically, in relation to each member of a given clan each woman of the second clan is either his mother, his wife or the wife of his sons and agnatic nephews, and conversely, in the third clan, every woman is either his sister, daughter, or a sister of his father. Such are the blood ties of the members of a phratry!

One can get an idea of the form of the Gilyak three-clan phratry from the following schematic table:

Clan A (Andreev)	Clan V (Vasil'ev)	Clan S (Stepanov)
Andrei + Varvara (sister of Vasilii from clan V). Their children: 1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Vasilii, from clan V. 2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Anna, from clan S.	Vasilii + Sof'ia (sister of Stepan from clan S). Their children: 1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Stepan, from clan S. 2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Varvara, from clan A.	Stepan + Anna (sister of Andrei from clan A). Their children: 1. The sons marry the daughters of the mother's brother, Andrei, from clan A. 2. The daughters marry the sons of the father's sister, Sof'ia, from clan V.

1: Shternberg--83 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/43/

615 614 Analyzing this table, we see that 1) all the women in clan A have been taken, by generations, from clan V, which means that Andrei's mother is a sister of Vasilii's father, and consequently Andrei and Vasilii are cognate cousins. 2) Similarly in clan V, Vasilii's mother is a sister of Stepan's father from clan S, and consequently Vasilii and Stepan are cognate cousins, and 3) in clan S Stepan's mother is the sister of Andrei's father from clan A, and consequently Stepan and Andrei are cognate cousins.

Thus, not only are each pair of spouses, one to the other, male and female cognate cousins, but the ancestors of each clan are, one to the other, cognate cousins. In a word, the founders of all three clans are close, blood kinsmen married to female cognates of the same degree of kinship, and each generation marries cognates of the same degree of kinship as its fathers and mothers. This is a clear example of how weak the terms exogamous and endogamous are: the exogamy of the Gilyak clan does not exclude marriages between close kinsmen. It turns out that endogamy prevailed within each phratry; each of its branches was exogamous.

615 614 178 Such was the original scheme. Time and circumstances, emigration, depopulation, the dispersion of clans, an accidental scarcity of women in the mother's clan, and other such causes naturally led, on the one hand, to a deviation from this system, and, on the other hand, to corrections, whose aim was to reconcile the old norms with the new demands of life. All these superstructures, if I may express myself thus, have quite confused the genealogical systems and the marriage norms, and, as usually happens, the categorical imperative, weakening in one respect, becomes more widespread in another. Due to external conditions, the rule to take one's wife from the clan of one's mother weakened, but, on the other hand, the prohibition against giving wives to that clan (albeit completely alien from which someone, even a most remote clansman of the given clan, took his wife has received the most widespread interpretation (on the presumption that it is the clan of the mother). From this the following has become established:

/43 cont./

614 Since at the present time it is not always possible for all
615 clansmen to take their wives from one clan, the clan of the 178 mother, certain members of some clan (M, for example) are required to take their wives from different clans. And so, on the strength of the old presumption that the clan of the wife of a clansman is the clan of the mother, all these clans for several generations become prohibited for all the women of clan M, for whom marriage into these clans is not allowed. And this is not all. This prohibition, in essence having lost its former raison d'être, is applied not only /44/ to that clan M, which takes wives directly from A, but also to a third clan, N, which, in turn, takes wives from M.

In the Gilyak terminology of marriage this prohibition is technically expressed thus. Clan A, giving women to clan M, is called the akhmal'k (father-in-law) of the latter, while in relation to clan N, which in turn takes wives from clan M, it -- i.e., clan A, is called tuyma akhmal'k (distant father-in-law); and so the prohibitions lying on clan M are carried over to clan N, i.e., clan A may not take women not only from M, but also from N. The degrees of prohibition, however, do not extend beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree.

The entire future evolution of the Gilyak family and clan lies in the history of the origin of this prohibition. In what way could this widespread prohibition arise? We saw that the Gilyak were not afraid of marriages within close degrees of kinship. This means that the reason must be some other one. As a matter of fact, in the face of the inevitability of cases when it was impossible to take wives from the clan of the mother, the Gilyak, conforming to the religious imperative, should have, in such cases, considered the most suitable clan that one from which at least the clan of his mother took wives, and, if unable to take them from it, he went to that clan from which this latter took wives, i.e., went by degrees to the akhmal'ki of distant degrees of kinship, just as, within the clan of the mother, in the absence of daughters in the family of the mother's own brother, he went to the daughters of the first, second, etc. cousins of the mother. Thus, the distant akhmal'ki clans were, as it were, reserve clans of the 178 ship, and it was rarely necessary to go beyond the akhmal'k of the second degree, to which the prohibition was limited. But with the appearance of this prohibition, the tri-clan phratry ceased to satisfy the new conditions of the regulation. Exclusive marriage within three clans became impossible, because in a tri-clan phratry (see the table) clan S is the akhmal'k of the first degree for V and of the second degree for A; consequently, the women of clan A cannot marry into clan S. It was necessary to add to the phratry a fourth clan, D (Dmitri, Dar'ya), let us say. The changes that occurred in our phratry consisted in the fact that Stepan's wife (clan S) would now be Dmitri's (clan D) sister, while the latter would have as his wife a sister of Andrei (clan A). Since in more distant times, the prohibitions undoubtedly spread to the akhmal'ki of more distant degrees, the phratries naturally /45/ had to consist of an ever greater number of clans. At the present time, when, due to the reasons mentioned above, it is necessary in the selection of wives to resort to completely alien clans, the phratry has naturally lost its former, strictly closed position.

/44 cont./

614 mother, but it is natural that practically it was inconvenient to
615 extend the prohibitions to the akhmal'ki of all degrees of kin-

It is not hard to imagine how much genealogical information one must have with regard to this complicated, confused system, in order to correctly decide, in each given case, on the right to marry of some member of a clan. And, actually, this constitutes a whole science, to which a Gilyak dedicates himself from his earliest childhood.

IV.

171 Some Conclusions from the Norms of Gilyak Marriage 601
582

I have already said that Gilyak kinship nomenclature and their norms of marriage in general do not represent an isolated case. An analogous nomenclature and analogous phenomena of group marriage are found among a mass of primitive peoples in the most remote parts of the world. But the details that I

/46/

171 2) The norms of Gilyak marriage explain to us further the 582 strange institution among the Dieri tribe in Australia, where a 1835 great council of the tribe, at appointed periods solemnly declares which men and women of the tribe have the right to group cohabitation.

From what we have said above about the intricacy and difficulty of determining the genealogical rights in matrimonial questions among the Gilyak, questions which for primitive man have an extremely serious religious significance, it is clear that there would gradually have to develop a rule whereby the decisions on these questions ceased to be a matter for the individual person and became the function of a competent institution of elders and specialists on genealogy and marriage law.

3) The Gilyak system of marriage explains to us why among many Australian tribes the women in each clan belong to a single totem. In fact, as among the Gilyak, all the women coming 614 in must be taken from a single clan, i.e., they are of a single totem.

4) This same system explains to us why, mutatis mutandis, every kumi and kodi among the Australians finds his wife throughout the territory of the distribution of his tribe; in reality he finds her only in that clan from which his clan must take its wives and in which every woman of the corresponding generation is his wife.

5) It explains to us the strange class system among many Australian peoples, for example, among the Kamilaroi, where ascending and descending generations belong to different classes, and only in the third, among some tribes, or fourth, or even in the fifth -- sixth generation, do they return to the class of the fathers.

The Gilyak norms, in spite of all the difference in details from those among the Australians, satisfactorily explain this strange phenomenon.

615 Let us recall again the tri-clan phratry and for clarity call 614 clan A -- Andrei, clan V -- Vasil'ev, and clan S -- Stepanov.
582 Consistent with the Gilyak norms, Varvara's daughter from clan A is from birth considered the wife of one of the Stepanovs (of clan S), and, consequently, her sobriquet will be not Andreeva

/46 cont./

615 but Stepanova; her daughter (a granddaughter of Varvara's), in
614 turn, from birth, as the wife of one of the Vasil'evs (of clan V)
582 would be called Vasil'eva, but, the daughter of this last, i.e., Varvara's great-granddaughter, would have to be the wife of one of the Andreevs (of clan A) /47/ and thus, in the third generation, she would again bear the class sobriquet of her great-grandmother.

582 6) As we have seen, Gilyak marriage to a considerable ex-
160 tent simplifies our understanding of the complicated kinship nomenclature, for in the Gilyak system of marriage many categories of the Turanian system of kinship, which at first sight appear completely independent, are in fact identical, such as, for example, wives of brothers, sisters of the wife, and sisters of the wives of brothers turn out to be the same persons, just like mothers, wives of the father's brothers, sisters of the father-in-law, sisters of the mother, etc.

But these are all facts of a secondary character. It seems to me that the scheme of Gilyak marriage can shed light on certain basic questions about primitive marriage.

1) From an analysis of the norms of Gilyak marriage, we have seen that from the simple, single rule that men must marry daughters of their mother's brother, there inevitably arise by natural necessity such complex institutions as group marriage, the clan, the phratry, and finally marriage prohibitions.

2) An analysis of the Gilyak regulations sheds light on the 194 genesis of the institution of abduction in general and in particu-
583 lar, on the strange institution of mock abduction, an institution
614 which is practiced among such primitive peoples as the Aus-
615 tralians and the Eskimo, and, furthermore, in such strange 1771 forms that it is quite impossible to consider it a simple remnant of actual abduction, as is normally thought. Let us recall again our tri-clan phratry with its norms of marriage. Clan A must take wives from clan V and give up its women to clan S. We shall remember that in the primitive stages of development such obligations are religious imperatives, the violation of

/47 cont./

194 which brings the punishment of the gods. Now let us suppose that 583 clan V, from which A takes wives, has died out, or that there are
614 too few women in it, which is quite in the order of things. Clan
615 A cannot take wives in other phratries, for there each clan saves its women for the clan of the father's sister; the alien clan, even if it had extra women, cannot decide to deviate from this imperative for fear of bringing on itself the punishment of the gods, of the gods-ancestors, for whom marriages with those of other blood constitute the greatest of insults. And a similar vengeance threatens the clan who would make use of women of other blood. Marriage is indispensable, however. Two alternatives then remain: either to abduct a woman by force, risking bringing on oneself the vengeance of the gods, /48/ to say nothing of the vengeance of the clan of the stolen, or to circumvent the law, deceiving the gods about the real intentions of one's actions, i.e., a voluntary agreement is reached with the parents of the bride and with her herself, whereby these latter appear to resist the abduction with all their strength, while the bridegroom, in the most conscientious manner, does everything required to give to the marriage act the look of real coercion.

171 Only with such an explanation of abduction can we under-
194 stand why, for example, the Australian kumai, having allowed 583 their daughter to run away with her loved one, set out in pursuit after her and, having caught her, pierce her leg with a spear and beat her half to death. The Australians themselves explain this, not as animosity, but as custom.

This, however, is not all. Among many tribes the bridegroom himself considers it his duty to beat his loved one no less cruelly than her parents; by this he desires to show the gods, and the gods-ancestors in particular, that the capture of the girl was in no way caused by a desire on his part to marry her.

Finally, only with this illumination on the hypothesis of the religious origin of the custom can we explain such a universal occurrence of the institution, which, in the form of mock abduction, is practiced in the marriage ceremony of even civilized peoples.

/48 cont./

194 This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-583 in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also ex-
614 plains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not 615 from the clan of his mother by the term yokh /xicr see yokh on 606 p. 76/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

194 Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price, 583 the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin
614 against the clan of the one abducted, a sin which demands atone-615 ment, by force or by a material fine from the abducter. Among 1687 the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third gen-
1882 eration inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin, 197 as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tkhunind, among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps 194 somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently 583 happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the superstitious spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

771 In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/120 cont./

*614 Then there are the hejmay, the elders, all of whose au-184 ity consists in the solution of most problems of cult and kin-623 They play a certain role at the time of the clan festival, which they are generally the principal managers; they are after a fashion, the priests of the clan. They are, however, how wield any influence or possess any actual significance in th other important manifestations of the life of the clan.

*614 Finally, the third element of authority is the ye'r.
184 Under favorable conditions, there could develop out of 1324 three elements those diverse forms of power which in variou
1569 combinations (people's assemblies, the council of the elder patriarchs, priest-kings and military leaders, chiefs, viking kings, and so forth) we find among many semi-cultured pe at the present time and at the dawn of the history of all na which are civilized today. But among the Gilyak these ele ments are only embryonic, and it is hardly fated for them ever to receive an impetus toward further development.

/121/

VIII.

Interclan Relations

615 The clan, however, is not a self-sufficient institution,
*614 a man's intimate ties are not bounded only by the clan to which he belongs by birth.

Each clan, by the basic principle of its matrimonial law is bound by marriage ties with four other clans, the akhma and ymgi clans. Between these clans is formed the bond blood kinship, so important in the eyes of primitive man, bond of common origin through the mother (the male ance of all four clans and the representatives of each of their ge erations are reciprocally first cousins through the mother), and to this are united those powerful ties of natural intima which are engendered by generations of women tying these clans together in an uninterrupted chain of marriage union

Child's cradle.

Nivkhi clans could split up and settle in different places; they could ept (adopt) people of other clans and tribes. When a clan divided, ni broke the flint which was kept by the eldest in the clan (the flint to obtain ritual fire, such as the fire for cooking bear meat), and ece to the part that split off.

ago, the Nivkhi had the institution of vendetta. All members of a e bound to avenge a murder upon all the men of the murderer's ter, vendetta began to be replaced by blood-money (tkhusind). In ing clans through the payment of blood-money, the principal role ed by intermediaries of a neutral clan (khlay-nivkh). It was their negotiate the size of the blood-money and to persuade the enemy parties to agree. When agreemen offending clan with men of the enacted between the representati sentative killed a dog, and peace ransom was paid. It consisted o other valuable objects.

The Nivkhi had a classificato the Tunguso-Manchurian systen applied always to persons of Shternberg showed, the classific his time the existing marriage the 19th century some remnant possible only for persons of th forbidden among persons of diff

All the members of a clan w fathers and great-grandfather (tuvng), the husbands of the m bands of the mother's sister children (ola).

Trade ties with China and th fishing, into economic activiti the disintegration of the clan first among the Amur Nivkhi the Manchus. Nivkhi merchan bartered furs and beluga bac articles. They also bartered neighbors. Members of the Tv the middlemen between the Sak
Russian colonization, the Niv
The rich could have several price always included large qua relations developed slowly, si and, to a lesser extent, fish.
sistence economy.

Slaves did only housewor and marry free women. The were considered free. On the Nivkhi and was of a patriarcha

At the end of the 17th and i among the Nivkhi, as well as th and gasyanda—village elders.

After the middle of the subsistence economy proceed become a part of Russia, sla appeared, in the institution of ments of production fell int was divided according to the the implements of others had

Before the Revolution, th Christians, but their views r of Sakhalin as an anthropomo trees, mountains, rivers, w their thinking an yz'—a "ma phenomenon had its yz'. Th of the mountains and the taig nt was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was ives of the two clans. Then each clan reprewas considered established. After that, the f coats of mail, spears, silk materials and ory system of kinship. But, in distinction to n, the specific term of kinship among them one, rather than different generations. As catory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of s of group marriage. These relations were e same generation, and were categorically erent generations.

ere divided into four age groups: 1) grand(atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers other's sisters and the brothers of the huss; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4)

e transformation of fur-hunting, and later of es directed to commercial ends stimulated order among the Nivkhi, which occurred
. The latter had early begun to trade with ts sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and ktbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other bing clan, for instance, were for a long time halin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before khi began to be divided into rich and poor.
ives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-ntities of imported valuables. But commodity ce exchange was only in the medium of furs
The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a sub-

k. They could set up their own households slave's descendants of the fifth generation whole, slavery was not widespread among the l character.
the 18th centuries, the Manchus established e Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, ist century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi ed more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally very disappeared; a new form of exploitation

"half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the implethe position of "half-sharers." The catch number of participants, but those who used o yield half of their share to the owner.
Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox mained animistic. They thought of the island phic creature; similar ideas were held about ter, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in ter" of other animals. Almost every natural chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master"
, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

342
291
231

Feeding a bear.

the sea. Both the Nivkhi dwelling and every river had its yz', who took care of man. The sky was thought to be inhabited by "sky people." The sky people—the sun and moon—had no close relations with man, but the Nivkhi were always in close relations with the yz'. "Receiving" from them fish, sea animals, etc., the Nivkhi had to "give" them in return—to sacrifice to them. The cult connected with the "masters" of nature was of pronounced clan character. 771 776

The "mountain man," the "sea man" and the bear, in the Nivkhi thinking, were common to the clan. And the bear festival (chkhyf-le-kherno—"bear game") was a clan festival. The clan which celebrated the festival assumed the expense and work of arranging it. This festival was connected with the cult of the dead, since it was usually held in memory of a dead clan kinsman. A bear cub was caught in the taiga or bought and placed in a special frame building. The cub was reared by members of the given clan. On specific days it was taken out and led on a chain through the encampment. The bear was reared for several years. Before the festival, all the clan members gave the bear's master products and money. The master's family prepared food for the holiday (usually held in February), built a platform—a shooting ground with one or several pairs of trees—poles hung with ritual shavings (inau) and covered with carving. The bear was tied between them. The honorary duty of killing the bear was given the narkha—people of the clan in the relationship of "son-in-law" to the clan holding the festival. The festivities sometimes lasted several days and consisted of a complex ceremony of killing the bear with a bow and arrow, ritual feasting on the bear meat, the sacrifice of dogs, and so on. The bearskin with the head was lowered into the yurt through the smoke vent on a high pole. In the intervals between eating, there were dog races, shooting matches with bow and arrow, fencing with sticks, and dancing. After the festival the head and bones of the bear, the ritual utensils et cetera were put away in the special clan storehouse. Wherever a Nivkhi lived, he retained his contact with his clan storehouse, where he always brought the skulls of the bears he killed. 796 614 231 [069] [526]

The burial rites of the Nivkhi differed sharply from those of the Tungusu-Manchurians of the Amur regions. The Nivkhi characteristically 764

called əmləus and the sea-end is called əz-baχ-puks 'master's stone tie.' To this end, which is lowered into the sea, is tied əz-bax 'master's stone' or 'master stone,' which, according to the Gilyaks, weighs two poods. This stone, the Gilyaks explained to me, forms the anchor of the seine. In place of plummets, stones are attached to the bottom of the seine. They are called tətr-paχ. Large wooden floats (vaŋ) are fastened to the upper cord of the seine. When the head of a sivuch gets caught in the net, the sivuch starts to flounder; at times so violently that it throws the lower edge of the seine together with the plummets over the upper cord and finds itself literally in a sack. Sometimes dolphins fall into the seine. The seals pəγi are shrewd and are seldom caught in the net.

In the past as well as at the present time the Gilyaks of the village Kul set the tola-k'e at Kivf-ŋalu, Ke-ŋalu, Vilk, Loŋri, and əṭ.

According to old man Virp, some clans in the village Kul owned seal hunting places in the past.

Thus clan Qavjuŋ owned: 1. Lulvəχ-pər, 2. ŋaγqej, 3. ṭt.

Lulvəχ-pər and ŋaγreqej are names of rocks sticking out of the water. Seals crawl out of the water onto these rocks. ṭt is a small island close to which there is another such rock.(3)

3. In a fog the hunters come alongside of the shore or of the small island əṭ. Then the young hunters amuse themselves and play. There are onət two laqr-paχ stones for a game: "who can lift it and who cannot." Close to the rocks there is a flat place where the Gilyaks compete. The competition consists in jumping on one foot (teŋot ṭerd).

Clan Ṭnaunuŋ owned: 1. Maṭ-loŋri, 2. Tŋəri-γrə, 3. Zomi-vər.

The first two places form parts of the shore and are resting places for seals. The third is a rock.

Clan Kezoŋ owned the shore off Vilk, a resting place for seals and Hapzə-vər - a stone.

[84] Once at sea, the hunters take a number of measures to ensure a successful hunt. Thus, in conversation, they substitute prearranged names for the usual names of certain objects. This prearranged language is an echo of a distant past when hunters used it to keep their plans from animals

784 from young hunte
225 who play a leadin
183 parts of the quar
526 Taboos regula 262 hunters as well a 784 parts of the clan.
462 Thus, in the v
868 (Charbakh), the c
183 me of interesting
526 used by children
A boy must no women in cutting must not play wit
"When I was li to put a yoke on a 'sin'). If a boy h cutting board, the taiga, he might n
he will have no lu Agiska told me or spear, for the Russian - farta). advertantly over into the body of th are not supposed These taboos i are prepared for play - have anyth their tasks and th used in their task imize for both m birth, the distribu 462 [88] The women o 514 from the point of recently it was th rich. The women row (notwithstandi
the husband tends rudder and the wo able and inadmiss make clothes, sho tasks some of whi
nity of a hunter.
The males of a
They procure food

rs and women-the fact that the old hunters
g part in the hunt appropriate the tastiest ry under the guise of religious interdictions.
te the relations between the old and young s the relations between the male and female ery same year of 1931, in the village Charvax ld Gilyak Kozin and Gisk (Agiska) informed taboos pertaining to a number of objects n their games.

: play with a yoke or with a board used by leather and cloth (tans-kalmr). Also, a child a woman's cutting knife (tan-dago).
ttle Kozin told me, old men would not permit boy's shoulders. That was Uit ('taboo,' t the legs of another boy with a yoke or a n when he grew up and went hunting in the ot be able to walk well." Agiska told me that ck in hunting.
that a girl should not play with arrow, bow, se implements will not bring luck (in local If a woman or a girl were to step ina spear or arrow, the arrow will not go deep e bear and will not stick. That is why girls to play with those implements.
ndicate that already at an early age children definite tasks; that boys must not - if only in ng to do with implements used by women in at, conversely, girls must not use implements
s by men. These taboos are seen to legitnen and woman, virtually from the time of ution of labor existing among the Gilyaks.
f a clan perform the most onerous work which view of men, is least respectable. Until e slaves who did this work for the Gilyak must carry water, chop wood, feed the dogs, ing his wife's advanced stage of pregancy, the rudder; the man is supposed to tend the man to row; the opposite would be disrepuible for a Gilyak hunter), prepare food, es and perform a number of other onerous ch are regarded as detrimental to the dig-

Gilyak clan are hunters, providers of food.
l for the whole clan. They procure fish, bear

452 and seals. They distribute the quarry. They play the leading 614 part in the economic, social and religious life of the clan and in no one of these areas do they permit women to play 614 a part equal to their own. Women play a subordinate part in 562 the productive activity of the clan; they collect plants, roots and berries. Woman cannot play any part in the social life of the clan for they do not belong to the clan from the very time they are born, and when they grow up they are given away, in fact sold, by the hunters to some other clan. The clan that takes the woman, i.e. the clan of the son-in-law (ore) become dependent upon the clan of the father-in-law (apak). Also, women play no part in the religious life of the clan.

527 Women are not permitted to be present during more im-562 portant moments of the "bear holiday", for the bear hunt is 784 a matter for men-hunters and not for women. Not once in their life are women permitted to eat the better cuts of bear meat.
They are only allowed to eat some meat of the poorer cuts.
Women must not be present at offerings to the spirits of the woods and of the sea which help the hunters, for hunting is a man's job. As mentioned above, a pregnant woman must not come to the sea shore while the men are hunting seals, otherwise the ice would disappear and the hunters would return home empty handed, etc., etc.

784 The taboos mentioned above are a religious-magical super-452 structure on the labor distribution according to sex. One 626 should look for explanations of these taboos in the relations 183 among different groups of people in primitive society rather than in religion.

In legitimatizing this distribution of labor, the taboos turn the female part of the clan into slaves of the male part - the men-hunters.

Without further dwelling on these problems we merely indicate that there is no mystical element behind the taboos. The mystical content is often added in order to befuddle and to enslave people and to keep from them the essence of germinating exploitative relations among men. This is illustrated by the example of the traj where the pilan attempt to assert his title to a sivuch is made covertly rather than openly, under the guise of a magical-religious ceremony.

However, we now revert to our topic.

225 Having killed a sufficient number of seals, the hunters, 422 loaded with their quarry, return to the village. On arrival 476 the pilan distributes the quarry. At this point it becomes apparent that the sivuch, which is the pilan's legal property and whose blood he used in feeding the traj, is included in burned their dead, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burning, they broke the sled on which they had brought the corpse and killed dogs. Their meat was cooked in large cauldrons and eaten on the spot. The "sendoff of the soul" took place several days later, on the day of the "lifting the tree," as the cemetery was called. There they built a raĭ—a little hut for the figurine which represented the dead.

At the cemetery more dogs were killed on this day. The women sewed clothing for the figurines. Models of hunting and fishing gear were attached to the figurine, and a variety of household articles were laid with it. The real gun, kettle, teapot and other articles were broken nearby. It was held that on this day the soul migrated in a sled into the world of the dead, situated underground. The dead were buried only by members of their clan.

A variety of taboos were connected with the fire, whose "master" spirit was an old woman. The shaman's duties among the Nivkhi were connected with "healing" and with the constant struggle with the evil spirits, milk and kinr, which caused illness and death. The shamans had their own helping spirits (kekhn). However, shamanism was not greatly developed among the Nivkhi. It is interesting that the shamans did not take any part in the clan cults.

Folk Arts

The traditional poetic works of the Nivkhi are varied. There are songs of various kinds, tales, proverbs and sayings, and also myths, reflecting the most ancient ideas about the origin of the world, of nature, of various natural phenomena, and of spirits. There are also epic and historical tales (tyl'ugd), describing hunting feats, wars between clans, etc. The Nivkhi myths also include the Tunguso-Manchurian myth about the three suns. According to one of the Nivkhi myths, people descended from trees: the Nivkhi descended from the larch, the Orochi, from the birch.

Among the decorative arts, the most developed were carving on wood and bone, embroidery and appliqué on robes made of fabrics and fishskins. Most of the articles of daily use—wooden troughs, spoons, dippers, birchbark boxes, knife handles, spear-tips, pillows, blankets, robes, hats and mittens—were covered with spiral-ribbon designs, executed with great taste and skill. Wood-carvings also decorated barns, burial huts and dwellings. In motif and style, the Nivkhi design is related to the design of the Ul'chi and Nanays. The principal motifs of the ornamentation of clothing and birchbark utensils were symmetrical combinations of bent lines, often almost spiral, and stylized representations of birds. Appliqués from fishskin, fabrics and birchbark were cut out according to birchbark or leather patterns, transmitted from generation to generation. Robes, birchbark boxes and hats, and other articles had standard combinations of ornamental motifs, reproduced on articles of specific groups. The main colors in appliqués on birchbark, fishskin and fabric were black, white, red and blue. Appliqué on birchbark, fabric and fishskin was women's work; carving on wood and bone was done by men. Many women were famed for their skill and craftsmanship.

The origin of the Nivkhi ornamental art, as well as the art of other Amur peoples, has not yet been sufficiently established. Some of the motifs (such as roosters, dragons and monster-serpents) were unquestionably suggested by Chinese art and mythology, but underwent considerable local transformation; others (spirals) probably date back to neolithic times.

the boat; just as in the Siberian salmon fishing season they unite in a collective which centers around the seine or the zayezdka.

When the hunting season opens, the owner of such a boat starts collecting his companions. If the owner happens to have a son-in-law (ore) in the village, he asks him to join him in the hunt. In general, however, the owner of the boat selects hunters regardless of clan membership.

Thus, for instance, the boat owner, Gilyak Norp of the clan Tf nu , was accompanied by hunters from the following clans: Otaq from clan Hutevi , Potaq from clan Neo afi , t from clan a ramla , Onkan from clan Lez ran and Tesk from clan Tf nu .

A similar situation existed in collectives of hunters who went hunting in 1931.

The hunter collective centering around a boat is sometimes named after the owner of the boat. For instance, 1 tun-munim ('one boat of Gylkhtyun') Xitkun-mu-nim (one boat of Xitkun).

The owner of the boat is the organizer and leader of the collective of hunters grouped around him. Those who travel with him are his subordinates. The leader of such a collective of hunters is called pila ('bolshak') (2) (from pila-d--'to

2. This is the name of the oldest in the clan and generally of any foreman in industry.

be big, - suffix used in forming verbal nouns.)

The duties of pila are many. A pila is supposed:

1. To look over the boat, the rowlocks and, if need be, to effect repairs.

2. To prepare and to take along a strap, harpoon tips (tamra), harpoons shafts (ve l), his gun and the guns of his fellow-hunters, a kettle and a tea-pot (the hunters are obliged to take only cups with them), a tent, a sail, a tripod for the tea-pot and the kettle, and a compass. (3) Most of these items

3. Earlier they used to take to sea afq-va ("friend-stone" or "friendly stone"). See the remark in the supplement to "Seal Hunting."

are the property of the pila;

3. To perform a number of religious-magical ceremonies before setting out for the hunt as well as during the hunt. In this capacity the pila exposes the boat to smoke, performs mu-zi d and t aj; ceremonies to be described in detail below.

/121 cont./

In practice, as we know, these bonds extend far beyond the confines of the original four clans. First of all, in addition to these last, every clan with which at least one clansman has formed matrimonial ties is already an akhmal'k or ymgi to all his clan. On the other hand, we know that every akhmal'k and every ymgi retains its appellation not only with respect to those clans with which it is directly bound matrimonially, but also with respect to those who consider themselves the corresponding ymgi and akhmal'k of the former, so that in addition to the akhmal'k and ymgi of the first degree, each clan has still others of the second, third degrees, etc. All these clans call each other pandfy, individuals of a common origin.

Thus we see that the basic principle, simple and clear, which lay at the basis of the family and clan, a principle according to which a man preferably marries the daughter of the brother of his mother, becomes the basis of blood ties and sympathy, not only within each separate clan, but of even more extensive unions, interclan and, finally, of the whole tribe. True, by virtue of the unfavorable circumstances mentioned by us, such as the dispersion of a small tribe over an enormous territory and many other circumstances, these bonds could not take formal shape in such completed organizations as the phratries and tribes, for example, of the North American Indians, but here also they created an atmosphere of social unity which led the clan from an egoistic isolation onto the path of interclan community and brotherhood.

/122/ Let us consider a little more closely the bonds which arise between the pandf clans, between each clan and those from which the Gilyak takes his wives or to which he gives his women. These bonds are not limited to feelings alone; they are expressed in quite real forms.

First of all, there is the obligation of mutual sustenance and hospitality. This in essence is only an extension of that same obligation existing within the clan to the blood pandf; the extension to them of that benevolence of the clan deities

/122 cont./

*614 which belongs to them by righ 615 (sons-in-law /zyat'ya/ must 476 this interclan obligation.
574

This rule, however, does
*614 ligation of the akhmal'k to su 615 his family permanently in his 476 a very remote time, in the p
574 husband went to live in the h 591 so, but at the present time, u goes to the home of the husba pletely to the clan site of her less, the principle of "sustena most important role in the un

615 It is consolidated in a spec
585 rite, which consists of the fol
591 fore the bride is carried away 476 there is placed just inside the cast-iron kettle brought by th bride price for the bride, and belonging to the father of the and bridegroom must step wit then on the outer kettle: the in-law, the second is borne b
In a year, when, according t to the akhmal'k, the same c departure; only this time on is placed a pot and a cup, wh the first instance. It is chara jects bear the designation nic sustenance), while the whole (trampling of the nich). It i trampling of the threshold, w ment of the rite, in which a lymyz'n-mam -- an old wor
the woman-forbear, the guar

nt through the female line: "Ymgi be fed" -- such is the formula of not find expression at all in an obpport his son-in-law /zyat'/ and own home. It may be that at eriod of maternality when the ome of the wife, it was actually nder agnatic principles, the wife nd and customarily moves com-spouse's habitation. Neverthe-nce," as we shall see, plays a ification of the clans.

cial, extremely peculiar religious lowing. At the last moment be-from the home of her father, threshold a large, four-handled e bridegroom as a part of the on the outside a small kettle girl. When going out, the bride h the foot first on the inner and former remains with the father-ome by the bridegroom -- ymgi.
o custom, the couple pay a visit remony is repeated before their each side of the threshold there ich are again exchanged as in cteristic that the exchanged ob-h (mine-thine, a symbol of mutual rite is called nich zychyvynd also called lymyz'n-zand -- hich points to the religious eleole is played by the so-called an, the mistress of the threshold, dian genius of the home, whose 476

615 /122 cont./
585 blood flows equally /123/ in the veins of both of the newlyweds, 591 the children of brother and sister. Standing in close connection 796 with this rite is the previously described moment in the bear 615 festival, when, before the shooting at the mark, the master of 476 the bear (the akhmal'k) and his ymgi each sets beside himself an ax and a kettle, which are also called nich and which are also mutually exchanged. If the first rite symbolizes mutual sustenance, the second symbolizes reciprocal co-operation in hunting, which, as we shall soon see, has a quite real basis.

615 The principle of "sustenance" is not limited to periodic
* 614 visits to the relatives of the wife, although they have some 476 economic significance, since the akhmal'k'i each time, in 574 addition to the hospitality shown, give a valuable present [606] to their ymgi, especially on the first visit after the marriage, [431] when the son-in-law /zyat'/ is customarily given, depending on the resources, one or several pairs of smart garments for men. Cases of actual need are much more important. There
* 614 are times when one's own clan is powerless to aid its clansman, 731 because misfortune, having overtaken one, has overtaken all.
476 Let something happen during the season of the fish run to turn 574 them from their accustomed path, and general disaster is at 606 hand. At such a time there is a simple way out. A man gathers 615 up his family, his dogs, and all his movable goods and chattels in general and emigrates for the whole season to the settlement of his father-in-law.

Here he is met with outstretched arms, and from the first minute he feels himself at home, where they give him food and drink and share everything with him. The son-in-law /zyat'/, of course, is not a do-nothing; he helps in one way or another, but this is far from making up for the expenses involved in the long and unexpected visit of a whole family, often at a time when the supplies of fish have already been prepared and it is impossible to increase them.

615 Similar fraternal relations between akhmal'k'i and ymgi
224 are manifested in sea hunting and land undertakings.
225 The most important of these require the participation of 476 several persons: hunting bear in summer and winter (taking it
* 614

/126 cont./

614 615 796 574 182 This rule is so strictly observed that the very host who has been most diligent in receiving and making presents to his ymgi is not even invited by the latter to the festival, but, on the other hand, he will be the honored guest of his own akhmal'k. Thus there is formed an uninterrupted chain, uniting the long series of clans in their socio-religious festivals.

We have already said something in the section on religion about the important part played by the ymgi in the bear festival. One goes out many versts to meet them and gives them the most honored function at the festival, namely, the killing of the bear, and all this time they are the center of attention for the whole clan. They are everywhere fed to the bursting point, dragged around from yurt to yurt, and, finally, before departure given a large part of the bear carcass. All these acts of hospitality and respectful attention are crowned with serious religious rites, sanctifying the fraternal union of the clans. At the beginning of the festival, the ymgi exchange nich'i (symbol of united co-operation in hunting, see above) with the host; before departure, the ymgi presents to his akhmal'k in parting dogs, which, together with the dogs of the latter, will go to the master of the mountains, the common sustainer of the clan; and at the last moment the ymgi performs the ceremony of the "trampling of the threshold" (see above). Such things are not formalities for primitive man; they strengthen the ties of kinship with the higher sanction of religious authority.

But these ties are not limited only to occasional "sustenance" hospitality, invitations to hunts, and festivals.

614 615 621 They go still further, rising in their intensiveness to the power of a true clan bond. When a man has few clansmen, or he gets along badly with them, he leaves his native settlement and goes to live forever with his pandf'y. This is why, by the way, there are so few settlements made up of inhabitants belonging to one clan; everywhere /127/ clansmen are intermixed with their ymgi or akhmal'k'i. But these ties prove of

*614 /127 cont./ But these ties prove of
●615 particular value in matters of revenge. In urgent cases, when 621 a clan involved in war proves weak, the pandf'y assist it to 628 "raise the bones" and to protect itself against attack with the same selflessness as they show toward their own clansmen. Only in the payment of tkhusind may the pandf'y not participate. Still more valuable, perhaps, are the matrimonial ties in the matter of the reconciliation of clans, especially when the hostile clans are pandf'y to each other, as not infrequently happens, and we have already expressed in the section on revenge our own belief that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

*614 Such are the relations between the akhmal'k and ymgi clans,
615 relations which broaden the narrow framework of the closed
609 clan and extend its sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is a whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which finally become stronger than interclan ties and are transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people in general. The term navkh, which the members of the ymgi and akhmal'k clans of the corresponding generations give to each other, has finally become the customary appellation with which any member of another clan or stranger is addressed. This formal change is none other than the expression of a true and profound change in attitude toward members of other clans.

609 Hospitality, courtesy, compassion -- these are virtues
574 which the Gilyak in reality practice toward all without dis-
[157] crimination, not only toward tribesmen of other clans, not only toward indigenous neighbors of other tribes, such as the Orok, the Goldi, and the Ainu, but also toward newcomers, the Tungus, the Yakut, and, finally, the Russians, who have done them so much harm. How often have escaped convicts slain whole families of Gilyak after the most hospitable from its lair), sable hunting, and especially the hunting of sea animals in boats. And it is noteworthy that in these instances the Gilyak most frequently invites the participation, not of his clansmen, but of the ymgi, and not necessarily those married to his sister or daughter, but ymgi in general, i.e., the young men from that clan which takes its wives from him. The Gilyak feels more at ease with them than he does with his own /124/ clansmen; he can freely converse and joke with them, while he may not do this, as we know, with all of his clansmen. In turn, in their akhmal'k clan the ymgi feel like a fish in water; all the women of their generation are their an'gej (wives) -- all future wives and at any rate women to whom at any time they have conjugal rights in the broadest sense of the term. As concerns the local young male population, they find their revenge in the clan of their akhmal'k'i, where they meet the same reception from their "fathers-in-law" and among their numerous "wives." Between the male youth of both clans ("navkh'i") (1), as a result of

/123 cont./

1. Let us recall that ymgi and the "brothers" of their "wives" mutually call themselves navkh'i.

frequent meetings, not to mention relationship by marriage, the most touching relations are established. It is in these surroundings that friendships flower most of all. Among the Gilyak the practice of ceremonial brotherhood is very much in vogue. Ordinarily it manifests itself in the periodic exchange of presents, mutual aid in misfortune, and other such services. But the most touching instances of ceremonial brotherhood may be found among the navkh'i. Here is one such example, especially surprising to me, which I chanced to observe in the settlement of Ngambevo on the eastern shore of Sakhalin. Both friends, "navkh'i," lived in one yurt; they had everything in common, went about together like lovers, almost never separated -- a modern Orestes and Pylades. They were both,

/127 cont./

609 614 reception, and nonetheless only in the rarest cases will the Gilyak refuse to tender his hospitality to the Russian who has wandered his way. Where the Gilyak have dealt cruelly with 609 829 614 such fugitives (1), it was only in pursuance of clan vengeance

1. The Gilyak regard Russian fugitives as one clan, the representatives of which answer for one another.

for slain clansmen -- just what they consider their duty to do with respect to /128/ their own tribesman-murderer. But isolated acts of this sort do not at all change their general relations with members of other tribes. There are, of course, 186 609 among the Gilyak, as among civilized peoples, national 829 prejudices, but they are to be attributed entirely to ignorance, to lack of acquaintance with strange, unknown elements, giving a wide play to fantastic notions and fears. These prejudices exist among them even toward their own tribesmen who live in more remote regions. Thus the Gilyak of the western shore of Sakhalin are wont to represent their tribesmen of the Okhotsk shore as little short of cannibals, at any rate as extremely evil and inclined to theft, although this is the purest prejudice, the result of ignorance or generalizations from single cases. In the very same way after the first expeditions of our Cossacks in the seventeenth century the Gilyak called the Russians nothing other than kinr (devil), but then the Cossacks gave abundant cause for it, not only by their strange outer appearance, their novel garments and arms, but by a whole string of senseless cruelties and brigands' greediness for "the forties of forties" of valuable fur pelts. But now that the Gilyak have met peaceful Russian people, they recall their ancient "prejudice" as a funny anecdote and can conduct themselves with true humanity toward their neighbors.

But we have strayed somewhat from our main theme. We 174 614 can now resume it. 615

/128 cont./

174 Those manifest social habits and feelings which we observe
* 614 in the contemporary Gilyak, which he indisputably acquired
● 615 in the beneficial school of social relations, originally developed among the matrimonial clans and from them were gradually transferred first to every tribesman, later to neighbors of other tribes, and finally to man in general.

But the source of social ties between the matrimonial clans akhmal'k and ymgi, as we have seen, is rooted in that wonderful organization of the Gilyak clan, to the analysis of which we have devoted this chapter. In this evolution from the egoism of the closed clan through ties with pandf'y of other clans, close by blood, to sympathy and humanity for all men, both close and distant, is contained, perhaps, the most instructive conclusion of our long analysis. From that moment when the rule that a man should marry the daughter of his uncle on the mother's side was established, there was also laid the firm foundation for the extensive growth of social habits and feelings.

/129/

59 114

The Social Organization of the Gilyak

(Family and Marital-Sexual Norms)

I.

Introduction

Upon superficial acquaintance the structure of the Gilyak family and its sexual norms appear to be so simple, conventional, and similar to ours that they can mislead even the serious observer. The well-known academician Leopold Schrenck, who lived among the Gilyak for more than two years and left us the well-known, multi-volumed monograph on this tribe, was profoundly convinced that he was dealing with the ordinary patriarchal-monandrous family. This appeared so obvious to

/136 cont./

614 602 Forms of kinship. According to the basic structure of Gilyak marriage law, relationship by marriage must coincide with kinship. The Gilyak distinguish two main categories of kinship, which may be called: agnate kinship and cognate kinship. The first embraces all persons bound together by a common origin from one forefather, that is, all individuals born or adopted into one or another clan. Upon marriage, women pass into the clan of their husbands. There are two kinds of cognate kinship: the first embraces that clan or those clans to which the women -- agnates of a given clan -- are given in marriage; the second embraces that clan or clans from which a given clan or its separate members have drawn their wives.

614 The persons bound together in agnate kinship are united
● 615 under the common name "k:khal-n'ig:yvyn" or simply k:khal --
602 the people of the clan, clansmen (from k:khal -- clan, n'ig:yvyn -- person). With respect to the first group of cognates, i.e., to the members of the clan or clans which take or have taken their wives from the k:khal-n'ig:yvyn, these latter and their whole clan are united under the common designation of akhmalk (fathers-in-law) and, conversely, ymg:i (sons-in-law /zyat'ya, "sons-in-law" or "brothers-in-law" in Russian/). On the other hand, in relation to the second group of cognates, i.e., that clan or those clans from which they themselves take women, they are ymg:i (sons-in-law) and, conversely, akhmalk. Both cognate groups in relation to the first, and all three among themselves, bear /137/ the characteristic designation pandf (from pandynd -- to be born), that is, consanguineous, bound by a common origin (1) through women. Thus, relationship

* [114 601]

1. Schrenck (III, p. 23) quite erroneously asserts that kinsmen on the father's side, i.e., agnates, members of one and the same clan, call each other ngafk, and that kinsmen on the mother's side call each other amal'. In reality, both terms, on the contrary, designate exclusively relationship either through the mother or through the wife, but under no conditions on the father's side. Kinsmen through the father bear the name already mentioned by us: k:khal, k:khal-n'ig:yvyn.

/137 cont./

614 615 603 ● * 601 114

Thus, relationship

614 602 by marriage and cognate relationship are completely identical concepts among the Gilyak. We shall see how this has come about upon examining the marriage norms. Now, let us pro-614 ceed to an examination of each category of kinship separately.
* 601 Agnate kinship, kinship within the clan. Within the clan the 602 Gilyak distinguish only three lines: 1) the ascending generation "the generation of my fathers"), without distinguishing between direct and collateral lines, since the brothers of the father are called by the same term as own fathers; they only distinguish the generations of the ascending line; 1st generation, 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, etc.;

2) the descending generation ("the generation of my children"), in which by children is understood not only the descendants of the speaker and of the whole class of his own brothers and collateral brothers of all degrees, but all the subsequent descending generations of these persons;

3) within each generation the lines of collateral kinship, embracing the class of brothers and sisters (own and collateral), the so-called class "tuvn."

In addition, in each generation of clansmen the class of husbands and wives is distinguished.

The class of brothers and sisters ("tuvn"). For a better understanding of what is to follow we shall begin with that class called tuvn (2). The peculiarity of this term consists first of

[184 197]

2. A term borrowed from the eastern dialect; in the western dialect it is ruf.

/203 cont./ The custom of brothers' living together with one

* 174 wife became ever rarer. In the works of the epos, such 177 595 passages as "so many brothers were supporting one wife" are [538] almost the usual thing. More than a hundred years ago, Mamio Rinso /Rinzô Mamiya/ described such facts as being ordinary phenomena, while nowadays they are more and more rarely encountered.

Such are the conditions which stood in the way of the 17 inviolable existence of the phratry. But however powerful
● [615] these conditions appeared, the force of the primordial norms, having become religious imperatives, naturally preserved their power, and the new influences broke a trail for themselves, adapting themselves to the old norms by means of a whole series of correctives and fictions... How this occurred we shall see immediately.

VI.

The Dynamics of the Destructive Conditions

178
* 614 Of all the conditions mentioned which are destructive 615 to the phratry (emigration, depopulation, wars, destruction of economic equality, seasonal expeditions, the most powerful factor is the depopulation of clans, and besides, as we have said above, catastrophic depopulation which strikes the individual clans unequally. How must this factor have operated on the surviving clans? Let us recall the third table of our four-clan phratry. Let us suppose that clan A has died out or there are only a few persons left in it, and this is the clan from which clan C took women. We shall consider the first case, where clan A has died out without a trace. What happens then? What then is to be done by the orphaned clans C, which used to take wives from A, and B, which gave wives to clan A? Of course, first of all, the members of these clans will search for some solution within the phratry itself, in which only pure marriage is possible.

/203 cont./

178 But clan C may not take women from D, because the latter
*614 takes wives from it, and the mutual exchange of women
●615 between two clans is not allowed in any case; on the same basis, clan B cannot give its women to clan D. There remains but one solution, that C take women from B. This solution, in addition, has all the signs of orthodoxy for both clans. First of all, these two clans formerly did not stand in a marriage relationship to each other. In addition, for C, after the disappearance of clan A, B is the closest on the mother's side (for /204/ clan A took women from this clan and supplied women to clan C), and, finally, clan B is the father-in-law of C, although of the second degree, so that, after A, it is its natural successor with respect to C. The sole obstacle to the lawfulness of this compromise is that clan C, due to the fact that it gives its women to D, is in turn, tujma akhmalk for clan B and thus does not have a right to take women from it. In a word, the matter ends with the phratry's becoming a three-clan one. The only solution is to increase the phratry by one more clan, a fifth one, E, which would give its women to D and take women from C. This new clan for the phratry may appear, as in North America, through the splitting of one of the old clans into two fictitious clans (in this case, C would divide itself into two halves, one of which would fill the role of clan E). We have no data on this either in contemporary practice or in legends. But there was no necessity for this. The process of depopulation struck all the other phratries at the same time. And it was easy to find a single clan, a remnant of a destroyed phratry, which in turn was seeking to unite with a phratry. That such a solution was the most practical is seen not only from the practice in contemporary life; it follows from the inevitable logic of facts. We started from the supposition that only one clan, A, died out, but again and again phratries can lose not one, but two or three clans, and then they were inevitably obliged to begin: either the co-optation of separate clans into the phratry, or the merging of different alien clans among themselves to form a new phratry.

/204 cont./

178 In just this way, under exceptional conditions, it is true,
*614 the foundation of the marital-clan system was breached, but
●615 once it was breached in this way, it had to spread more and more and lead to the condition where marriages of different persons outside of the old phratry became, if not lawful, at least a completely acceptable phenomenon.

Now we shall consider the second case, where clan A does not die out completely, but has only become considerably thinned out in people. On account of the shortage of women in clan A, a part of the men of clan C were obliged to take their wives, as in the first case, from the closest lawful clan, namely, from B, but in the case where, as in the first instance, C does not have a right to give its women to D, and therefore to the phratry, in order to guarantee D women, a fifth clan, E, will have to be added, giving women to D and taking them from C. But, besides this, there is still another consequence, which confuses matters still more.

Since both the members of clan A and some of the members of clan C take /205/ women from clan B, then the first and second in each generation will be married to sisters, and, although they are members of different clans, they will be members of a group marriage with a group of sisters (1) and their children, as the terminology shows (see above), will be tuvn, i.e., brothers and sisters, and, consequently, forbidden for each other, so that in the following generation the women from clan A will not have the possibility of marrying into clan C and will be obliged every second generation to seek their husbands entirely outside their phratry, which still more destroys the strength and

[601] 1. By a curious coincidence in this case the group husbands call each other navkh -- a term signifying the same thing as the famous term punalua, comrade, participator.

/205 cont./

178 unity of the latter. Life, it is true, has somewhat softened
*614 the rigor of the prohibition; in some clans at the present ●615 time the prohibition covers only those members of clans who are actually married to sisters, but formerly, evidently, the prohibition embraced all the members of both clans; even in its weakened aspect, however, the prohibition leads unavoidably one way or another to some cases of marriage outside the phratry.

The case which we have just discussed is by no means hypothetical; it is repeated in its peculiar form in the daily life of the Gilyak at the present time. As an illustration of this, we may use the legal case which we introduced earlier, with the consequences that follow from the marriage of two persons of different clans to two sisters, where one man is from the akhmalk clan and the other from the ymgiil clan. It is of interest to repeat here that in this case group marriage among several clans is no longer allowed, but the children of these marriages are considered tuvn and cannot marry each other.

Thus, the depopulation and the thinning out of the people of a clan leads to the following extremely important consequences: 1) allowing free marriage to a woman not from the clan of one's mother begins; 2) members of one and the same clan can be married to women of different clans; 3) a man and his "brother-in-law" /zyat'/ (navkh, brother of his brother's wife, i.e., brother of his own wife) may not be married to sisters; 4) finally, thanks to free marriages, the old four-clan phratry entirely loses its limits, for, as we shall see further on, to every clan into which even one member of the phratry has become related by marriage are extended those same rights and obligations which pertain to a clan of the phratry, and thus it is as though this new clan were adopted into the old phratry.

174 For a certain time, the "free" marriage was a more or 178 less /206/ exceptional phenomenon, called forth by condi-
*614 tions likewise of an exceptional character. In its way stood 615 a huge obstacle -- the religious imperative which prohibited

/206 cont./

174 giving women to alien clans. The procuring of such women 178 presented great difficulties. As a result of this long struggle
*614 for the women of alien clans -- a struggle about which it will ●615 be necessary for us to speak in detail later, there appeared the [583] institution of the "bride price," payment for the bride -- an institution which removed all obstacles to free marriage.

174 But once having appeared, the institution of the bride
178 price became, in turn, a powerful factor for the spreading 583 of the institution of the free marriage.

*614 The bride price became the most powerful temptation
615 for violating the old norms, even in cases where there was no necessity for their being violated.

For poor people, daughters became capital, and the rich, who came into being with the establishment of trade relations, began to look on the free marriage union as a means of satisfying their ambition and of becoming related to people who were their equals in wealth and distinction.

*614 And nevertheless, notwithstanding all the unfavorable 615 circumstances, notwithstanding the intrusion of the new in-178 stitution of "free" marriage, the old norms continue to live and to preserve their power over minds. In the great majority of cases the old imperative still is stronger than all [583] the temptations of bride price and of free marriage. In the [582] eyes of the contemporary Gilyak, marriage from the akhmalk clan, from the mother's clan, is still the only "pure" marriage, and the most favored marriage for each individual man is marriage to the daughter of the mother's brother, in which case bride price is not only not required, but is not even allowed. Free marriages are rather sporadic phenomena, which destroy the customary norm for only a moment and then are spontaneously drawn into the ruts of the old norm. This comes about in different ways. In some cases a man may not marry for one or another reason from his mother's clan, but his offspring nevertheless again begin to take wives from the old clan of the ancestress. In other cases, if for some reason a return is not possible, then the alien clan from which the man takes his wife becomes the lawful marriage clan for his offspring, who in each generation

/206 cont./

*614 marry, according to the old norm, the daughter of the
●615 mother's brother. Finally, in some cases the descendants
178 of this man take wives /207/ either from the old or from the new clan of the father-in-law, depending on circumstances, and both clans begin to be considered lawful clans. It may happen that not merely two, but many more of these lawful clans are accumulated in the course of time, both for the individual person and for the whole clan, but nevertheless each man as an individual strives to observe the old norm in arranging a marriage, seeking his wife above all from the clan of his mother, preferably always the daughter of the brother of this last.

Such is the power of the old norm. But its role is not limited to this. Compelled to make a retreat in one direction, it develops the strength of its age-old inertia with still greater intensity in other directions. Having out of necessity allowed marriages outside the phratry, having allowed the possibility for members of one clan to take wives from different clans, it has extended the whole system of regulations both to the free marriages and to all the clans which even sporadically enter into marriage relations with this or that clan.

*614 This amalgamation of the old institution with the new 615 one and the extension to it of all the regulations of the old
601 norms and prohibitions have made not only the kinship
178 terminology, but also the character of the group marriage unusually complicated and confused. Under the old system, when marriages were arranged from one particular clan, the picture of the group marriage appeared entirely clear and simple: in each generation all the "brothers" of one clan participated in a group marriage with all the sisters of the same generation in the other clan. For this reason the wives of brothers called each other sisters, and the husbands of sisters called each other brothers, for both groups were such in reality.

/208 cont./

* 614
• 615 601
178

then all these five clans and their five clans of akhmalk'i will be akhmalk'i to the whole of clan of A and will be prohibited for the women of A (only up to the third generation, it is true). But if we also add to these ten clans those two clans of original akhmalk'i of the first and second degree, then clan A will have 12 clans of akhmalk'i of the first and second degree to which it may not give its women. This tendency toward extension could lead to extreme difficulties in arranging a marriage, for with every new free marriage the number of clans which are available for marriage is reduced, but in practice the consequences of this extended regulation are allayed by the still firm tendency of the clan and of its separate members to depart from the old norm of taking wives from one particular clan, the clan of the mother, only in the most extreme cases.

This extended regulation introduced still greater confusion into the kinship terminology and into the norms of group marriage. Earlier, the classificatory system extended, in addition to the clan of the speaker, also to two other clans -- the clan of the fathers-in-law and the clan of the son-in-law /zyat'/, and the designations corresponded to the sexual relations. If, for example, I, a man, called the sisters of my fathers-in-law mothers, then this corresponded to reality, for the sisters of my "fathers-in-law" were group wives of my "fathers" and one of them was actually my mother. Or, if I, a man, called each "father-in-law" in that same clan of "fathers-in-law" the brother of my mother, and his daughter (the daughter of my mother's brother) my wife, then this corresponded to the actual kinship relations. Now that, due to /209/ occasional free marriages, the classificatory terminology has been extended to a whole set of clans which are completely alien to all the clansmen, the designations "fathers-in-law," "mothers," "daughters of the mother's brother," and so forth are extended to persons who are not such in actuality, and nevertheless in this new circle of persons all the old norms of group marriage between

/209 cont./

*614 corresponding persons are obligatory. And it is entirely ●615 natural that the number of persons drawn into the circle
601 of classificatory kinship is ever larger, and the knowledge 178 of this kinship, so simple before, becomes a real science, into which a person is initiated during childhood and in which he becomes proficient only when he reaches maturity It is natural, therefore, that the classificatory system gives the European an impression of complete confusion and inexplicability. In reality, all the terms of kinship and the sexual norms which now appear so confused and illogical are explained quite simply -- the intrusion of the new practice of free marriage into the old staunchly persistent system of the old imperative, according to which marriage was a blood-kinship union and was obligatory from the clan of the mother.

VII.

The Phratry and Its Genesis

*614 We have seen how, owing to the primordial norms of 615 marriage, the principle aim of which was to provide the progeny of an ancestor with wives from a group of persons in a distinct category of blood kinship, there automatically arose exogamous groups, clans. The essential significance of the clan consisted in the common right and obligation to supply its members with women outside of their own number, in other strictly defined groups-clans. Thus, in its basic function, each clan taken separately is by no means a self-sufficient organism. The existence of each clan is organically bound to the existence of at least two other clans related to the first by blood, one the clan of its ancestress, from which it takes its wives, the other the clan of the sisters of its ancestor, to which it is obliged to give its own women, and, furthermore, these two clans, as we have seen, may not coincide, since the exchange of women between two clans is not allowed.

/124 cont./

it is true, very young, unmarried, and it is difficult to say what happened to their feelings later on, but the mere possibility of such examples illustrates boldly the relations between members of matrimonial clans.

The principle of mutual aid between members of matrimonial clans is reflected in the right of inheritance, to which, despite the strict agnatic basis, there is only one exception, namely, with regard to the pandf'y; by a will, as we already know, the ymgi can obtain the iron "shagund" (i.e., going for the bride price), while the akhmal'k can obtain the fur "shagund" (going toward the bride's dowry). This rule, which reduces the bride price to the simple formality of taking it from one pocket and putting it in another, serves, incidentally, as an important indication of the fact that originally among the Gilyak the bride price did not bear the character of payment for the bride, but rather was a form of religious ransom. But for what?

The fact is that under the Gilyak norms of marriage the bride price is in general a strange anomaly. Actually, once marriage /125/ from the clan of the mother is a religious obligation, and even preferable between the children of brother and sister, how can there be any talk of payment or ransom for the bride? Obviously the rise of this institution must have been due to some recent change in the marriage norms. This change we know: it consisted in the fact that in some instances when marriage from the clan of the mother was impossible, it became necessary to take wives from a strange clan, but this clan, in its turn, was obligated to keep its women for its own lawful ymgi and therefore could only accede to giving away its women by masking it with some act of pious deception of the gods, which would at the same time be profitable for the father-in-law. By analogy with the religious ransom in cases of revenge (see above), there thus arose the institution of the bride price, satisfying both the interests of the father-in-law and the dictates of religion. In its turn, the ymgi clan, which

/125 cont./

* 614
● 615
174 583

violated its own law, protected itself by another fiction: the whole clan of the "unlawful" father-in-law received the title of akhmal'k and became, as it were, a lawful clan for marriage unions. As such instances increased, the bride price, whose exclusive genesis had been forgotten, became the general rule in all marriages, even with lawful clans.

Such, perhaps, was the origin of the bride price among other peoples as well.

* 614 615 796 574
182

Another weighty factor which consolidated the bonds between matrimonial clans is the participation of the pandf'y in the bear festival.

In the sense of cementing interclan relations it plays almost a greater role than the Olympic games for the tribal unification of the Greeks. The bear festival takes place every winter, now in one, now in another settlement, while in populous settlements a rare winter passes without a festival. Attendance at such a festival involves no difficulties. The sled, which every household possesses, is harnessed, and off they go; the rest is not the guest's worry.

Everywhere on the road, as in the village where the festival is held, his dogs will be fed and he himself will be treated to the choicest dishes. And in return for the small annoyance of travel there is a whole array of high social gratifications: in the first place, the very rite of the festival -- the procession, the shooting at the target, the killing, the skinning of the bear, etc.; then, meetings with the ablest and most respected representatives of the tribe; finally, the competition /126/ in wrestling, races, and dances, the feasts, conversations, jokes, and songs, in a word, an endless series of enjoyments. Against the somber background of his gray existence, the hungry days, the deprivations, dangers, and monotonous impressions, the bear festivals appear as the most joyous moments of existence, as it were, landmarks of everyday life which one recollects and dreams about. But these noisy, populous festivals are strictly regulated. Besides clansmen, only ymgi are invited, and these have the right to invite their own ymgi but akhmal'k do not participate at all.

/207 cont./

*614 615 601 178 With the appearance of the institution of free marriage, the clansmen-brothers may be married to women from different clans, i.e., complete strangers to each other, and nevertheless, by the old presumption, these women call each other sisters and become the group wives of their husbands-brothers. In exactly the same way, clanswomen-sisters may be married to men from different clans, and nevertheless these latter, although they are complete strangers to one another, will have group rights to their wives, and their offspring will call each other tuvn (German Geschwister /siblings/) and will not have the right to marry each other.

And, finally, we have seen that even "brothers-in-law" /zyat'ya/, i.e., persons of whom one is a member of a group marriage with the sister of another, may be married to sisters from a third clan. And in this case, although these persons have lost their rights of group marriage with /208/ respect to their sisters-wives, nevertheless all their children are considered tuvn and may not marry each other.

Furthermore, formerly, under the pure intraphratral marriage, the clan did not have the right to give women either to that clan from which it itself took women or to the clan from which this other clan took wives, i.e., to the clans of fathers-in-law of the first and second degrees of kinship. This, as we have seen, was an automatic consequence of the rule under which a clan was obligated to give women to one of the other three clans of the phratry, namely, to that clan into which was married the sister of the father of their ancestor, and accordingly the other two clans of fathers-in-law became eo ipso prohibited for women of the given clan. Now, when individual members of a clan may take wives even outside the clan of the mother, the designation of akhmalk of the first and second degree is extended to all the clans from which even one clansman has taken his wife. Thus there may be a situation in which, if five men from clan A marry freely with persons from five separate clans,

/209 cont./

For each individual member of the clan this is expressed in the fact that outside of the clan in which he himself was born and in which neither he nor his progeny may marry, he must have /210/ at least two other clans: one the clan of his mother's brother, from which he and his male offspring take wives, and the other -- the clan of his father's sister, into which his female offspring marry.

As we know from the kinship terminology, the next to last clan mentioned bears with respect to the first one the special designation of akhmalk k:khal (clan of the fathers-in-law), and the last one ymg:i (clan of the sons-in-law /zyat'ya/), and all together are called pandf (persons of common origin). Since all three of these clans are blood kin (a man marries the daughter of his mother's brother, and women marry the sons of their father's sister), in marriage relations each separate clan is in this fashion an organic member of a tripartite, blood-kin, three-clan union of pandf, a real cognate phratry, for in each generation all the husbands and wives are cognate male and female cousins. The Gilyak phratry, however, has nothing in common with the Morgan one, for within it marriages are not only allowed, but are obligatory.

The Gilyak three-clan phratry may be presented in the form of the following schematic table: (see following page)

Schem

Clan A (Andrey)

Ancestors:
Andrey, Vera.
Andrey -- brother of Anna, who is married into clan S.
Vera -- sister of Vasiliy from clan V.

Their children:
1) The sons marry the daughters of the brothe of their mother, of Vasiliy of clan V.

2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister o their father, of Anna of clan S.

1: Shternberg--309 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*614 615 602

/210 cont./

natic Table No. 1 of the Three-clan Cognate Phratry.

	Clan V (Vasiliy)	Clan S (Stepan)
	Ancestors: Vasiliy, Sof'ya. Vasiliy -- brother of Vera, who is married into clan A. Sof'ya -- sister of Stepan from clan S.	Ancestors: Stepan, Anna. Stepan -- brother of Sof'ya, who is married into clan V. Anna -- sister of Andrey from clan A.
er f	Their children: 1) The sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Stepan from clan S. 2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Vera from clan A.	Their children: 1) The sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Andrey from clan A. 2) The daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Sof'ya from clan V.

1: Shternberg--310 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/210 cont. /

In succeeding generations marriages proceed according to the same rule: men marry the daughters of their mother's brother, women marry the sons of their father's sister.

In such a form the phratry provided, matrimonially, for all the clans entering it, satisfying the basic norm of marriage, because in each of these clans a man marries the daughter /211/ of his mother's brother, and women marry into a third clan, the sons of their father's sister.

But such a marital organization of the phratry violates another norm of marriage, according to which it is prohibited to give women to the clan of the father-in-law of the second degree (tujma akhmalk). Applying this norm to our hypothetical phratry, we obtain the following:

Clan V gives women to A, which, in turn, gives them to S; consequently, V is the father-in-law of the second degree to S, and therefore this latter cannot give women to clan V, and, thus, the wife of Vasiliy cannot be the sister of Stepan. Thus, the men of clan V remain without wives, and the women of S -- without husbands. To remove this obstacle it is necessary that there be one clan in the phratry, a fourth, from which V would take women and to which clan S would give its women, and, thus, a four-clan phratry appeared on the scene.

The corresponding changes in the kinship relations of the four-clan phratry will be clear from Table No. 2. (see following page)

Clan A (Andrey)

Ancestors:

Andrey, Vera.
Andrey -- brother of Anna, who is married into clan S.
Vera -- sister of Vasiliy from clan V.

Their children:

1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Vasiliy from clan V.

1: Shternberg--311 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RXC Glyak RXC
/211 cont./
614
615
692

Schematic Table No. 2 of the Four-clan Cognate Phratry.

Clan V (Vasiliy)	Clan S (Stepan)	Clan D (Dem'yan)
Ancestors:	Ancestors:	Ancestors:
Vasiliy, Sof'ya. Vasiliy -- brother of Vera, who is married into clan A. Sof'ya -- sister of Dem'yan from clan D.	Stepan, Anna. Stepan -- brother of Mariya, who is married into clan D. Anna -- sister of Andrey from clan A.	Dem'yan, Mariya. Dem'yan -- brother of Sof'ya, who is married into clan V. Mariya -- sister of Stepan from clan S.
Their children:	Their children:	Their children:
1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Dem'yan from clan D.	1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Andrey, from clan A.	1) Sons marry the daughters of the brother of their mother, of Stepan from clan S.

(cont.)

/211 cont./

*614 In succeeding generations marriages proceed according ●615 to the same principle as in the foregoing generations: the men marry the daughters of their mother's brother, and the women marry the sons of their father's sister.

Analyzing this table, we see that:

1) In each clan every generation of men takes its wives from the /212/ clan from which their ancestress came, specifically, each individual man takes a wife from the clan of his mother, while the women of each clan marry, according to generation, into the clan into which their ancestress was married, specifically, each individual woman takes her husband from that clan in which her father's sister is married. Exchange of women between two clans is not permitted.

2) Clan A, therefore, takes its women from clan V (the clan from which the ancestress of A, Vera, was taken), but it cannot in return give its women to this clan, but gives them to clan S, where the sister of its ancestor, Anna, is married. It therefore remains for clan V to take its wives either from S or from D, but clan S is prohibited to it, because in relation to this clan it is tujma akhmalk, father-in-law of the second degree (see above); therefore it remains for clan V to take its wives only from clan D, from which was drawn the ancestress of clan V (Sof'ya). After that only the women from clan S and the men from clan D remain unaccounted for, and, as we see from the table, the latter marry the former, and thus the entire phratry is provided for matrimonially, and all the marriage norms are observed.

3) In every conjugal pair, the husband is the son of the sister of the father of his wife, and, consequently, husband and wife are always cognate cousins.

[602] The interrelationships of the members of the various clans of the phratries are clear from the following analysis of the relationships between the ancestors. Let us begin with Andrey from clan A.

/212 cont./

*614 Andrey is a cousin of the first degree of Vasily and ●615 Vera, because the sister of the father of the latter was the 602 mother of Andrey. In exactly the same way, Andrey is a cousin of the first degree of Stepan and Mariya, because the mother of the latter is the sister of the father of Andrey. Only in relation to Dem'yan and Sof'ya is Andrey a cousin of the second degree, for the clan of Dem'yan (D) takes its women from S, which, in turn, takes them from A; consequently the grandmother of Dem'yan was the sister of the grandfather of A, and thus Andrey and Dem'yan are cognate cousins of the second degree.

It is easy to see that the relationship of every other ancestor to the others is the same as that of Andrey, and similar relationships will exist in every generation between the representatives of the different clans, since the marriage norm in every case is the same. From this analysis it follows that: 1) in each generation the representatives of all four clans are either brothers and sisters to each other, or cousins. In a word, people of the same origin on the male and female side; 2) in clans united by marriage relationships, in each generation the husbands, on the one hand, and their wives, on the other, are cognate cousins of the first degree; 3) between clans not /213/ united by marriage relationships, i.e., clans which are tujma akhmalk to each other, for example, between clans A and D, both the husbands and wives are reciprocally cousins of the second degree, i.e., they are more distantly related than the marrying clans; thus remoteness of kinship beyond a certain degree, as in Australia, is an obstacle to marriage.

The relationship between the marrying ones may be defined in greater detail in the following manner: if "I" am a man, my father-in-law is the brother of my mother and a cousin of the first degree of my father, while my mother-in-law is a cousin of the second degree of my father and a cousin of the first degree of my mother. If "I" am a woman, my father-in-law is a cousin of the first degree of my father and a cousin of the second degree of

/213 cont./

*614 my mother, while my mother-in-law is the sister of my ●615 father and a cousin of the first degree of my mothers; that 602 is to say, husband and wife are kin on both their fathers' and their mothers' sides. On the side of their fathers, on the one hand, and on the side of their mothers, on the other, they are alike cousins of the second degree; on the side of the father of the wife and of the mother of the husband, they are cousins of the first degree, while on the side of the father of the husband and of the mother of the wife, they are cousins of the third degree.

4) The kinship relations between the clans work out in the following ways: a) clan A is the akhmalk (father-in-law in the first degree) of clan S; it is also the tujma akhmalk (father-in-law of the second degree) of clan D, and, finally, the ymgri (son-in-law /syat'/) of clan V (although at the same time it is formally the father-in-law of the third degree of the latter, because D is the father-in-law of V); b) clan V stands in exactly the same relationship toward clans A, S, and D, as does clan S toward clans D, V and A, and, finally, clan D toward clans V, A and S. All the clans stand in the relation of pandf (people of a common origin) to each other. From this relationship between the clans it follows that an ymgri is the father-in-law of the third degree in relation to his genuine father-in-law, from which it appears, in turn, that a father-in-law of the third degree is a degree of kinship completely unnecessary for the regulation of marriage. And, in fact, it does not exist in the terminology, which has only two forms of kinship with the father-in-law: akhmalk (father-in-law of the first degree), and tujma akhmalk (father-in-law of the second degree).

5) From the above it follows that the tujma akhmalk assumes a reciprocal relationship: A is the tujma akhmalk of D, while D, in turn, is the tujma akhmalk of A, and, since, as we know from the contemporary marriage rights of the Gilyak, women cannot be given to the tujma akhmalk

/213 cont./

*614 clan, in view of the reciprocity of the clans standing in the ●615 tujma akhmalk relationship, no marriage relationships are 602 possible between them. As we have seen above, the obstacle is not the closeness /214/ of kinship, but, on the contrary, the distant degree of kinship in comparison with the relationship to the other clans of the phratry.

VIII.

Cousin Marriage

532 We have seen that the basic form of marriage among *104 the Gilyak is marriage between the son of a sister and the 121 daughter of her brother. Thus, the type of the Gilyak marriage is a variety of the so-called cousin marriage.

How did this variety come about? This leads us necessarily to the general problem of kuzennogo braka (cousin marriage /given in Eng./) as an important stage in the evolution of marriage. I shall allow myself to dwell briefly on this problem.

532 As long ago as 1900, in my report to the Russian
*104 Geographical Society and in subsequent articles -- "Teoriia 121 rodovogo byta /Theory of Clan Life/" and "Endogamiia i 114 ekzogamiia /Endogamy and Exogamy/" -- starting from an analysis of the Gilyak form of marriage, I showed that cousin marriage is the primary form of exogamy and that it gave rise to the classificatory system of marriage, group marriage, and the institution of the clan. At that time I showed that the exogamous institution of the clan was not only an institution of prohibitions, but an institution whose main function was to provide a given kinship union with a constant reservoir of wives from a group of persons bound by a community of blood, which plays such an important role in the various stages of the community.

/228 cont./

114 the wife of a son of my mother's brother, is my "sister"
191 (typical cross-marriage). A corresponding series of terms
*104 is met if "I" am a woman.
801 All this is without question evidence that the Turanian
*835 system was a system of cross-cousin marriage, although the examples introduced by us above (the Batak and the tribes of central India) are evidence that even in the homeland of this system cross-cousin marriage has already begun to change to the unilateral cousin marriage of the Gilyak type.

121 It now remains to explain from this point of view a con-
*104 tradictory (according to Morgan's opinion) fact in the 601 Ganowanian system, namely, that, in contradistinction to *835 the Tamil system, if "I" am a man, then all the children of ●615 my male cousins, that is, the children of my father's sister's 191 son and the children of my mother's brother's son, are my 104 "sons and daughters." We find the analogue of this in the Gilyak system. Let us recall the four-clan phratry and the case where clan V was short of women, and male cousins of the first clam A and V were obliged to take wives from the corresponding generation of clan S; under the norms of group marriage the children of these cousins are each other's "brothers" and "sisters" and, consequently, are children for both male cousins. The first step in this direction was the formation of that four-clan phratry which we have seen among the Gilyak. This happened quite simply, and we shall see that these four clans in an embryonic state exist also in the Australian system.

121 Let us imagine a society divided, like the Australian
*104 one, into two phratries, exchanging women in each genera-
*835 tion, so that the children of a sister marry the children of 615 her brother, and thus the wife of each man is the sister of the husband of his sister.

/229/

*104 Let us further suppose for simplicity's sake that each *835 phratry consists of one generation -- groups of brothers and 121 sisters, own and collateral, of different degrees of kinship.

●615 We shall designate groups of male cousins of one division with capital letters. $A^1 + A^2 + A^3 + A^4 \ldots$, and their sisters with the corresponding small letters $a^1 + a^2 + a^3 + a^4 \ldots$. In the other phratry the corresponding designation for the brothers will be $V^1 + V^2 + V^3 + V^4 \ldots$, and for their sisters $v^1 + v^2 + v^3 + v^4$, where identical letters with identical indices designate a group of own brothers and sisters, while different indices designate the degree of cousin kinship among different groups (adjacent groups will be cousins of the first degree, while the degree of kinship between other groups will be expressed by variations in their indices). Like indices of groups having different letters show that persons of these groups are cousins of the first degree both on their father's side and on their mother's side; A^1, and a^1 are cousins of the first degree to V^1, v^1; A^2, a^2 are also cousins of the first degree to V^2, v^2, etc. But in groups having different letters and different indices, the difference in the indices plus one will show the corresponding degree of cousin kinship: A^1, a^1 are cousins of the second degree to V^2, v^2; A^2, a^2 are cousins of the second degree to V^3, v^3, etc.

Since groups with different letters and identical indices are cousins of the first degree, and these groups are mutually obliged to marry each other, A^1 marries v^1 (the sister of V^1), while the latter marries a^1, the sister of A^1; likewise A^2 marries v^2, V^2 marries a^2, etc.

A general picture of marriage can thus be presented in the form of the following table:

Division I $(A^1 + V^1) + (A^2 + V^2) + (A^3 + V^3) + (A^4 + V^4)$ etc.
Division II $(V^1 + a^1) + (V^2 + a^2) + (V^3 + a^3) + (V^4 + a^4)$ etc.

/229 cont./

121 The general composition of the phratry may be represented *104 in the following table (see p. 230 /of the original text/).
*835 /230/
121
*104 / ●615 /
*835

I	II
Group of male cousins	Groups of male cousins
$A^1 - A^2 + A^3 + A^4 + A^5 \ldots$	$V^1 + V^2 + V^3 + V^4 + V^5 + V^6 \ldots$
Their sisters
$a^1 + a^2 + a^3 + a^4 + a^5 + a^6 \ldots$	$v^1 + v^2 + v^3 + v^4 + v^5 + v^6 \ldots$

Since the groups $A^1 + A^2 + A^3 + A^4$ etc. and their sisters are related to one another in the same way as the members of the second group V^1, V^2, V^3, V^4 and their sisters, according to the norms of cross-cousin marriage, A^1 is married to v^1 (a sister of V^1); A^2 is married to v^2; A^3 to v^3; A^4 to v^4, etc., and, conversely, V^1 is married to a^1, V^2 to a^2, V^3 to a^3, V^4 to a^4, etc., in each generation.

Now let us imagine the moment when society first became aware of the harm of cross marriage between cousins of the first [171] degree. From the details of Australian marriage, we know that the first step in this direction was the prohibition of cross marriage between cousins of the first degree and the establishing of cross marriage between cousins of the second degree. As a consequence of this, A^1 no longer marries v^1, but rather his cousin of the second degree, v^2, just as V^1 must now marry a^2, etc.

Marriages under this new arrangement present the following appearance: Division I $(A^1 + v^2) + (A^2 + v^3) + (A^3 + v^4) + (V^1 + a^2) + (V^2 + a^3) + (V^3 + a^4)$ etc. (see errata for original p. 230, line 18, on p. 739 of the foreign text.).
Division II $(V^1 + a^2) + (V^2 + a^3) + (V^3 + a^4) + (V^1 + a^3) + (V^2 + a^4) + (V^3 + a^5)$ etc.

It is easy to see that under this arrangement each half of the society is in turn separated into two halves, into two matrimonially isolated groups, namely, the odd members of each division make up only one group, while the even members make up another, and in both divisions together four groups are formed.

/230 cont./

121 This four-group division is expressed in the following form:
*174 Group I $(A^1 + v^3) + (A^3 + v^1) + (A^5 + v^6)$ and other odd ● 615 members.
*835 Group II $(A^2 + v^1) + (A^4 + v^3) + (A^6 + v^5)$ and other even members.

Group III $(V^1 + a^2) + (V^3 + a^4) + (V^5 + a^6)$ and other odd members.

Group IV $(V^2 + a^1) + (V^4 + a^3) + (V^6 + a^5)$ and other even members.

121 The first group is nebrakopravomochna (inmarriageable 171 /given in English/) with IV, because in some cases, if the *174 families become joined in wedlock in /231/ consecutive 615 order, for example $(A^1 + v^2)$ with $(V^2 + a^1)$, then the chil-
*835 dren of these families will be bilateral cousins, for their fathers are mutually married to each other's sisters; in other cases, for example in families $(A^1 + v^2)$ and $(V^4 + a^3)$, the children will be not cousins of the second degree, but cousins of the third or fourth degree, which is avoided by the Australian system. For the same reason groups II and III are unmarriageable, while groups I and III and groups II and IV are entirely marriageable in the consecutive order of the families. Thus, for example, in the families $(A^1 + v^2)$ from group I and $(V^1 + a^2)$ from III, as is seen from the indices, the father of the first family is a cousin of the first degree of the mother of the second family, and, conversely, the father of the second family is a cousin of the first degree of the mother of the first family; consequently, their children are second degree cousins on the side of both their fathers and their mothers, which is just what is necessary in Australian marriage.

But these groups in the Australian system could not develop into the present clan units, because each pair of marriageable groups remained marriageable for only one generation; consequently, the following generation, as the offspring of brother and sister, could not marry, being

/231 cont./

121 cross cousins of the first degree, and for this reason these
● 615 groups could not become fixed into hereditary unions and *835 therefore formed only class generations, the whole practical *174 significance of which was in the mnemonic fixation of the [171] marriage norms.

The role of the four-group division developed quite differently with the Gilyak type of marriage. Here, too, the initial motive was the realization of the harm of marriages between cousins of the first degree, but while in the Australian system the question was resolved by means of a transition to marriages between cousins of the second degree and the absolute prohibition on marriages between cousins of the first degree, with the preservation, however, of the exchange marriage, in the Gilyak marriage the change of norms was limited merely to a prohibition on marriages between bilateral cousins of the first degree, i.e., marriages where the spouses are cousins of the first degree both on the side of the father and on the side of the mother. Here marriage remained obligatory between cousins of the first degree, but only if they were unilateral, i.e., either on the side of the father or on the side of the mother; through this, mutual marriages between two families became absolutely forbidden: under no condition could two men marry each others' sisters; consequently, marriage even between bilateral cousins of the second degree became impossible.

Now let us see how this regulation led to the Gilyak type of phratry.

121 /232/ Let us recall again the phratry with two divisions,
*174 with marriage between cousins of the first degree. In order
*835 to facilitate orientation, we repeat the previously intro-615 duced diagram of the composition of each generation of spouses according to degrees of kinship, with cross marriage between cousins of the first degree.

/232 cont./

121 Division I: men $A^1 + A^2 + A^3 + A^4 \ldots$
*174 their sisters $a^1 + a^2 + a^3 + a^4 \ldots$ 615
*835
● 615

Division II: men $V^1 + V^2 + V^3 + V^4 \ldots$ their sisters $v^1 + v^2 + v^3 + v^4 \ldots$

The same letters with identical indices designate a group of own brothers and sisters, while different indices designate the degree of cousin relationship. Persons of different letter-groups with identical indices, for example, A^1, a^1 and V^1, and v^1, or A^2, a^2 and V^2, v^2, are bilateral cousins of the first degree, and they usually join in cross-marriage, i.e., A^1 marries v^1 and V^1 marries a^1. Persons of different letter-groups with different indices are cousins of more remote degrees according to the larger index.

And now let us imagine the moment when the transition from bilateral cousin marriage to unilateral marriage began, and when the exchange of sisters, that is, cross-cousin marriage, became prohibited.

This transition could not be completed all at once. Among individuals of both divisions there were no unilateral cousins at all, because these were all products of cross-cousin marriage. But since marriages between cousins of the first degree became absolutely prohibited, it would doubtless have become necessary for the first time to arrange marriages between cousins of the next closest degrees. The most [171] rational must be, as we have seen among the Australians, marriage between cousins of the second degree, but, in contrast to the Australian regime, where this form could be strictly put into practice in both divisions (1), here, as a consequence of the prohibition of the exchange of women, this form could be employed only in one division of society.

1. See the above table on p. 338.

/232 cont./

121 In fact, if A^1 married his cousin of the second degree,
*174 v^2, then the brother of the latter, V^2, could not marry either
● 615 a^1 or a^2, because in such a case two men would be married
*835 to each others' sisters. Therefore, V^2 was obliged to take a cousin of the third degree, a^3. The other cases are handled in exactly the same way.

/233/ Converting this rule into our schematic rows, we obtain the following table of marriage:

Division I: $(A^1 + v^2) + (A^2 + v^1) + (A^3 + v^4) + (A^4 + v^3) + (A^5 + v^6) + A^6 + v^5) + (A^7 + v^8) + (A^8 + v^7)$.

Division II: $(V^1 + a^3) + (V^2 + a^4) + V^3 + a^1) + (V^4 + a^2) + (V^5 + a^7) + (V^8 + a^6)$ /see errata for original page 233, lines 5-6, on page 739 of the foreign text/.

In the following generation it already appears possible to fulfill the new principle of unilateral cousin marriage without an exchange of women, where each mother may marry her son to the daughter of her brother.

Analyzing the table we see that among the odd members of the first division, women have the same indices, respectively, as men have among the even members of the second division, i.e., in these two groups and in each pair of families of the same order, for example, $(A^1 + v^2)$ and $(V^2 + a^1)$, the woman of the first family is a sister to the man of the second, but the woman of the second family is not his sister, but his first cousin, the men of the first family are descendants of these families, and consequently they are unilateral cousins of the first degree. Thus, consistent with the Gilyak principle, according to which the son of the sister receives the daughter of her brother, the sons of the first family marry the children of the second. The reverse is not allowed.

/233 cont./

121 On the other hand, by comparing the odd members of the
*174 first division with the odd members of the second division,
● 615 we see that the men of the odd families of the first row and the
*835 women of the even families of the second row, for instance, the members $(A^1 + v^2)$ and $(V^2 + a^4)$, have identical indices, i.e., they are brothers and sisters, and consequently the sons of the second row marry the daughters of the first row. One can easily see that the same relationship will obtain between the even members of the first division and the other two rows of the second division.

[171] Thus, as in Australian marriage, the society, matrimonially, is naturally broken up into four groups:

Division I: Group I: $(A^1 + v^2) + (A^3 + v^4) + (A^5 + v^6) + (A^7 + v^8)$ and other odd members.

Group II: $(A^2 + v^1) + (A^4 + v^3) + (A^6 + v^5) + (A^8 + v^7)$ and other odd members.

Division II: Group III: $(V^1 + a^3) + (V^3 + a^1) + (V^5 + a^7) + (V^7 + a^5)$ and other even members.

Group IV: $(V^2 + a^4) + (V^4 + a^2) + (V^6 + a^5) + (V^8 + a^6)$ and other even members.

The families of the first group take for their sons wives /234/ from the corresponding families of group IV, where the mothers of the first are the sisters of the fathers of the second, but the daughters of the first group enter the third group -- into families where their fathers' own sisters are. In exactly the same way the second group takes women from group IV and gives its women to group III. In a word, we have literally everything that we saw in the Gilyak marriage. Since exchange marriage between the two groups does not exist, and consequently in each following generation the descendants of the espoused clans will be unilateral cousins, marriages will without exception take place between the same groups and in the same order of families, so that, in contrast to the Australian groups, in this case these exogamous groups are converted into real clans. Thus we obtain the Gilyak four-clan phratry. In this phratry each clan is joined

/234 cont./

121 in marital relations with two other clans, but the fourth is *174 absolutely forbidden to it, for it and this fourth one are a
● 615 subgroup of its own primitive exogamous division (groups I *835 and II are prohibited to each other, and III and IV are likewise prohibited to each other). This prohibited clan is that Gilyak tujma akhmalk kkhal, the clan of the second degre the prohibition of which is so incomprehensible. Now the reason is clear: the tujma akhmalk clans are prohibited because they primordially entered into one common exogamo division.

That this prohibited clan fully corresponds to the Gilya may be easily ascertained from our table.

The first clan gives women to the third, and consequen it is its akhmalk of the first degree, but the third clan, in turn, gives women to the second, i.e., to the latter as wel it is an akhmalk of the first degree. Thus, the first clan is tujma akhmalk of the second clan, i.e., of the clan which is in the same exogamous division with it.

Thus, I hope that we have succeeded in proving the close genetic tie between the Gilyak system and the Australian one from which it separated at that stage when the change toward the elimination of marriage between bilateral cousins of the first degree began.

One system solved the question by means of a shift to marriages between male cousins of the second degree and the final prohibition of marriages between the children of brother and sister in the first generation -- a prohibition fixed in the institution of classes, as among the Arunta. The other system prohibited exchange marriages, preservin obligatory unilateral marriages between the offspring of brother and sister, and fixed its norms in the institution of the four-clan phratry.

A still third variant is possible. Let us once again imagine the moment when it was decided to shift /235/ from the bilateral marriage of cousins of the first degree to the unilateral one, when it will be impossible to exchan women. Until that moment society was divided into two halves in the following manner:

Table No. 2 (cont.)

2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Anna in clan S.	2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Vera in clan A.	2) Daughters marry the sons of the sister of their father, of Mariya in clan D.

1: Shternberg--312 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

*614 615
602

/211cont./

2) Daughters
marry the sons
of the sisters
of their father,
of Sof'ya
in clan V.

/60 cont./

796 231 Having bathed the bear and teased it to their satisfaction and made fun of it, they tie it between two posts and leave it alone. It generally uses this respite to give in to the instinct, now futile for it, to dig the ground with its paws for a lair.

The feeding of the bear continues for several years, until the cub becomes a well-fed, large beast, and then they begin the prefestival preparations. This means extensive preparations. For several days, one will have to feed and entertain with all kinds of delicacies, not only clansmen and villagers, but also a great number of guests from other places and, /61/ in addition, the numerous dogs on which these guests came. All this requires trouble, work, and great expense, because, besides dishes of local products, large purchases of rice, buda, flour, tea, sugar, and vodka or Chinese grain vodka are made. Here is displayed that remarkable clan organization of the Gilyak, so impressive in its harmonious combination of social solidarity and individual freedom.

There is no compulsory organ to assemble products, to compel, demand, or control. Conscious of its obligation to participate in the common religious affair, each family works with all its might, not out of fear, not from conscience, cooks all sorts of dishes, helps with the chores, and contributes its mite, according to its means, toward the expense of the purchases. The money and supplies are handed over to the master of the bear, who disposes of them without control. No one reprimands anyone, for each one strives to make the festival come off most brilliantly. Several days before the festival, which is generally celebrated in February, a different kind of work begins -- the building of an arena for the killing of the bear. The arena consists of a small stamped-down plot of ground, in which, depending on the number of bears that are being killed, is placed one or several pairs of sacred trees-posts hung with inau and covered with complicated ritual carving; a bear is tied between them. Up to this plot of ground is stamped a long, narrow alley, on both sides of which, in two rows, are set up 30 pairs of young trees: the first 15 pairs are fir; the other 15 are purple willow.

/109 cont./

And this is just what is striking in the Gilyak system of life. Despite all the complexity of the social fabric, embracing all aspects of life, all those external-formal signs of organization which the European involuntarily seeks everywhere are either completely absent or assume forms which are too fluctuating.

* 614 361 423 /110/ Let us begin with territory. It is completely natural that the members of one clan should prefer to live together in immediate unity and community with each other. There are actually some settlements, such as Tangi, Nyanivo, Viskivo, and others, where the whole population belongs to one clan. In the large winter yurts of such settlements one can sometimes count 20 or 30 clansmen and not a single alien. Even where several clans live in one settlement, as in Kol', the yurts of each clan are arranged in a row, as if in accord with a strictly observed tradition. Each clan has its own clan streams for hunting, divided among the different families, among whom they pass by inheritance from father to son, although the right to property is limited by actual use, upon the suspension of which the stream becomes res nullius and can be utilized by anyone, even an alien.

Nevertheless, despite the natural tendency of clansmen to remain near each other, the principle of territoriality does not in fact exist. In the great majority of Gilyak villages the composition of the population is mixed. In the above-mentioned settlement of Kol' I counted representatives of eight clans, in smaller villages, from two to three clans, and but very few villages in which there were absolutely no members of other clans. There are clans whose branches are to be met in the most different and remote points of Gilyak territory. This dispersion, of course, is a fact that seems to be at variance with the principles of clan, but it is inevitable under the given economic and social conditions. A settlement located in a particularly favorable place from the fisherman's point of view will naturally attract newcomers from other clans, and, conversely, if the clan has grown so large

/126 cont./

* 614 615 796 574 182 This rule is so strictly observed that the very host who has been most diligent in receiving and making presents to his ymgi is not even invited by the latter to the festival, but, on the other hand, he will be the honored guest of his own akhmal'k. Thus there is formed an uninterrupted chain, uniting the long series of clans in their socio-religious festivals.

We have already said something in the section on religion about the important part played by the ymgi in the bear festival. One goes out many versts to meet them and gives them the most honored function at the festival, namely, the killing of the bear, and all this time they are the center of attention for the whole clan. They are everywhere fed to the bursting point, dragged around from yurt to yurt, and, finally, before departure given a large part of the bear carcass. All these acts of hospitality and respectful attention are crowned with serious religious rites, sanctifying the fraternal union of the clans. At the beginning of the festival, the ymgi exchange nich'i (symbol of united co-operation in hunting, see above) with the host; before departure, the ymgi presents to his akhmal'k in parting dogs, which, together with the dogs of the latter, will go to the master of the mountains, the common sustainer of the clan; and at the last moment the ymgi performs the ceremony of the "trampling of the threshold" (see above). Such things are not formalities for primitive man; they strengthen the ties of kinship with the higher sanction of religious authority.

But these ties are not limited only to occasional "sustenance" hospitality, invitations to hunts, and festivals.

* 614 615 ● 621 They go still further, rising in their intensiveness to the power of a true clan bond. When a man has few clansmen, or he gets along badly with them, he leaves his native settlement and goes to live forever with his pandf'y. This is why, by the way, there are so few settlements made up of inhabitants belonging to one clan; everywhere /127/ clansmen are intermixed with their ymgi or akhmal'k'i. But these ties prove of

* 614 615 ● 621 628 /127 cont./ But these ties prove of particular value in matters of revenge. In urgent cases, when a clan involved in war proves weak, the pandf'y assist it to "raise the bones" and to protect itself against attack with the same selflessness as they show toward their own clansmen. Only in the payment of tkhusind may the pandf'y not participate. Still more valuable, perhaps, are the matrimonial ties in the matter of the reconciliation of clans, especially when the hostile clans are pandf'y to each other, as not infrequently happens, and we have already expressed in the section on revenge our own belief that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

* 614 615 609 Such are the relations between the akhmal'k and ymgi clans, relations which broaden the narrow framework of the closed clan and extend its sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is a whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which finally become stronger than interclan ties and are transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people in general. The term navkh, which the members of the ymgi and akhmal'k clans of the corresponding generations give to each other, has finally become the customary appellation with which any member of another clan or stranger is addressed. This formal change is none other than the expression of a true and profound change in attitude toward members of other clans.

609 574 [157] Hospitality, courtesy, compassion -- these are virtues which the Gilyak in reality practice toward all without discrimination, not only toward tribesmen of other clans, not only toward indigenous neighbors of other tribes, such as the Orok, the Goldi, and the Ainu, but also toward newcomers, the Tungus, the Yakut, and, finally, the Russians, who have done them so much harm. How often have escaped convicts slain whole families of Gilyak after the most hospitable

/235 cont./

I. $(A^1 + v^1)+(A^2 + v^2)+(A^3 + v^3)+(A^4 + v^4)+(A^5 + v^5)+(A^6 + v^6)$.

II. $(V^1 + a^1)+(V^2 + a^2)+(V^3 + a^3)+(V^4 + a^4)+(V^5 + a^5)+(V^6 + a^6)$.

Now it is necessary to shift to the unilateral marriage, for exchanging sisters is impossible, but now there are no unilateral cousins of the first degree, and only for the first time is it possible to observe the prohibition on the exchange of sisters; consequently, the son of A^1 may marry the daughter of V^1, but the son of V^1 may not marry the daughter of A^1; he may marry the daughter of A^2, his female cousin of the nearest degree, etc. Then the picture of marriage is the following

I. $(A^1 + v^1)+(A^2 + v^2)+(A^3 + v^3)+(A^4 + v^4)+(A^5 + v^5)+(A^6 + v^6)$

1. $(V^1 + a^3)+(V^2 + a^1)+(V^3 + a^4)+(V^4 + a^3)+(V^5 + a^6)+(V^6 + a^5)$

I. 1) $(A^1 + v^1)+(A^3 + v^3)+(A^5 + v^5)$: 1st clan takes women from clan 3, that of the mother's brother.

2) $(A^2 + v^2)+(A^4 + v^4)+(A^6 + v^6)$: 2nd clan takes women from clan 4.

II. 3) $(V^1 + a^2)+(V^3 + a^4)+(V^5 + a^6)$: 3rd clan takes women from clan 2.

4) $(V^2 + a^1)+(V^4 + a^3)+(V^6 + a^5)$: 4th clan takes women from clan 1.

619

1

619 TRIBE AND NATION--presence or absence of groups larger than the community to which people think they "belong" in an extended kinship sense; basis of identification (e.g., common name, common language, contiguous territory, common culture, tradition of common descent); intratribal intercourse and communication (e.g., trade, intermarriage), degree of development of nationalistic aspirations; etc. See also:

Tribal or national political organization . . . 64
Affiliation with a culture area or subarea . . . 101
Ethnocentrism 486
Intercommunity relationships 628
Intertribal or international relationships 649
Nationalistic movements 668
Ideas about race 829

/669/

423 224 226 619 Finally, they also embrace the communistic principle in that they have no limitations or restrictions on fishing and hunting, except for the places on the river where they have their salmon weirs and those spots in the forest where their traps and self-shooters are set up. Thus they tolerate it, wholly without limitation, when the Liman Gilyak go to the Amur River to fish and the Tschomi Gilyak go far downstream on the Tymy River for salmon fishing, and the latter, in turn, move to the sea-coast to catch kangi. It is true, the Tschomi and the Tymy Gilyak have ties of hospitality with each other. Also, in the [648] vast forest the Gilyak permit even Olcha and Samagir to penetrate into their territory without molesting them.

685 [421] [123] Like the communism, the inviolability of property is also based upon the national principle. I have seen even old and dignified Gilyak men who could not resist a small theft, for example, a piece of butter or the like, quite apart from the young people, who go so far as to cut open and pillage travel bags, etc., as happened to me in the village of My in the Amur-Liman. I was repeatedly warned by the Amur Gilyak about the [186] inhabitants of the village of Langr, located at the entrance to the latter. The opposite, however, that the Russians steal from the Gilyak, happens much more frequently, and the temptation to remove a makeshift door or a fish net hanging in front in order to enter a storehouse and to pillage it is indeed much greater. Even the small burial houses were not safe for their contents, though they did not contain anything but a few articles of symbolic significance. Thus it came about that I became acquainted [192] with the principal international relationship between the two peoples from the Gilyakized Russian term for "to steal" (ukradn Russ. ukrast)), and the Gilyak word (enngarsitsch) did not become known to me until much later. But it hardly ever happens that one Gilyak will steal anything from another. Indeed, I met 685 123 persons, such as Judin in Tebach, Mradamn in Ssabach, etc., whom I could fully trust even from an international standpoint. The former, for instance, after a few days, returned to me a cigar case which I had left in his yurt, and there was not one

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

THE NIVKHI

S. V. IVANOV, M. G. LEVIN and A. V. SMOLYAK

(based on data by A. M. Zolotarev)

General Information

The Nivkhi live on the lower reaches of the Amur and adjacent areas, as well as on Sakhalin. They are sharply different in language from their neighbors, who speak languages of the Tunguso-Manchurian group, and belong to the so-called paleo-Asiatic peoples. 101

The name of the people derives from their name for themselves, Nivkh, or "man." They were known in Russian pre-Revolutionary literature as "Gilyaks." This word evidently derives from "Gileke" and "Gilyami," as the Nivkhi are called among Tunguso-Manchurian peoples.

The census of 1926-27 set the number of Nivkhi at 4076 persons (1700 on Soviet Sakhalin and 2376 on the continent). In addition, according to data in 1928, 111 Nivkhi lived in the formerly Japanese part of Sakhalin. [162]

Thus, the Nivkhi consist of two groups territorially: the continental, or the Amur, group, and the Sakhalin group. The continental Nivkhi live along the Lower Amur, along the coast of the Amur Estuary, and in the adjoining areas along the Tatar Strait and the Sea of Okhotsk. On the Amur, the Nivkhi villages are interspersed among Russian and Negidal villages. The Nivkhi village farthest up the Amur is Pad; others are situated lower on the Amur and its estuary; in the south they reach as far as Cape Lazarev; the northernmost village in the estuary is Kul' (181 km from Nikolayevsk-on-the-Amur). Individual families live among the Ul'chi. In the past, some Nivkhi groups were found as far as the Uda River. In 1884, the well-known Russian traveler Middendorf encountered them on the Chumikan. In Sakhalin, the Nivkhi are living today both on the western and eastern coasts, as well as along the middle reaches of the Tym' River. On the western coast, their main mass is concentrated in the Rybnovskiy Rayon. In the Aleksandrovskiy and Shirokopadskiy Rayons there are only small groups of Nivkhi, who remained there after the resettlement of a large group in the Kirovskiy Rayon. The population of the latter is today almost entirely concentrated on one large collective farm, Chir-Unvd. On the eastern coast, the southernmost point is the village of Nyyvo; farther north, there are large villages, Dagi, Chayvo and Pil'tun, where the former residents of the tiny hamlets scattered along the coast have 101 361 [619]

621

621 COMMUNITY STRUCTURE--physical type (e.g., migratory band, settled village, neighborhood of scattered households, aggregation of hamlets, ward or other local subdivision of a town); kinship structure (e.g., clan-community, endogamous or exogamous deme, segmented community of associated clan-barrios, unsegmented but homogeneous community, heterogeneous community); socio-political and economic structure and organization; local subdivisions of the community; community population (e.g., mean, range); area of territory exploited (e.g., mean, range); distinguishing characteristics (e.g., name, local dialect, local culture); tendency toward local endogamy or exogamy; cohesive and fissive tendencies; neighborliness; local pride; etc. See also:

Physical characteristics and facilities of settlements 36
Social stratification 56
Interpersonal relations 57
Town and city government 63
Place names 108
Real property 423
Clans 618

/361 cont./

present; frequently, by special agreement with the father-in-law, the son-in-law moves to the clan of the former for joint work with him (more detail about this below).

12. The khal' has a common cemetery, closed to those of other clans. It is known to all that the Sakhalin Gilyak have the custom of cremating their dead. Before the day of cremation invitations are sent to all the clansmen of the deceased, and only an extraordinary obstacle will keep a Gilyak from the performance of his last duty to a clansman. When the "living" fire, obtained in this solemn instance by means of friction, has destroyed the remains of the deceased, they construct a low, little shed, closed on all sides, over the place where the ashes and small pieces of bone of the corpse remain, and at its side, a short distance away, they construct a tiny yurt, or rather a wooden box, an arshin square, with a roof. In this box they place the cup and dish of the deceased, his pipe, a wooden doll, ornaments (if it were for a woman), and other trifles. Thus there arises a whole row of yurt-tombs of the clan. When the clan lives in various settlements, they bury the deceased in his village. But wherever the Gilyak may die, his ashes must rest side by side with his clansmen. If a man dies in alien territory, they immediately communicate the fact to his kinsmen, who come and bear away the body for cremation in his homeland. If the affair takes place in the summer, they preserve the corpse in a cold place until wintertime, when they bear it away on sleds to his homeland. But even if /362/ it should prove necessary to cremate a Gilyak in alien territory, nevertheless they carefully pick up one small bone, tie it to a piece of wood, and send it off to his homeland. There they make a shed over it and construct a yurt by its side. The death of a clansman calls for mourning. Men and women undo their braids for a longer or shorter time, depending on the closeness of kinship and love for the deceased. Some wear mourning throughout their lives.

/664 cont./ The following remarks pertain only to this period, certainly a very favorable one for the study of their peculiarities.

Beyond the family and the paternal kin-group, the Gilyak have no legal-administrative structure or organization for self-government: there are among them no individuals provided by them themselves with authoritative power, say, for preserving order, for settling disputes, and the like. And there seems to be no need for that among them. Since they wage no wars with their neighbors or among themselves, undertake no joint raiding expeditions into foreign territory, collect no tribute and do not have to deliver any, etc., they need no leaders, chiefs, elders, or the like. Order is maintained by observing the ancient usages and the traditional customs, and in case of disputes and conflicts, self-help enters in, supported by the rules of blood revenge. Thus the Gilyak have no superiors or masters in their midst, but rather they are all legally equal, with, of course, the exception of the slaves, who, however, as has been said, are not Gilyak, but are foreigners in serfdom among them. For the concept of "master," which they first learned from the Manchu-Chinese, they therefore, for both the latter and the Russians, use the Chinese expression dshangin (3). Only once did I hear a Gilyak designate himself as such: it was in the isolated yurt of Miwwach located at the end of the Tymy Valley on Sakhalin and occupied by a married couple, where the host introduced himself to me as the "dshangin of Miwwach, but evidently he merely wanted to indicate that he was the sole owner of the yurt.

3. Gerbillon (in Dukalde /Du Halde/, Descr. de l'Empire de la Chine, Vol. IV, p. 385) mentions the term "tschanghin" for a high official who enjoys the special confidence of the emperor.

116, 161, 177, 621 Russia
636.62

"The Gilyak on Sakhalin.....will surely die out with the further inroad of the European. The chief causes of the dying out of the natives is [LSS: sic] disease, the narrowing limits of their hunting-ground, the decay of the spirit of the race, and their inability to adapt themselves to another mode of living which is gradually but surely being forced upon them. The Government's attitude towards them is a 'correct' one. It recognizes them as Russian subjects, interferes as little as possible with their scant organization, and prohibits the sale of intoxicants to them. What is really required now, but hardly to be expected from officials whose function is the safeguarding of criminals, is a patriarchal government which shall interest itself in the race and its changing conditions."

174 mainland among Goldi as well as Manchurians. It is more likely that the first Gilyak who emigrated to the mainland from Sakhalin, took over the building methods as well as the language from the Goldi, and that the later ones who remained in closer contact with their native country, adopted the building methods of the Goldi and Manchurians but kept their own language.

The Russians became acquainted with the Gilyak as early as the middle of the 17th century when the first bold Russian pioneers traveled along the Amur. At that time there were also supposed to have been occasional bloody animosities. The Gilyak themselves, however, no longer know anything about this, unless perhaps there are accounts in rare legends which may be known by only a few. The majority know nothing of their own history and I was not even able to ascertain whether there was not someone still living among them who might tell me something of their antiquity.

161 The population of the Gilyak can be only approximately de-177 termined, because, up to the present time, these people do not even pay yassak, and thus there can be no official methods set up to observe the shifts in their population. According to the estimates of the ispravniks (officials) the number of Gilyak of the Nikolayevsk district (1) and the ispravniks, but instead I asked the traveling fur dealers whose business, when all is said and done, would give them a greater interest in this question than the ispravniks would have. According to their opinion, there may be about 3000 161 Gilyak on the island of Sakhalin. The entire race of Gilyak 621 (exclusive of the Negidal) may thus comprise some 8000 souls. I believe the figure is not too large for, although the Gilyak villages are small and present a diminutive appearance, they are [100] relatively densely populated. One may assume that one house shelters no less than 12-15 persons. From a rough calculation which I made in the year 1880, there were about 900 persons in nine villages extending from the coast to the village of Vaida (30 versts above

1. From the coast up-stream to Mariinskoye (270 versts from Nikolayevsk).

De Kastri and Kaiser bays amounts to about 4000, that of the Sofiyskoye district (2), 1000. As for Sakhalin, it has no

2. From Mariinskoye up to the Gorin.

161 Nikolayevsk.
621 Of the two sexes, there are fewer women, as far as may be judged on the basis of several examples. Thus, among 90 accurately counted Gilyak (1) there were 50 men and 40

1. This count was taken of the population in the houses in which a halt is made along the winter road to Sakhalin, namely, in the villages from Vasin Mys to Chëmi.

women. It has been proved that the same is true among other primitive tribes of Russia. As far as age distribution is concerned, there are not a great many children, but also 163 not very few. Large families of children which frequently occur among the Russian settlers here, are not to be found among the Gilyak. Nevertheless, the birth rate is not so small that one might see in it a cause for a decrease of this tribe. Among 240 persons of both sexes from various villages, I found, for example one-third of them were children of 0-10 years, which just about equals the condition existing in Western Europe.

161 Although nothing has been done in the way of gathering 177 regular statistics on the Gilyak tribe, there is nevertheless no doubt that the tribe has diminished since the Russian occupation of the country. Some villages are now only half as large as they were. We find a repetition here of the same sad phenomenon which we also observe in other countries where civilization and a natural state are contiguous. The more direct causes of this decrease I shall consider below. [RCH: see category 116, p. 249]

II. The Country of the Gilyak

133 The lower Amur valley and Sakhalin are mountainous 312 countries. The mountain ranges of the mainland belong to the so-called Tatar range, Sikhote-Alin, which covers the region between the lower Amur section, the Ussuri, and the sea. The Amur whose lower third flows northeastward becomes even more gigantic here than farther up-stream. It is one and one-half versts wide; the depth varies, but even in low water large steamers can travel up and down without difficulty. At Nikolayevsk (60 versts from the ocean) sea-going vessels lie at anchor that do not draw over 12-14 feet [101] but even the largest could enter if it were not for a short, shallow stretch (sand bar). In stormy weather the Amur has such high waves that the river steamers must seek shelter along the shore, and people get sea-sick, just as

622

622 HEADMEN--existence of community chiefs or headmen; qualifications; mode of selection (e.g., by seniority, informal acceptance, election, matrilineal or patrilineal succession); functions and activities; domestic establishment; special status and functions of headman's relatives; authority; prerogatives; etc. See also:

Headmen of sib groups 61
Chiefs of territorial divisions 63
Leadership traits 187
Chief executive of the state 643

/111 cont./

614 [167] Thus in the settlement of Kol' there are clans which bear the designations, Tyvli-fing (inhabitants of the settlement of Tyvlin); M'yekhre-fing (inhabitants of the settlement of M'yekhri), N'yenkhay-fing (inhabitants of the settlement of Nyenkhay), etc., although the representatives of these clans have lived for a long time in the above-mentioned settlement of Kol', having broken all their ties with the primordial abode of their ancestors (1). The only clans that have true clan names are those founded by emigrants from the neighboring Tungus tribes; thus were formed such clans as the Tskharnung, the Choril, etc. And it is noteworthy that in just these clans we observe a clear transition to totemism. In the Negda tribe, for example, almost every clan traces its origin from one or another kind of animal (tiger, toad, bear, etc.). Among the Gilyak such phenomena are very rarely encountered.

[171] 1. Similar territorial designations among the Australians were the reason that Kunov came to the completely unfounded conclusion that among these tribes there is no clan organization.

614 /112/ Now let us proceed to what for the European is the most 177 important sign of clan unity -- to the organs of power. However 648 complex, as we have seen, clan life is, the clan does not know 622 any established authorities. True, the Chinese, and after them the Russians, sought to establish among the Gilyak the institution of elders, and at that not clan but settlement elders, but it had no relation to the life of the clan. This was a nasty episode, but that was all. The elders designated by the Russian authorities were selected, not from among the best or even the wealthiest inhabitants, but from the most officious ones, and these not only did not enjoy any authority, but rather scorn, and in some 614 instances even hatred. The primordial structure of the clan knew nothing of the kind. The patriarchal authority which, according to the Biblical examples, is ordinarily associated with the

/113 cont./

596 Finally -- and this is particularly necessary to note -- it is not at all obligatory that at the head of large families with a common economy there should be elders in years; most frequently, on the contrary, they are young people who have distinguished themselves by their activity, resourcefulness, and zeal, in a word, 596 by their personal talents. Old men enjoy /114/ authority only with 888 regard to special questions, as the preservers of traditions, as experts in the rituals and history of the family-clan relations. They are consulted on confusing questions of kinship and in the giving of names; it is they who must supervise the ritual aspect of festivals, but this does not give them any power or advantages.

* 614 And that which is absent in the family -- the despotism of the ● 622 eldest, the head -- is also lacking in the clan. It knows neither despotic elders-patriarchs nor any permanent authorities in general, collective or individual, neither elected ones nor any by right of birth and inheritance.

* 614 The clan is not a fiction, however; it is a complicated institution, surrounding the Gilyak with a thick net of regulations, prohibitions, and obligations, but at the same time providing him with all the benefits, material and spiritual, of a firm social union.

We thus return to the question that we raised at the end of the preceding section. Where are the driving forces of the mechanism of this almighty institution -- the clan, where is the secret of the amazing combination of the closest community with a complete absence of despotism, of all-embracing wardship and regulation with the absence of compulsion and the maintenance of individual freedom?

This secret is contained in two conditions: 1) the simplicity of economic conditions and relations, which offers a broad scope to the comprehensive development of the powers and abilities of the individual and their free application to the wide-open gifts of nature equally free to all; and, secondly, the entire socio-religious world-outlook, which quite spontaneously, without any external pressure, directs the will and activity of each toward the harmony of the common interest, substituting for external compulsion the force of the inner consciousness of each.

/119 cont./

* 614 554 556 not only in natural products, but also purchased ones, tobacco, rice, kumiss, etc., because his wealth and associations make it possible for him to undertake distant journeys for the barter of furs and the acquisition of goods at firsthand. He is the guardian of the common "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, and the possessor of his own rich collection of "shagund," which his clansmen may use in case of necessity.

For the whole clan he is not only a man whose home is always open, where one can always go to eat well, enjoy the delights of tobacco, and hear interesting things, but one who always comes to assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, however, is his help at times of common misfortune, such as war, conflicts arising from revenge, disputes with members of other clans. He has supplies of the best weapons and conveyances, his name strikes terror into the foe, who for that reason will more willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, finally, he has supplies of "shagund" when it becomes necessary to pay ransom. Moreover, such a person usually possesses exceptional intelligence, eloquence, rich experience, and [537] knowledge of life and people. He is the natural orator, "khlaj-nivukh," who plays such a weighty role in affairs of revenge and civil disputes; even neighboring clans resort to him when the intervention of intermediaries is necessary. Among these yz'i there are individuals who enjoy enormous fame and respect throughout all the territory settled by the [532] Gilyak. In the image and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned images of the gods, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, heavens, rivers, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display respect toward him, but also a feeling of religious adoration. From among such individuals, under favorable circumstances, are developed those elements of authority which we find in other tribes standing on a higher level of cultural conditions. [623] In some cases, such yz'i will become the council of elders, which before the clan assembly decides the affairs of the ● [622] community in the name of the clan. Under other circumstances, when the tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars,

* 614 /119 cont./

554 556 the most outstanding yz'i become leaders of the tribe for li
● [622] or hereditary tribal leaders, leaders of troops, vikings, or founders of dynasties.

But in the clan life of the Gilyak such individuals do no yet make claim to anything of this sort. Their role is still insignificant and in any event incidental in comparison wit the complex functions of the clan, whose mechanism and l are based on the value and initiative of the integrated personality of each individual. What is the /120/ yz' if not t integrated personality in its highest manifestation of individ uality? The influence of the yz' is therefore purely factual moral; between him and the poorest of his clansmen there no abyss either in the intellectual or economic sense, while the higher fraternal bond of the religio-social union of the clan towers over and dominates all.

* 614 Such is the mechanism of clan life. Its real mainspring 182 the comprehensive development of the personality, togethe with an integrated religio-social world-view. Organized power is completely absent. Although invisible behind all this, and without any claims to power, elements of authori exist, these elements are without form; they appear on the scene in an elemental fashion, spontaneously, and not at al as constant elements of authority which would push the free manifestation of personality into the background, but these elements nevertheless do exist. There are three of them:

[623] Above all there is the khal', the clan, i.e., the whole totality of the adult clansmen, or at least all those who are present at a given moment, which, having no head or regul assemblies, ordinarily appears suddenly on the scene when some serious problem demands its interference and, once th problem is resolved, disappears from the scene as suddenly it appeared.

/360 cont./
among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal'-geymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations ago), was the social leader, the starosta of the clan. His successor was the khal'-geymar next to him in years. The intervention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But the khal'-geymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where years play a special role in the competence of the judgment.

11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to remember one another, to visit one another, and to lend one another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year befall him, and he will go to spend some time with clansmen until matters improve. On the western coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pyanovo, Tangi, Tyki, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in a settlement. This partly arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fishing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many sons-in-law to emigrate to the clan of their wife has greatly aided the mixing of the clans. This latter custom, possibly a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands entered the clan of the wife, and not conversely, as is done at

/360 cont./

among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal'-geymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations ago), was the social leader, the starosta of the clan. His successor was the khal'-geymar next to him in years. The intervention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But the khal'-geymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where years play a special role in the competence of the judgment.

11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to remember one another, to visit one another, and to lend one another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year befall him, and he will go to spend some time with clansmen until matters improve. On the western coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pyanovo, Tangi, Tylki, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in a settlement. This partly arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fishing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many sons-in-law to emigrate to the clan of their wife has greatly aided the mixing of the clans. This latter custom, possibly a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands entered the clan of the wife, and not conversely, as is done at

/621 cont./

Manchu language. Rinsô continues his report, "The successors of those first harata and kasinta, accompanied by other natives, from then on annually brought the designated gifts to the officials in Deren. Even today, the most intelligent and most suitable of the natives on the island are appointed as harata and kasinta by the Manchu. Their number is now limited to eight: one harata, in Najoro, and seven kasinta, three of whom are on the west coast and four on the east coast (their names and their places of residence, which are all in the Ainu area, follow). Several years ago, because the furs on Krafto became rarer, the chiefs brought their gifts to Deren only every three years, and with an even greater decline, only every four or five years. But then the Manchu had the stipulated gifts collected by the Santaner, and, as a consequence, this year the kasinta of Usijoro, Najoro, and Raitsiska personally brought the gifts to Deren." Rinsô met these people on their journey there and asked them about the manner in which the gifts were offered. They confirmed for him that the gift consisted of a black sea-otter fur, and at the same time disclosed to him that the Manchu officials had taken it amiss that they had failed to deliver the gifts for a few years and had pointed out to them that in the future they should better appreciate the favor that they had received from the Manchu and should be more careful about bringing the stipulated gifts.

/622/ It was approximately in the middle of the previous century, according to these reports, that the Manchu, who had formerly come to Sakhalin only to trade, expanded their tributary relationships with the peoples of the lower Amur region, among them the Olcha and Gilyak, to include the Sakhalin Gilyak and the Sakhalin Ainu as well, in that at various places there, too, they appointed chiefs or elders and imposed upon them the obligation of bringing to them at Deren an annual tribute of furs -- an obligation which, to be sure, was not always punctually observed, but was still in full force in Mamia Rinsô's time. A few facts noted by European travelers may be cited to confirm these statements, quite credible in themselves, by the, as already noted several times above, extremely accurate [114] and reliable Japanese traveler.

/622 cont./

and reliable Japanese traveler. Krusenstern (1), for instance,

1. Reise um die Welt /Voyage around the World/, Vol. II, p. 176.

reported that when he met the Gilyak ("Tatars") in Nadeshda Bay, near the northern tip of Sakhalin (1805) -- as was pointed out above (p. 467), it was probably in the village of Ngywr-wo -- one of them was distinguished from the rest by his clothing, which was a red silk robe of Chinese cut, with gold flowers interwoven in it, and "without doubt" was their chief -- evidently, therefore, one of those harata or kasinta appointed by the Manchu and mentioned by Mamia Rinsô. Of far greater importance, however, is a second, very definite sounding report which we owe to Fr. Schmidt (2). In 1860, in Najoro, he became acquainted with one of the most distinguished Ainu, the aged Ssetakurero, upon whom, as an Ainu elder, the Japanese had conferred a saber. He still had in his keeping a document written in the Manchu language, which his father had received at one time from the Manchu superiors on the occasion of a tribute journey to Ssan-ssin on the Sungari, and through which he was appointed an elder of the Ainu. By means of this report the accuracy of Mamia Rinsô's statements concerning the tributary obligations of the Ainu to the Manchu at that time and the manner in which they had to be met is placed beyond any doubt. But I cannot refrain from expressing the conjecture that on the basis of the above report there was some misunderstanding on the part of the reporter or the listener with regard to the place to which Ssetakurero's father made his tribute journey, in that this journey was not made to Ssan-ssin on the Sungari, but, as must be assumed from the dates, to Deren on the Amur. Such a misunderstanding could arise all the more easily since Ssetakurero, according to his own words, had himself never been in Manchu country.

2. "Histor. Bericht," etc., p. 94.

/622 cont./

Let us now compare the conditions described by Mamia Rin with the position that the Manchu-Chinese occupied in relation to the indigenous peoples of the lower Amur region half a century later at the time of my visit. This has already been discussed in the foregoing on various occasions, and therefore I shall now only recapitulate /623/ briefly the principal features of it to make comparison easier. At the time of my visit, the Manchu or Chinese no longer made any trade journeys to Sakhalin at all (1). An obligation for the payment of tribute by the Sakhalin

1. Also, the above-mentioned Ssetakurero questioned by Mr. Schmidt could not remember having seen Manchu about (in Najoro); it was always only "Ssanta" (Olcha) or "Ssumeri" (Gilyak) who came there for trade purposes (Schmidt, op. cit., p. 94).

Ainu and Sakhalin Gilyak to the Manchu likewise did not exist, and thus there were none of those appointed chiefs or elders among them. Almost the same situation prevailed with regard to the Amur Gilyak and Olcha: the former were visited neither by the Manchu nor by Chinese merchants; among the latter, to be sure, Chinese traders stayed here and there, but they carried on their business entirely by their own hands, and a tribute, or, more accurately, a specific assessment in furs, was collected from the one as from the other only in Ssan-ssin for the granting of permission to trade. The Goldi, on the other hand, were required to pay tribute to the Manchu-Chinese authorities, and in their territory, in Mylki near the mouth of the Gorin, there was a permanent residence for Manchu officials who were entrusted to collect the tribute. From this comparison it must be concluded that in the period between Mamia Rinsô's travels in the Amur region and mine a retreat of the Manchu-Chinese control from Sakhalin and the lowermost course of the Amur, from the territories of the Ainu, Gilyak, and Olcha, had taken place.

2: Schrenck--1879 E-3 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

648 /664 cont. / The following remarks pertain 128 only to this period, certainly a very favorable one for the study of their peculiarities.

621 Beyond the family and the paternal kin-group, the Gilyak
622 have no legal-administrative structure or organization for self-government: there are among them no individuals provided by them themselves with authoritative power, say, for preserving order, for settling disputes, and the like. And there seems to be no need for that among them. Since they wage no wars with their neighbors or among themselves, undertake no joint raiding expeditions into foreign territory, collect no tribute and do not have to deliver any, etc., they need no leaders, chiefs, elders, or the like. Order is maintained by observing the ancient usages and the traditional customs, and in case of disputes and conflicts, self-help enters in, supported by the rules of blood [567] revenge. Thus the Gilyak have no superiors or masters in their midst, but rather they are all legally equal, with, of course, the exception of the slaves, who, however, as has been said, are not Gilyak, but are foreigners in serfdom among them. For [177] the concept of "master," which they first learned from the Manchu-Chinese, they therefore, for both the latter and the Russians, use the Chinese expression dshangin (3). Only once did I hear a Gilyak designate himself as such: it was in the isolated yurt of Miwwach located at the end of the Tymy Valley on Sakhalin and occupied by a married couple, where the host introduced himself to me as the "dshangin of Miwwach," but evidently he merely wanted to indicate that he was the sole owner of the yurt.

3. Gerbillon (in Dukalde /Du Halde/, Descr. de l'Empire de la Chine, Vol. IV, p. 385) mentions the term "tschanghin" for a high official who enjoys the special confidence of the emperor.

4: Kanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1904 RX2 Gilyak RX2

614 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the 629 offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to 601 the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of [198] the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [595] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grand-614 fathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers 561 (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of 175 fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated
439 the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred 614 first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with 184 the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and 182 bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvabing clan, for instance, were for a long time [556] the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [595] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor.
[567] The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

175 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households 567 and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established 175 among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, 648 and gasyanda—village elders.
614
622 After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally 175 become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation
178 appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the imple-433 ments of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch [567] was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox 771 Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island 776 of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of

9: Hawes--259-260 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 342, 361, 622

"We drew up in front of the 'great city' of Nivo, consisting of less than two dozen huts, dwellings which would be reckoned miserable by the occupants of Irish [260] hovels. At the usual signal, twelve pair of stalwart hands were ready to haul up our canoe, and we strode up the sands to meet the headman of the village, or, as my interpreter called him, the 'Lord Mayor of the city of Nivo.'

The 'Mansion House' of the 'Lord Mayor of Nivo,' which I now entered in the usual humble fashion, was rather larger than those we had seen hitherto, but in other respects exactly similar. Outside, on either side of the three-foot doorway, were two broad shelves sheltered by an extension of the roof, and containing winter sledges and all manner of tackle not required until later in the year. Inside was a goodly gathering, some score, of Gilyaks, who were to be our sleeping companions that night. These comprised the starosta, his two wives, his children and relatives, the latter including our Armunka, who was a distant cousin."

567 However, there are no forms or obligatory expressions of 554 esteem of any kind. In general, a kiss, bow, or hand-shake 576 are, as we said, not often used by Gilyak.

Beside the aged, the rich, and the brave, shamans are 756 especially esteemed, but here again we see reflected the 184 respect [233] which is paid a superior mind. The shamans do not form a separate, exclusive class but live like other people, but they draw an additional income from their craft. It frequently happens that the shaman is also the son of a shaman and has, in a manner of speaking inherited his "science". Some, however, become students of another shaman for a considerable sum, still others become impromptu shamans whenever the "power" descends on them. Women can also become shamans, as we have said. It is arranged so that large villages have their own shaman, whereas several smaller ones fall within the territory of one shaman.

The work of these priests is probably rooted partly in self-delusion, but in any case there is a considerable addition of intentional deception.

756 Fortunately they themselves, although smarter than the 576 rest, are not very superior, and can therefore not teach the 554 people anything very harmful, nor have they been able to make a privileged place for themselves. The shaman's advice is sought where every-day experience does not prove adequate, but the counsellor is not generally treated with great veneration. Most of the shamans are received without any kind of greeting, only famous ones are met with a bow; beyond Sofiyskoye there was even one before whom the whole house went on its knees when he appeared at the door in order to perform his magic. In general the shamans not only enjoy a certain esteem, but they are also feared. Nevertheless, there are cases where people refused to pay a shaman because of his false predictions and his ineptitude, and sometimes shamans are even flogged. Their magic practices will be considered later.

● 622 Finally, there are the "starosti" (1), that is, elders who 177

1. This is a Russian word.

are appointed by officials. They are, however, not actual mayors; they have nothing to say and are scarcely more than intermediaries through whom the official gives his orders to the community, for these starosti speak Russian well and are in general intelligent people. [234]

171 among the Goldi, are in use throughout the Gilyak people
751 and are essentially the same as those discussed earlier
301 (Number XIII, p. 207) [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst]. The Gilyak on Sakhalin Island whose houses 372 Jakobsen entered were likewise highly indignant whenever 462 he left the house with a lighted pipe or when his companions
776 extinguished the fire burning in a hut by pouring water on it. For in their opinion such things tended to conjure up destruction not only over the inhabitants of the one hut but over the whole tribe. The inhabitants of one house in the village of Varki below Nikolayevsk predicted the same result when Jakobsen was about to light a fire for making the tea, and they forced him to wait till the house-wife saw to this task, since, in their opinion, this was a job only to be performed by her. Plainly this conduct has its basis in the sacred position of fire. [380] Though this no longer leads to a personification of a fire god among the Goldi and the Gilyak, it no doubt existed among them at one time as it still does today among the Buryat.

776 The system of gods of the Gilyak is in no way behind that 171 of the Goldi in variety. Human and animal figures in color-
825 ful diversity serve as representations of celestial beings.
796 Here, too, there is a great similarity to the religious conceptions of the Goldi; the most important difference seems to me the one that was touched upon earlier [XIV, p. 223], [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] the fact that the Goldi
796 pay zealous homage to the tiger while the Gilyak do honor to the bear. It is true, though, that this homage is disastrous 415 to the bears since it means keeping a number of these 531 animals imprisoned in the cages in every village and killing
231 them at a bear festival. Before the festival the bears are fed plentifully for an extended time by means of large wooden spoons prepared especially for the purpose and decorated 796 with ingenious carvings. These bear festivals are usually held late in autumn and in winter and they are affairs of the greatest importance to their celebrators. I will now give the description of the festival that Jakobsen had the opportunity of observing in person.

796 On the 7th of February, 1885, the traveller arrived in
● 622 the early morning at the Gilyak village Vaida about 30 versts
574 above Nikolayevsk, where, as he had been informed, a festival was to take place on that day. From several other villages, some of which were considerable distances away large numbers of guests had come in already, and the whole place was astir in anticipation of the festival at hand. The opening of the bear festival is in the hands of the village

796 elder who also determines how many and which bears are
● 622 to be killed by the consent of their owners, for it is not the 574 village as such but individuals in it who are the owners of the captured animals. Once an agreement has been reached 796 on this point the animals intended for slaughter are led from 777 house to house several weeks before the fixed date and must spend a night in each, in order to bring its inhabitants luck 796 by their stay. During this time the animals get only a little food, but at the end of it they are indemnified for their involuntary fast by being taken throughout the night from house to house and fed the choicest tidbits, namely, fresh and dried fish, berries and a thick gruel prepared from millet.

796 While making the rounds through the village, the bears are 563 irritated by being pricked, and they are enraged by a mock hunt staged on them with lances. The bears are ones that have been captured young in the woods or bought full-grown from the Chinese or Manchu who are also quite numerous in the 796 Gilyak territory. During the mock-hunt the Gilyak naturally take the precaution of tying the animals in such a way that they cannot easily get at their tormentors. Close behind the front legs they tie a strap around their body to which are attached rings through which are run iron chains. To these chains, in turn, they fasten thick belts of seal hide and of considerable length, in such a way that some go forward and others backward. A number of Gilyak take hold of these belts and in this way they are able to force the bear to stand completely still by alternately tightening the belts depending on whether the bear is turned frontwards or backwards when it wants to attack its tormentors.

796 Outside the village there is a kind of fence made of sturdy 417 willow sticks, which has an opening for an avenue that is also fenced in on both sides with similar willow sticks. Inside this enclosure the bear, after it has finished its tour through 796 the village, is tied between two tree trunks. There it is left 841 to itself for a while, while the inhabitants of the village amuse 231 themselves with the dog race almost always held at these 437 celebrations. In the village visited by Jakobsen they also had a track especially constructed for this purpose, which, however, was not very long. After the dogs had been led to the track by their owners and placed next to each other, they were let loose at intervals of a few seconds, but they all arrived at the finish about the same time. There is, by the way, no idea of winning prizes at this race, since such do not even exist. Rather, it might be called a purchasing race since the race serves to place the good qualities of the dogs in the right light and thus to arouse a desire for buying. The 624 COUNCILS--existence of advisory or deliberative bodies within the community (e.g., council of elders, assembly of adult males); membership; mode of selection, organization; functions (e.g., advisory, judicial, legislative); conduct of sessions; powers and prerogatives; etc. See also:

623

Councils of territorial divisions . . . . . 63 Legislative and deliberative bodies of the state. . 666

/119 cont./

* 614 554 556 not only in natural products, but also purchased ones, tobacco, rice, kumiss, etc., because his wealth and associations make it possible for him to undertake distant journeys for the barter of furs and the acquisition of goods at firsthand. He is the guardian of the common "shagund" of his closest kinsmen, and the possessor of his own rich collection of "shagund," which his clansmen may use in case of necessity.

For the whole clan he is not only a man whose home is always open, where one can always go to eat well, enjoy the delights of tobacco, and hear interesting things, but one who always comes to assist in time of need. Especially invaluable, however, is his help at times of common misfortune, such as war, conflicts arising from revenge, disputes with members of other clans. He has supplies of the best weapons and conveyances, his name strikes terror into the foe, who for that reason will more willingly consent to a reconciliation, and, finally, he has supplies of "shagund" when it becomes necessary to pay ransom. Moreover, such a person usually possesses exceptional intelligence, eloquence, rich experience, and [537] knowledge of life and people. He is the natural orator, "shlaj-nivukh," who plays such a weighty role in affairs of revenge and civil disputes; even neighboring clans resort to him when the intervention of intermediaries is necessary. Among these yz'i there are individuals who enjoy enormous fame and respect throughout all the territory settled by the [532] Gilyak. In the image and likeness of these yz'i are fashioned images of the gods, the "masters" of the mountains, seas, heavens, rivers, etc. Moreover, they do not simply display respect toward him, but also a feeling of religious adoration. From among such individuals, under favorable circumstances, are developed those elements of authority which we find in other tribes standing on a higher level of cultural conditions.
● [623] In some cases, such yz'i will become the council of elders, which before the clan assembly decides the affairs of the [622] community in the name of the clan. Under other circumstances, when the tribe is compelled to conduct frequent wars,

/119 cont./

*614 the most outstanding yz'i become leaders of the tribe for life, 854 or hereditary tribal leaders, leaders of troops, vikings, or 556 [622] founders of dynasties.

But in the clan life of the Gilyak such individuals do not yet make claim to anything of this sort. Their role is still too insignificant and in any event incidental in comparison with the complex functions of the clan, whose mechanism and life are based on the value and initiative of the integrated personality of each individual. What is the /120/ yz' if not that integrated personality in its highest manifestation of individuality? The influence of the yz' is therefore purely factual, moral; between him and the poorest of his clansmen there is no abyss either in the intellectual or economic sense, while the higher fraternal bond of the religio-social union of the clan towers over and dominates all.

*614 Such is the mechanism of clan life. Its real mainspring is 182 the comprehensive development of the personality, together with an integrated religio-social world-view. Organized power is completely absent, Although invisible behind all this, and without any claims to power, elements of authority exist, these elements are without form; they appear on the scene in an elemental fashion, spontaneously, and not at all as constant elements of authority which would push the free manifestation of personality into the background, but these elements nevertheless do exist. There are three of them:

Above all there is the khal', the clan, i.e., the whole [623] totality of the adult clansmen, or at least all those who are present at a given moment, which, having no head or regular assemblies, ordinarily appears suddenly on the scene when some serious problem demands its interference and, once the problem is resolved, disappears from the scene as suddenly as it appeared.

/120 cont./

*614 Then there are the hejmary, the elders, all of whose author-182 ity consists in the solution of moot problems of cult and kinship.
● 623 They play a certain role at the time of the clan festivals, at which they are generally the principal managers; they are, after a fashion, the priests of the clan. They do not, however, wield any influence or possess any actual significance in the other important manifestations of the life of the clan.

*614 Finally, the third element of authority is the yz'i.
187 Under favorable conditions, there could develop out of these 556 [554] three elements those diverse forms of power which in various combinations (people's assemblies, the council of the elders, patriarchs, priest-kings and military leaders, dukes, vikings, kings, and so forth) we find among many semi-cultured peoples at the present time and at the dawn of the history of all nations which are civilized today. But among the Gilyak these elements are only embryonic, and it is hardly fated for them ever to receive an impetus toward further development.

/121/ VIII.

Interclan Relations

615 The clan, however, is not a self-sufficient institution, and
*614 a man's intimate ties are not bounded only by the clan to which he belongs by birth.

Each clan, by the basic principle of its matrimonial law, is bound by marriage ties with four other clans, the akhmal'k and ymgi clans. Between these clans is formed the bond of blood kinship, so important in the eyes of primitive man, the bond of common origin through the mother (the male ancestors of all four clans and the representatives of each of their generations are reciprocally first cousins through the mother), and to this are united those powerful ties of natural intimacy which are engendered by generations of women tying these clans together in an uninterrupted chain of marriage unions.

/354 cont./

614 2. Marriage within the clan is absolutely forbidden. This is a basic and inviolable principle of the clan. However broad the marital rights of the Gilyak are with regard to women of the categories mentioned, however broad the views of the Gilyak are on the relationship of men and women in general ("love forgives everything"), within the clan neither marriage nor adultery is encountered, even as an exception.

614 3. The wife of a deceased Gilyak is transferred, following 587 the decision of the clan, to one of the ruvn of the deceased, generally to a younger one; even though she be assigned to a ruvn who is older than the deceased, he is obliged to support her, although he cannot live with her as with a wife. But under no circumstances can the wife of the deceased pass to the persons in the ascending or descending line of kinship from the deceased, i.e., to his khal'-ytk, atk, oia. Generally speaking, as a rule, a woman living as a wife (de facto), with someone may under no circumstances belong to anyone in the ascending or descending line of kinship with her first husband. This rule is observed as strictly as the prohibition against internal marriage. Therefore,
614 it is easy to understand why a Gilyak looks on many marriages [329] concluded among us between near relatives as incest. From this it follows that it is of the utmost necessity for a Gilyak to know all his clansmen, who are often very numerous and, in addition, scattered over the most distant parts of Gilyak territory. This knowledge of his own clan constitutes one of the elements of the [667] mental upbringing of a Gilyak. This knowledge passes from father to son, it is renewed with life, and is the possession of the
● [623] whole clan. In doubtful cases of kinship, the questions are decided by the elders in the clan.

614 4. The khal' supports all the old people, the sick, the in-173 capacitated, and other helpless persons. Generally this is done by the nearest kinsmen, but, in the absence of such, the person is supported by that yurt of the khal' where he wants to live. "We do not have any beggars," one Gilyak told me, "if someone is poor, he is fed by the khal'."

548 On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such 837 a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him
684 a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be un-
839 known among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

514 As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred 834 to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers. Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

177 It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of 437 modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are 183 most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards.
576 Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

735 Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The 273 only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about. In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

● 623 XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution
681 of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they

● 623 usually concern abductions of women or major transgres-
681 sions and crimes. Women do not take part in them. The opinions of the older generation usually are decisive. In cases of particular importance the Gilyaks of surrounding villages are drawn in. The penalties for crimes consist of fines in money for the plaintiffs, in banishment of the guilty one from the village, or in a sort of ostracism which results in a cessation of all intercourse with him. Occasionally, though rarely, the death penalty is pronounced, but this is of course kept a secret from the Russian administration. As for corporal punishment, the Gilyak are no adherents of the idea. It is sometimes applied, but there is evidence that formerly it was never used.

578 Quarrels between men sometimes lead to a duel. It is 411 conducted in the presence of witnesses. The weapon used is the kaur, but in this case they fight with the end which does not have the iron point. The challenger deals the first blow, the blows are parried as much as possible with the stick. The fight usually continues until blood is drawn or one of the fighters is stunned and reels. This fight seldom ends in death. Sometimes when two Gilyak get very angry- which, however, seldom happens- they reach for their knives and begin stabbing each other in disregard of any kind of rules. [228]

563 A sad spectacle are the man-hunts, i.e., persecution of 177 fleeing Russian criminals, which the Gilyak also sometimes carry on. Such refugees or so-called brodyagi (i.e., loafers are a common sight on all large highways in Siberia and the direction they take is always the same, that is, from east to west. Most of them are convicts who have escaped from forced labor. Since the island of Sakhalin was chosen as the chief deportation center for non-political criminals, these brodyagi also pass through the Amur region. Very few of them escape in order to go back to their homes, i.e., European Russia. Even though the thought of home, of their native villages and families may arouse warm, tender emotions in even the most hardened criminals, nevertheless, these refugees know too well the possibility of arrest to entertain great hopes. The usual practical goal which they hold up to themselves is-not to be recognized in case of arrest and thus to be put in the general class of brodyagi in which they would also be condemned to hard labor, but only for a few years, after which they could become Siberian citizens. Others, finally, escape without any particular

9: Hawes--137-138 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 361, 563, 624

sergeant, but his duties are as varied as those of a prefect in F commissioner in India. Police, military, the census, agricultu these and more come within his cares; and for this he is paid t thirty rubles (three guineas) a month. Tracking escaped convic important of his functions at Ado Tim, and he was away down th when we arrived."

France, or even a deputy-re, and 'roads,' all he magnificent sum of ts was not the least he river on this errand

626

626 SOCIAL CONTROL--incentives to conformity (e.g., expectation of rewards, reciprocity, fear of social and supernatural sanctions, conscience), means of inducing conformity (e.g., example, precept, praise, rewards, warnings, threats); pressure of public opinion; informal mechanisms of social control (e.g., criticism, ridicule, gossip, cursing, sorcery, intentional silence, ostracism); incidence and effectiveness of such sanctions as compared with the application of physical force; etc. See also:

Socialization	86	Niceness to beaches of etiquette	576
Social norms	183	Breaches of ethics	577
Public opinion	158	Ingroup arrangements	670
Wit and humor	522	Sorcery	724
Curse and gossip	654	Supernatural sanctions for violations of taboos and other offenses	794
Lust of face	150
Kinship group	571	Cursing	769

*835 /179 cont./ By way of an exception, I observed several cases
578 where jealous men moved to an isolated place immediately 834 after the wedding, in order to avoid the competition of their 166 brothers. Thus, the settlement of Sakh-Kotan, the southern-[361] most Gilyak settlement on the western shore, was founded by such a jealous man; when I visited it in 1897, I found there only its founder with his numerous descendants, and my Gilyak companions made not a few jokes about him, but he was invulnerable -- his wife was of an age when women are well beyond suspicion. But such cases are exceptional, and all the more exceptional are cases of sharp clashes between brothers on account of jealousy. In order to avoid them, only an observance of tact is demanded. Such cases are possible when an individual wife and a bachelor tuvn go beyond the bounds of decency and tact: when a woman begins to run after her sweetheart publicly, disappears from the house, and completely disregards her obligations to her individual husband. In such cases it is sometimes necessary for the sweetheart to move out of the house of his brother or even out of his village, 166 and the woman sometimes gets a scolding. I met such exiles
*835 a couple of times in northern Sakhalin. Usually, however, the 578 relations between tuvn are quite peaceful. If the older brother gets a little angry, it is in silence and without any consequences. Any active reaction is considered a sin. It is considered a great sin to challenge one's brother to a duel out of jealousy. I personally never happened even to hear of such cases. I happened to find out about one such case from B. Pilsudski, but this was a completely /180/ exceptional instance. A certain Lokhmatka, a young Gilyak also very well known to me personally, a very poor lad, but one who enjoyed unusual success with the Gilyak women, allowed himself to live too openly with the wife of one of his tuvn. According to the [626] Gilyak custom, as I have already said, publicity in such cases [594] is not allowed. It is allowed in exceptional cases, when the [556] hero is an outstanding and rich man, esteemed by all. Lokhmatka, however, was a thriftless Gilyak, everlastingly in debt to everybody, lightheaded, and unfortunately for any

/250 cont./
831 Such instances must not be regarded as a general
192 phenomenon, however. Along with the factor of heightened sexuality and sexual freedom, other, restraining factors are also acting. Among the married women, such factors are maternity, economic cares, and, finally, among both married and unmarried women, such feelings as love and bashfulness. In general, however, sexual dissoluteness plays no small role in the life of the Gilyak, not only in an economic, but in a psychological sense as well. Ordinarily the Loveiaces either do not maintain households at all or, if they do, maintain their economies very carelessly. Both [626] in life and in poetry one constantly comes across sharp reproaches and the reviling of the youth by the older people for laziness at work in connection with licentiousness. And [842] furthermore the Gilyak themselves attribute childless marriages 831 to dissoluteness. But the saddest of all is the influence of 158 dissoluteness on the psychics. A whole series of nervous disorders specific for the Gilyak, such as myarechenie among both men and women, and diseases connected with the full loss of psychic composure (self-control /given in English/) are the result of dissoluteness, which furthermore, among women, is accompanied by serious transgressions in the realm of the sexual sphere, and the latter, in turn, lead to the appearance of hysteria.

831 Side by side with the wide sexuality and sexual freedom
192 described above, the feeling of love still plays a great role in the life of the Gilyak. The most extensively used term for love, ef'-mund, denotes both sexual love and love in general, for children, friends, etc. There is a special term for reciprocal love -- ef'mundi; for marriage for love, ef'mur:kir, vayvnd. There are also some other terms for love, for example, hyvnd and others, but the one as special terms for "beloved" /male/, "beloved" /female/, although /251/ one can say eimula nagryvn, i.e., "man whom they love," but in the language of lovers the beloved designate each other either by the terms "husband" and "wife," or by

/251 cont./
831 childhood a little girl is taught to speak with a soft melodic 192 quality and to give her face a dreamy coquettish appearance.
A woman not infrequently succeeds through her talent for 824 singing. In their songs the women are capable, not only of 543 expressing their love with great delicacy, but also of ridiculing
• 626 unwanted suitors most maliciously. In her sarcasm the woman does not stop at any hyperbole. In one song the nose of the undesired one is compared to open patches of water in a frozen surface, to an open door, and his clothing, his dogs, his harness, etc. are described in similar tones.

829 /252/ Sexual Abnormalities and Perversions. I asked the Gilyak many times if such sexual perversions as pederasty and bestiality were practiced among them. No one, apparently, had ever heard of any cases of pederasty. As for [158] bestiality, only in one village on the Tym' was I told, and then with disgust, of one psychically sick Gilyak who had 837 copulated with a dog. The attitude of the Gilyak to these 599 perversions is made clear by the following legend, which I wrote down on the Amur. The tiger, the panther, and even the lion (?) were once men. Once, by chance, the god Kur saw that they were copulating through the rear orifice. Then in indignation he said: "Well, since you copulate like beasts, henceforth be ye beasts forever." Thus, in the view of the Gilyak, the above-mentioned perversions are acts which make a man like a beast.

143 The Gilyak have an extremely simple attitude toward 832 hermaphrodites (miskund in the eastern dialect, miskij -- in the western dialect), in whose peculiarities they apparently see a plain anomaly, but feel no abhorrence for them and [588] are glad to have sexual intercourse with them. Marriages of hermaphrodites are a common event.

/276 cont./
543 years regularly sent him rice, tobacco, 431 and tea, and divided with him all that he obtained in the way of objects of consumption. Besides this, he had given a large dowry of clothing, furs, and ornaments.

• [626] return a gift of equal value to the bridegroom. A Gilyak who breaks this custom becomes a general laughingstock. Besides the gifts to the groom, it is also the father's obligation to provide his daughter with a dowry equal in value to the bride price, and the dowry is in essence as much a gift to the daughter as it is to her husband, who is freed from the great expense of expenditures on his wife.

Thus, it is clear that, at least among the Gilyak (among other peoples, too, there is much reason to think) (2), bride [191] 2. Incidentally, among the Turkic peoples and the Shoshoni Indians, where marriage actually has the character of buying-selling, giving presents to the groom is just as obligatory as it is among the Gilyak.

price is not at all a replacement for marriage by abduction, as has been asserted up to now by many and considered to be 583 axiomatic until very recently. In the legal consciousness of the Gilyak, marriage accompanied by bride price is not an act of buying and selling, either; evidence for /277/ this is the fact that it is positively not allowed to buy wives from one another. It remains for us to answer the question, why is there no 583 bride price in the orthodox marriage? The fact is that in this last 187 case marriages are concluded between persons who are bound by common blood both on the side of the father and on the side of the mother; the marriage is sanctioned both socially and religiously. But when marriages are concluded between alien clans, the exchange of gifts plays a role both magical (a mutual guarantee

/308 cont./
765 has cuckooed for a long time, drinks water from a cup. Go well, 775 live well, (observe) the law of your fathers, the law of your mothers, the law of your elder brothers. Go." These words are said at the ordinary funeral repasts.

769 After a while they buy a bear, feed it for two years, and then 774 hold a bear festival. If a kinsman of the deceased does not buy a bear, • 626 he is treated with contempt and reviled -- "main khardz:. " "What sort of a person are you? Your mother brought you up, cleaned up your excrement. A good man does not even abandon his pryski like that." One cannot be tried for such a vilification. One's classmen always help one to hold a bear festival.

The woman cannot marry until the major funeral repast
587 is over.
768

766 They inter a baby up to a week old on a tree, up to half a year old -- in the ground. If a child who died before he was [842] three days old was cremated, his mother would not have children for a long time.

[184] On the Amur four little firs with roots are placed over the grave.

[751] During pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) the dead are not cremated, but must be buried in a grave.

Drowned persons. Tilghf -- the place where a drowned man has been pulled out. When a man has drowned, he is cremated, and on the third day they make a tolv'ŋ, i.e., a cup for sacrifices to the master of the water, a trough, and a kinyn -- a cup for the drowned man; mos' is placed in the trough, in the cup -- red curants. They pity the man; they select two or three /369/ brave men, put the deceased in a boat on the bank there by the water, and place a kinyn nich, a Chinese kettle, and one rose-willow branch standing to the height of a man. At point one man says: "Kettle, boil, steam, rise, move upwards, you, rose-willow branch, widen, make a good covering so that the devil does not see the Gilyak."

/333 cont./
224 are carried into the taiga, there they find a tree with a hollow
782 trunk, make an opening in the hollow trunk, feed the head, and throw all the bones and the head there.

The otter is fed and buried in exactly the same way as the sable. The remaining beasts are uigvnd kauk (i.e., there is no taboo on them).

833 When a pair of reindeer horns from a mature specimen are 147 found lying side by side in the taiga, the possession of them gives the Gilyak luck.

224 During the hunting with nooses (pochakhir n'arkhund), a 784 woman must not sew anything new or give anything from her own house to another, even a member of her own clan, if that thing has spent a night in the house. One must not carry the fire outside. One must not allow any guest to spend the night. In the taiga, one may enter another's balagan, but not spend the night. If a sable is caught in a noose, an alien may not take it with his hands without the permission of the master, and in general during the hunting season the captured sable cannot be touched even by a person from the same clan if he is not a participant in the hunting party; even a killed hazel-grouse may not be touched. If • [626] any person commits an uigind -- sin, they do not let him fish or hunt on the stream, and they do not attend his bear festival.

224 /334/ Sables, when caught, should not be killed by dogs.
Catching a wolf. In Ikhdam (northwestern Sakhalin) they place a tree with a forked branch and sharpened edges not far from the yurt. Yukola is hung between the forked branch and the trunk; the wolf jumps up to seize it, sticks in his paw, which becomes caught, and he cannot free it. It is a sin to shoot at wolves.

225 Seals are caught thus: a net is placed around a tor' (?), and the seals sleeping on the sand are driven together; then they fall into the net.

224 Mos' is made twice a year (in summer after the salmon, [252] and in autumn before the sable). In winter one must unfailingly kill a great number of dogs oneself (a minimum of four), make plenty of mos', and in summer catch a great number of bears (this will be pal n'ivukh thhusind). In general a great deal is done for the sake of thhusind.

198 urla-dun 'good meat' they say amra-elvia-dun 'amra bad 225 meat.'
urla-dun 'bad meat' they say amra-urla-dun 'amra good meat.'

225 Apart from taboos pertaining to names the hunters must 781 also observe other taboos during the hunt. Thus, for instance one must not pour water out of the boat onto flow where seals had been killed. Xitrov, who told me about it, said that he all but lost his sight as a result of pouring water out of the boat onto flow with killed seals on it.

It is forbidden to stick a knife in the ground during the hunt.

It is forbidden to spit in the blood of a seal, etc.

[85] Not only the hunters are supposed to observe a number of taboos; the same applies for those who remain home and, especially for women.

Thus, those who remain home must not do any laundrying in the house of the owner of the boat. They must not pass any objects to one another across the fire, for, in that case, the seal at the seine would swim through it.

They must not let leather for shoes (ki-ut), otherwise the seals will forget.

They must not cook hearts of seals until after the hunt.

A pregnant woman must not approach the sea shore, otherwise all ice might be carried off to sea and the hunters would not be able to hunt seals.

[15] In this connection I quote from my Sakhalin diary one of my conversations with the Gilyaks. This conversation took place in the village Khoi on the western shore of Sakhalin (50 versts from the new settlement Alexandrovsk) on June 8th, 1908. I was sitting in Gilyak Rogyin's yurt. Present were, besides Rogyin and myself, the Gilyaks Kavagun, Chukich, Furagg and the late old man Pitunga, as well as one of my friends and the interpreter L. IA. Shternberg.

Rogyin said: 'When you go seal hunting in the spring you know all that is going on at home. The seal will tell all. The seal will not tell the good things, but he will invariably tell the bad things that are going on at home. If, say, the woman at home starts scratching her head, the seal on the floe will scratch his head with his paw. If they are fighting at home, the seal will start fighting. If the woman wash something at home and hang it out, the hunter is bound to miss the seal even if it were set more than five steps away from him. We say that all the hunter can do is bet the loam. Obviously, the 'god' Sas

225 has hung something in front of the seal. The seals will also 782 smell if a thief is in the village. If the wife at home has sexual relations with another man while her husband is away on a hunt, the seals on the floe will likewise engage in sexual inte-784 course. When they witness some such thing at sea, some of our Gilyaks will, after returning home, beat up their wives and later find out from neighbors in the village what had really happened. Now, suppose you cook seal meat, eat it and pick your teeth with a little stick, then the seal in the sea will show how you picked your teeth with the little stick.

During the seal hunt on floes, when the Gilyaks jump from floe to floe close to shore and kill seals with harpoons, those at home must not break any objects - says, plates or bowls, for otherwise the floe will break and the hunter, say, the leader of the gang, may drown. Therefore those at home must be very careful.

On the day when something goes wrong at home, the hunter will not get hold of a seal. There he returns home angry and tries to find out what deprived him and his friends of their quarry.
786 Rogyin told me all this in order to prove to me the existence of 825 of a god, god's point on which I did not want to agree with him.
'Here came a seal, 20 versts from home, know what is going on at home?' he told me. 'Surely this must be telling him about it. That's why we say that he knows.'

Incidentally, after my conversation with Rogyin, Pitunka told me that the neighbor in the 'ancient Gilyaks' observed the following ul. ni 'taboo.' 'We' during a seal hunt the guest must not 'eat' the tentacles of a seal or teapot. Only the master of the house (in the past as well as at the present time) could pour out tea or any other liquid food for the guest. If the guest wanted to pour out tea, he touched the handle of a settle or teapot, he was obliged to tear a strip of material off his sleeve, and put it into the teapot.

1. This word in my diary is illegible. As far as I can remember, Pitunka spoke of a beath.

225 [86] During the spring hunt the Gilyaks of the village Kul 811 hunt seals, walruses, sea lions, etc.; the sea cat; the fox and 825 dolphin. They distinguish the following varieties and ages of seals.

Pila-la-r 'Sivuch'

1. Nav-ra 'present sivuch', i.e. a sivuch born in the given year.

2. Tyl-r, literally: 'last year's animal', i.e. a two year old sivuch or one born in the previous year.

225 After they have killed a sivuch, they wash his head and its 782 mouth with water, and then they have a special scoop
r. ainkiu-ymrut; literally, 'the animal face washing scoop,
i.e. the scoop for washing the face of the animal.
The hunters with pika-r stick in them are taken home.
225 After the first sivuch has been killed the pila. performs 782 the ceremony of feeding the figurines tak. Regardless of the 825 number of killed seals belonging to one "harvesting", this 778 ceremony is performed only after the killing of the first sivuch. The pila. takes the liver of the sivuch and smears the mouth of the figurines with blood taken from the heart of the sivuch. [87] The Gilyaks say that if one were to smear all of the figurines with a sivuch's liver, the latter would die. After the completion of this ceremony the sivuch is regarded as belonging to the hunter. However, as far as the distribution of the quarry is concerned, this sivuch is regarded as being not different from the other sivuchs. This will become apparent from the facts given below. Thus - as I was informed by a Gilyak - the blood only of five sivuchs have been killed. Without drawing final conclusions as to the possibility of the pila.
asserting, that it is not the sivuch killed by him who is the lord of the quarry - for this we do not have sufficient data - we wish to emphasize at this junction two incidents. Once upon a time a Gilyak by the name of Ikar killed an old sivuch during the hunt; second - this appropriation is effected under the guise
of a religious ceremony.
784 This latter circumstance clarified for me the essence of a 782 number of taboos among the Gilyaks.
183 Thus, for instance, young hunters (as well as women)are 825 supposed to observe a number of taboos in connection with the 264 meat of a bear. At the same time old hunters need not observe these taboos. This is not the place for the enumeration of the well known parts of the animal which the young hunters (as well as women)are not supposed to eat. We shall only mention the explanations given by the Gilyaks concerning some of the interdictions. Thus, for instance, the young hunter must not eat the heart of a bear, otherwise he will sustain a heart affliction as soon as he comes on a track of a bear. And one cannot go hunting bears with a heart affliction. The young hunter must not eat the tongue of a bear, otherwise the bear will beat him to death during an encounter. Therefore tongue did not only can eat. These instances illustrate the manner in which the Gilyaks reason about taboos.

It would be ridiculous to look for special meaning in all these explanations.The meaning of taboos is the taboo
and their interpretation is simple--the taboos serve to keep

784 from young hunters and women the fact that the old hunters 785 who play a leading part in the hunt appropriate the lion's parts of the quarry under the guise of religious interdictions.
787 [88] Except for the relations between the old and young 787 hunters as well as the relations between the male and female parts of the clan, there are 818 Thus, in the very small village Kul, in the village Ch'arvo
(Charbuhk), the old Gilyak Kouin and [illegible] tak (Agoka) informed 825 me of interesting taboos pertaining to a number of objects used by children in their games.

A boy must not play with a joke or with a boar; used by women in cutting leather and cloth (tana-k-ainr). Also, a child must not play with a woman's knife (ki-ut). After the completion of this ceremony the sivuch is regarded as belonging to the hunter. However, as far as the distribution of the quarry is concerned, this sivuch is regarded as being not different from the other sivuchs. This will become apparent from the facts given below. Thus - as I was informed by a Gilyak - the blood only of five sivuchs have been killed. Without drawing final conclusions as to the possibility of the pila.
asserting, that it is not the sivuch killed by him who is the lord of the quarry - for this we do not have sufficient data - we wish to emphasize at this junction two incidents. Once upon a time
a Gilyak by the name of Ikar killed an old sivuch during the hunt; second - this appropriation is effected under the guise
of a religious ceremony.
784 This latter circumstance clarified for me the essence of a 782 number of taboos among the Gilyaks.
183 Thus, for instance, young hunters (as well as women)are 825 supposed to observe a number of taboos in connection with the 264 meat of a bear. At the same time old hunters need not observe these taboos. This is not the place for the enumeration of the well known parts of the animal which the young hunters (as well as women)are not supposed to eat. We shall only mention the explanations given by the Gilyaks concerning some of the interdictions. Thus, for instance, the young hunter must not eat
the heart of a bear, otherwise he will sustain a heart affliction
as soon as he comes on a track of a bear. And one cannot go hunting bears with a heart affliction. The young hunter must not eat the tongue of a bear, otherwise the bear will beat him to death during an encounter. Therefore tongue did not only can eat. These instances illustrate the manner in which the Gilyaks reason about taboos.

It would be ridiculous to look for special meaning in all these explanations.The meaning of taboos is the taboo
and their interpretation is simple--the taboos serve to keep

784 from young hunters and women the fact that the old hunters
785 who play a leading part in the hunt appropriate the lion's parts of the quarry under the guise of religious interdictions.
787 [88] Except for the relations between the old and young 787 hunters as well as the relations between the male and female
parts of the clan,
818 Thus, in the very small village Kul, in the village Ch'arvo
(Charbuhk), the old Gilyak Kouin and [illegible] tak (Agoka) informed 825 me of interesting taboos pertaining to a number of objects used by children in their games.

A boy must not play with a joke or with a boar; used by women in cutting leather and cloth (tana-k-ainr). Also, a child must not play with a woman's knife (ki-ut). After the completion of this ceremony the sivuch is regarded as belonging to the hunter. However, as far as the distribution of the quarry is concerned, this sivuch is regarded as being not different from the other sivuchs. This will become apparent from the facts given below. Thus - as I was informed by a Gilyak - the blood only of five sivuchs have been killed. Without drawing final conclusions as to the possibility of the pila.
asserting, that it is not the sivuch killed by him who is the lord of the quarry - for this we do not have sufficient data - we wish to emphasize at this junction two incidents. Once upon a time
a Gilyak by the name of Ikar killed an old sivuch during the hunt; second - this appropriation is effected under the guise
of a religious ceremony.
784 This latter circumstance clarified for me the essence of a 782 number of taboos among the Gilyaks.
183 Thus, for instance, young hunters (as well as women)are 825 supposed to observe a number of taboos in connection with the 264 meat of a bear. At the same time old hunters need not observe these taboos. This is not the place for the enumeration of the well known parts of the animal which the young hunters (as well as women)are not supposed to eat. We shall only mention the explanations given by the Gilyaks concerning some of the interdictions. Thus, for instance, the young hunter must not eat
the heart of a bear, otherwise he will sustain a heart affliction
as soon as he comes on a track of a bear. And one cannot go hunting bears with a heart affliction. The young hunter must not eat the tongue of a bear, otherwise the bear will beat him to death during an encounter. Therefore tongue did not only can eat. These instances illustrate the manner in which the Gilyaks reason about taboos.

It would be ridiculous to look for special meaning in all these explanations.The meaning of taboos is the taboo
and their interpretation is simple--the taboos serve to keep

[/17 cont./]

But the worst of calamities -- a claimant has been slain
War is inevitable! ... The whole population takes up arms.
There is no regular leader, no advice, and no election. The natural leader has long been known and acknowledged by all.
is the bravest and luckiest of the clansmen, it is the so-called
"master," "gi" - all men are turned into heroes.
And in a moment the equal among equals suddenly becomes a military leader, gives orders, distributes weapons, fixes the time of the battle, marches, etc.; in short, he does everything that if this natural leader had died or been killed, everything would one most worthy to replace him.
614 [/18] Civil disputes between the clans and strife arises between clansmen or 614 tween [/18] representatives of different clans. There are no established persons who ex officio resolve disputes and difficu 614 [/19] Civil disputes between clansmen are settled by the elders sentence. Once the defendant has refused to carry out his obli tion of his own free will, the accuser, not stopping to mediate whatever, a dog from the clan of the defendant and kills the house in order to take for himself something equal in value to claim. And the accuser considers this in the order of things.
614 The affair is settled, and the dog is eaten. Sometimes affair works out perfectly well without the powers that be. It enough for the offended party merely to address himself directly through a third party to the offender and tell him the complaint individuals-"masters" from the clansmen of the offender, and matter is very quickly settled. They summon the offender, who is usually escorted by his clansmen. Gifts are poured out both sides, the incident is closed. There is also a more fellicious outcome when the representatives of a blood clan living in the same settlement intervene in the affair.
offender hubtuin voluntarily; otherwise, they will, of course, separate the [/17 proceed to the offender's storehouse and remove an equivalent [illegible]

784 from young hunters and women the fact that the old hunters
785 who play a leading part in the hunt appropriate the lion's parts of the quarry under the guise of religious interdictions.
787 [88] Except for the relations between the old and young 787 hunters as well as the relations between the male and female
parts of the clan,
818 Thus, in the very small village Kul, in the village Ch'arvo
(Charbuhk), the old Gilyak Kouin and [illegible] tak (Agoka) informed 825 me of interesting taboos pertaining to a number of objects used by children in their games.

A boy must not play with a joke or with a boar; used by women in cutting leather and cloth (tana-k-ainr). Also, a child must not play with a woman's knife (ki-ut). After the completion of this ceremony the sivuch is regarded as belonging to the hunter. However, as far as the distribution of the quarry is concerned, this sivuch is regarded as being not different from the other sivuchs. This will become apparent from the facts given below. Thus - as I was informed by a Gilyak - the blood only of five sivuchs have been killed. Without drawing final conclusions as to the possibility of the pila.
asserting, that it is not the sivuch killed by him who is the lord of the quarry - for this we do not have sufficient data - we wish to emphasize at this junction two incidents. Once upon a time
a Gilyak by the name of Ikar killed an old sivuch during the hunt; second - this appropriation is effected under the guise
of a religious ceremony.
784 This latter circumstance clarified for me the essence of a 782 number of taboos among the Gilyaks.
183 Thus, for instance, young hunters (as well as women)are 825 supposed to observe a number of taboos in connection with the 264 meat of a bear. At the same time old hunters need not observe these taboos. This is not the place for the enumeration of the well known parts of the animal which the young hunters (as well as women)are not supposed to eat. We shall only mention the explanations given by the Gilyaks concerning some of the interdictions. Thus, for instance, the young hunter must not eat
the heart of a bear, otherwise he will sustain a heart affliction
as soon as he comes on a track of a bear. And one cannot go hunting bears with a heart affliction. The young hunter must not eat the tongue of a bear, otherwise the bear will beat him to death during an encounter. Therefore tongue did not only can eat. These instances illustrate the manner in which the Gilyaks reason about taboos.

It would be ridiculous to look for special meaning in all these explanations.The meaning of taboos is the taboo
and their interpretation is simple--the taboos serve to keep

225 After they have killed a sivuch, they wash his head and its 782 mouth with water, and then they have a special scoop
r. ainkiu-ymrut; literally, 'the animal face washing scoop,
i.e. the scoop for washing the face of the animal.
The hunters with pika-r stick in them are taken home.
225 After the first sivuch has been killed the pila. performs 782 the ceremony of feeding the figurines tak. Regardless of the 825 number of killed seals belonging to one "harvesting", this 778 ceremony is performed only after the killing of the first sivuch. The pila. takes the liver of the sivuch and smears
the mouth of the figurines with blood taken from the heart of the sivuch. [87] The Gilyaks say that if one were to smear all of the figurines with a sivuch's liver, the latter would die. After the completion of this ceremony the sivuch is regarded as belonging to the hunter. However, as far as the distribution of the quarry is concerned, this sivuch is regarded as being not different from the other sivuchs. This will become apparent from the facts given below. Thus - as I was informed by a Gilyak - the blood only of five sivuchs have been killed. Without drawing final conclusions as to the possibility of the pila.
asserting, that it is not the sivuch killed by him who is the lord of the quarry - for this we do not have sufficient data - we wish to emphasize at this junction two incidents. Once upon a time
a Gilyak by the name of Ikar killed an old sivuch during the hunt; second - this appropriation is effected under the guise
of a religious ceremony.
784 This latter circumstance clarified for me the essence of a 782 number of taboos among the Gilyaks.
183 Thus, for instance, young hunters (as well as women)are 825 supposed to observe a number of taboos in connection with the 264 meat of a bear. At the same time old hunters need not observe these taboos. This is not the place for the enumeration of the well known parts of the animal which the young hunters (as well as women)are not supposed to eat. We shall only mention the explanations given by the Gilyaks concerning some of the interdictions. Thus, for instance, the young hunter must not eat
the heart of a bear, otherwise he will sustain a heart affliction
as soon as he comes on a track of a bear. And one cannot go hunting bears with a heart affliction. The young hunter must not eat the tongue of a bear, otherwise the bear will beat him to death during an encounter. Therefore tongue did not only can eat. These instances illustrate the manner in which the Gilyaks reason about taboos.

It would be ridiculous to look for special meaning in all these explanations.The meaning of taboos is the taboo
and their interpretation is simple--the taboos serve to keep

627 INFORMAL INGROUP JUSTICE--informalized mechanisms for adjusting grievances and applying sanctions within the community; primary relations [illegible] - fetching, hiring and fostering; feuding; mediation; organized [illegible]; informal hearings before the headman or local council; etc. Data on informal [illegible] under 69 rather than under this category whenever formal judicial institutions are found even at the community level. See also:
Justice, 17 Offense and punishment

624

LOCAL OFFICIALS--specialized offices within the community (e.g., war chief, fire chief, talking chief, recorder of deeds, surveyor, herald, chief priest); qualifications, mode of selection, functions, activities, and prerogatives of each type of official; etc. See also:

Officials of territorial divisions 63
Military organization 70
State bureaucracy 647 Priesthood 793

9: Hawes--137-1
116, 361, 563, 6

"We were nearin
interior. The na settlement lay h
We had no wis
and we would ra but the natives r ashore, hoping t
On either side o
miserably poor, others with loos
clad were indisc

1. The Eas

a fire kindled be betokened tobac
in the scantiest simply in a froc autumn morning
Each village h

g Ado Tim, the last Russian penal settlement of all in the northern tive village of that name was situated on the banks lower down, but the alf a verst from the river.
h to arrest our progress here, the settlement had a very bad reputation, ther camp in the open, or among the natives, from what we had heard; efused to take us further except at a prohibitive price, and we went hat time would settle our difference.....[138]
f the broad grass track of the settlement was a row of higgledy-piggledy, out-of-repair log-huts, with tiny windows, some roofed with boards, e pieces of bark. Pigs, a foal or two, and a few children, miserably riminately scattered on the 'road.' Kita (1) hung curing in the smoke of t Siberian name for Salmo lagocephalus.

neath, and bunches of withering green leaves by the hutside in the sun o drying. Women wandered about barefooted, and they and the men were of clothing, the latter in a cotton shirt and trousers, and the former k and an extra bodice. It was always a matter of wonder to me how in s and late afternoons they could stand the cold so miserably clothed.
as its overseer, who is a soldier. In rank he may be compared to a

/170 cont./

anŋej with regard to an anticipated seance, they go through the same symbolic actions that people go through during the betrothal and wedding ceremonies, namely, they smoke or eat together. To say to a woman of the anŋej category, "Let us have a smoke together," is equivalent to an offer to her to exercise her marital right.

The legal essence of this specific right, as we have said, is in the fact that its realization, even when it becomes known to all, does not provoke a reaction either of the persons concerned or of social censure, and hence it does not constitute a violation of religious morali, a privilege of an extremely important character, for sexual intercourse with women outside of this category incurs grave consequences. If this be a completely alien woman -- although at the present time this does not constitute a religious transgression -- then it provokes, as we have already mentioned, bloody punishment if the fornicators are caught in flagrante delicto, or at best a cruel duel with sticks and a fine. There are many reasons for believing that intercourse with female strangers was even once under a religious prohibition. The following curious custom, by the way, testifies in favor of this notion. If a woman who is not bound to a man by class relationship tries to seduce him, catches him by the leg in some isolated place (a symbolic offering of herself to the man), then he (and, if goes without saying, he does not succumb to the temptation) is obliged, under penalty of punishment of the gods, to demand publicly an expiatory ransom from the woman (1).

1. I personally happened to be a witness to such a ceremony of ransom. It was in the settlement of Tamievo. One of my traveling companions, a Gilyak already middle-aged, once woke me early in the morning and with anxiety asked me to go with him to "court" in the neighboring yurt. There I complaint against a local woman, who the evening before had seized him by the leg, on the grounds of which he was demanding "ransom." They summoned the culprit. She confessed and by the decision of the assembly she was obliged to hand over publicly to her accuser an adjudged ransom, namely, a bear's gall bladder, a bark dish. Why the fine was limited to such insignificant objects (if they were not merely symbols of especially female labor) I explain only by the fact that the guilty woman was entirely alone and did not possess anything more valuable.

/170 cont./

/171/ One must keep in mind the fact that the Gilyak are very passionate and by no means like to let felicitous opportunities for lovemaking, even with alien women, slip by, so it is necessary to regard the aforementioned custom as a survival from that epoch when intercourse with alien women was under a religious prohibition. Still more strictly regarded is an affair between persons of prohibited categories; this meets with the censure of society, the reproaches of kinsmen, punishment of the gods, the gnawing of conscience, and inevitable banishment. There can hardly be even any question of a casual passion, and a more serious feeling is regarded as the result of one's being inhabited by an evil spirit, and the persons prefer to kill themselves. Restraint toward persons of forbidden categories has become converted into that same instinct which is felt among us with regard to one's mother or own sister. All the more powerfully is the right to sexual intercourse between the categories of ŋu and anŋej realized. In this respect, one can express oneself about the Gilyak in the chance to establish an independent economy. But there is another side to the coin -- it is almost impossible for a poor man to settle down with a family, and, consequently, an independent economy. But to a certain degree the rights of group marriage and the possibility of leading a common domestic life with his brothers come to his rescue. Everyone's dream, however, is to settle down with his own family. Usually the clan in the persons of the well-to-do kinsmen comes to the rescue of the poor man. But not every clan has rich people, and, besides, there are persons whose clan has died out. The only solution then is to obtain a wife by work. Usually such a transaction is entered into by a family in which there are no offspring of the male sex, and it is as though the son-in-law were declared an adopted son, although, as a member of another clan, he cannot be an actual heir. Methods of lightening the payment of the bride price are practiced: a wife is purchased in small installments with yearly payments until her majority. But also in the purchase of an adult, /279/ installment buying is sometimes practiced, depending on the contract. A curious means of paying the bride price is the case of payment with the bride price of a future daughter. I know of such a case. The Gilyak Kanka married the sister of the young boy Pletunka. He did not pay a bride price, but he promised to support his widowed mother and to hand over to him the bride price of his own future daughter. And the agreement was fulfilled. Pletunka was about twenty years old when Kanka gave his own daughter in marriage, and he handed over the whole bride price to Pletunka.

/278 cont./

As a matter of principle the bride price belongs to the clan. At a difficult moment of life, for example, if it becomes necessary to pay blood money, each clan-member takes part with his shagynd. But usually the bride price is distributed among the brothers, although not proportionately; the youngest, as heir to the house, usually receives the smallest share. Besides this, the elder brother buys a wife for the younger brother before his own marriage, so that the younger brother does not need the shagynd for bride price. Along with the distribution of the bride

/298 cont./

A bear festival is held also for other reasons, /299/ for instance, for reconciliation with one's son-in-law /syat'/, kikhal or alien. If a person offends his son-in-law, for example, in making a purchase, he keeps silent, and the kikhal keeps silent, but they will continue to talk until a bear festival is held by the offender for reconciliation (urla-ŋ'ymydz).

A bowl, hyl, for the head is necessary for each new bear festival. The head of the bear is always placed in a new bowl, while the old one is used for meat and the like. Anyone can prepare a dish for the bear festival. The bowl for the meat is bound with the penis skin bow. A bowl from which the bear is fed for the last time in the yurt, and always on the side opposite the door, is called pukstov-n'ir.

When a brother gives his sister a bear as a gift, he himself is not permitted to bring it; he must come after it with pomp. The bear is greeted with zadz-chadz music. When the master feeds his bear for the last time, he says to her: "U'ur humyjŋ! Wingan ŋrur humyjŋ -live well! When you go, live well."

The gift giver does not shoot the bear and departs as soon as the festival is over, without even tasting (a morsel), while he must bring with him mos' and all kinds of dishes.

When a bear falls sick, then they hold pylŋg-tvysk and prepare uig, mos', from all sorts of delicacies and all sorts of berries. Tulk -- for dog which has been been specially for the uig.

When a dog is sacrificed, its skin, head and bones are laid in a wooden frame near the lezing where the bones of the bear are placed. Some clans hang bear heads on trees. This place is called k:ork ŋgangof.

V.

Slaves

The son of a slave remains free to the neck (i.e., his head is free), his grandson -- to the belt, his great grandson -- to the feet; in the fourth generation -- the descendants are "pure." Then he is a kikhal, i.e., a kinsman of the master, and if anyone

/302 cont./

Quarrels and methods of reconciliation. If a son-in-law /syat'/ has beaten his brother-in-law /shurin, wife's brother/, he must (present) a pack of racing dogs (three to five; they are sold only in packs) -- kylyn k:an. The first dog is kyly-k:an, the second -- k:ukh, the third -- yeshŋe-k:ukh, the fourth -- ryly-k:ukh. If the first is sold separately, all of them will be untiers. They are placed at a certain distance (10-15 paces) from one another and in reverse order, namely, the first -- kyly-k:an -- last, farthest away, and the must catch up with all of them and the object is that all should come together at the same time, and, if the kyly-k:an arrives first, then it is not suitable. The cost of a pack is up to 100 rubles. The son-in-law /syat'/, in case of a fight with a brother-in-law /shurin/, gives him such a pack of dogs as a present, and, furthermore, he brings them himself or, if he is ashamed, through another, and they cannot be returned, except if the dogs are poor. On the other hand, if a brother-in-law /shurin/ offends a son-in-law /syat'/, he gives for reconciliation a silk robe (35-40 rubles) or a bear as a present.

/303/ Quarrels within the clan. N left his wife, received back his bride price, and began to carry on with Russians and so forth. The old men assembled and decided to take the woman back, but the father-in-law did not agree: "A woman is not a dog, to try and throw away." Nevertheless, she was purchased for a certain young man. Then N, in Khes', began to storm and threaten because they took his abandoned wife. But they replied to him: "You did not buy her yourself but with your father's money" (clan money). The matter ended by their giving a racing dog, fur, and two bottles of vodka.

The oath. Oath -- simbi chakhci lambe -- in Goldi, chkhye'u nyydz:rd -- in Gilyak.

One must kill a wolf (lygyz') and saw, in order, the tendons on both hind legs from the heel to the knee, and ask: "Where is the tendon for the thief? (ennikhrongz') ennikh -- heel, tongz -- tendon), where is the stolen tendon? -- jengz:az' tongz' thamdzhna?" The tendon that twitches is taken out secretly and for your master!" And thus /305/ they go around the entire village, meanwhile pulling on the tendon. Then the thief begin to suffocate from fright and confesses. A shout goes up; it happens that the thief dies from it.

/304 cont./

An oath is taken also in controversial matters. Before the court, in a balagan where the khlaj-nivukh sits, nothing is allowed to be boiled; they eat raw yukola.

A stick (kyz').-- about an arshin in length with a human chkhaj.

If the matter reaches the point of breaking the stick, then they pay more -- double. Both big and little assemble in the balagan of the khlaj-n'vukh'a (the settlement of Kargo, 1896).

Women, Childbirth, and Children. A maiden who has reached sexual maturity makes two braids. Women pierce both ears in order to put in earrings (mer'ab); formerly men also pierced their ears. A wife who is a minor can be sleep only after she begins to menstruate. During menstruation the woman puts on her oldest clothes and does not sleep with her husband. Women wash themselves, but not with hot water, for otherwise the ŋgurmam (the mistress of the fire) takes offense.

Among the Kekhal (Orochi) a man who has two wives accommodates a guest under one blanket.

A pregnant woman must not look at the Amur when it begins to break up, in order not to slow up the opening of the river.

They give birth in the balagan (midwife -- langyv-mum). In winter the mother spends one and a half days in the balagan, in summer -- three days.

One must not cry out during delivery -- a sin. The husband at this time does not go anywhere. If a child has died during birth, the woman must not travel on the river or sea for a whole year -- there would not be any fish. For a month before childbirth, it is not permissible to bind anything tightly or to drive in stakes; it is not permissible to repair anything for an alien.

During difficult deliveries they open up boxes, tear off patches, and unscrew their rifles. The newborn baby is washed with cold water. The midwife is not paid. Until the umbilicus heals, the

/358 cont./

It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khal' of the murderer participates in the payment, each according to his means. A murder within the clan finds its avengers among the closest kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i.e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

The khlaj-nivukh obtain as a reward for their labors their fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Revenge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but in the recollection of the Amur Gilyak (the popular memory; they tell of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/359 cont./

614 family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered in 591 the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had been adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must be fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

614 8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the 422 debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

614 9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of 428 a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, the clan is the heir).

614 10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. We 632 have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a 768 Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased [763] man's "ruva" his widow and children should go. Before the gathering of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

614 In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the 627 participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settled, not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals of different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the [685] affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled

/360 cont./

614 among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly 621 imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal'- 695 geymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations 614 ago), was the social leader, the starosta of the clan. His suc-
622 cessor was the khal'-geymar next to him in years. The inter-[677] vention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But the khal'-geymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where years play a special role in the competence of the judgment.

614 11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from 621 one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to [677] remember one another, to visit one another, and to lend one another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year befall him, and he will go to spend some time with clansmen until matters improve. On the western coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pyanovo, Tangi, Tykl, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in a settlement. This partly 614 arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon 669 his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fish-
621 ing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many sons-in-law to emigrate to the clan of their wife has greatly aided the mixing of the clans. This [591] latter custom, possibly a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands entered the clan of the wife, and not conversely, as it done at

/271 cont./

766 wagn (†). The trunk is chopped off several feet above the roots, 778
532

† On the specimen given to the Academic Museum by the author one of the rear extremities was supplied by a piece of wood specially inserted, which subsequently fell off (see Plate LXVI /p.1266/, Fig. 1).

pointed (the top of the stump), /272/ and, with the pointed end, is sunk into the ground at the place where the ashes of the [674] murdered person lie, so that the root, representing the wagn, projects above it. Since murder is not infrequent among the Gilyak, there are wagn in many villages on the Amur, for instance, in Wassj, Kaki, Wair, Kalgbo, Tebach, and elsewhere.

According to Surgin's information, a wagn is set up only for a murdered person who was killed by the hand of a Gilyak from another village. On the other hand, if one Gilyak kills another in the same village, the latter does not get a wagn. Similarly no wagn is set up if a father or mother kills the son, and vice versa, or a brother, or in general if one relative kills another. In such cases the corpse is simply cremated. The same is done with the corpse of a suicide; it is cremated, and no wagn is set up.

778 The bird's head of the wagn is said to be patterned after the 532 ugn (Colymbus arcticus). This bird is regarded as sacred by the 825 Gilyak and is kept, stuffed, in the same flying position as it has on the wagn. Such stuffed skins of Colymb. arcticus and septentr. are sometimes seen hanging on high frameworks in Gilyak villages. In the representation for the wagn, the Gilyak give the head of the ugn teeth of iron, which are supposed to serve for him to take revenge on the murderer (1).

[628] 1. Perhaps the wagn, by its threatening aspect, [627] is supposed to be a reminder of the obligatory blood revenge, and this is the reason that no wagn is set up in cases where revenge is deemed inadmissible -- as between relatives and the

Gi 6/di RX3 OKh9

/272 cont./

G 778 1. (cont.)
532 members of a village -- or -- as in the case
825 of a suicide -- it is automatically omitted.
G 827
628

Since the soul of a murdered person flies to heaven, it does 766 not need any of the articles such as are placed in the raff for the 775 wandering soul of a person who died a natural death. (Bm. I, pp. 52-54.)

G 62. Gilyak. As the Gilyak (on the west coast of Sakhalin)
764 told me, they burn their corpses and erect wagn over the ashes
184 of murdered persons. (2 W.R. I, p. 8.)
778

63. Gilyak. The Tymy Gilyak assembled in Ngachd-wo
G 764 (on the left bank of the Tymy on Sakhalin) said that they like-184 wise usually burn their corpses, as is done along the Amur, in the Liman, and on the west coast of Sakhalin up to Arkai (excl.). A raff is erected over the ashes of the cremated corpse and, as along the Amur, has a kakk, pyk or tutut, and pyk-ngit or tututngit in it. The pittyssj is present in the raff and among the Tymy Gilyak bears the designation raff-njo, that is, burial-house storage-chamber, which wholly corresponds to its significance. Only the tscham-ngar is missing (*). (2. W.R.I, p. 45.)

* See Appendix 53 /p. 1233/, 55 /p. 1234/.

G 64. Gilyak. From Arkai on, along the west coast of [784] Sakhalin, south to Pilja-wo, the last Gilyak village, the Gilyak
[1911] are said not to cremate their corpses which is regarded as uitsch, but to deposit them in wooden coffins in small houses, just as among the Tungusic tribes of Manchuria and Sakhalin and the Ainu (2 W. R. I, pp. 8, 45.)

/273/ According to another report, the corpses are interred south of Arkai (2 W.R. II, p. 28).

Gi 65. Olcha. In the forest not far from the Russian village of 764 Bogorodskoye in the vicinity of the Olcha village of Pullj (Pulu 531 on the map, on the right bank of the Amur), there were two very gracefully worked Olcha tombs ornamented with various paintings

854
291 516

Child's cradle.

The Nivkhi clans could split up and settle in different places; they could 614 also accept (adopt) people of other clans and tribes. When a clan divided, 621 the Nivkhi broke the flint which was kept by the eldest in the clan (the flint [372] was used to obtain ritual fire, such as the fire for cooking bear meat), and gave a piece to the part that split off.

Long ago, the Nivkhi had the institution of vendetta. All members of a 614 clan were bound to avenge a murder upon all the men of the murderer's 621 clan. Later, vendetta began to be replaced by blood-money (tkhustin). In reconciling clans through the payment of blood-money, the principal role was played by intermediaries of a neutral clan (khlay-nivkh). It was their duty to negotiate the size of the blood-money and to persuade the enemy

614 parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the 621 offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

601 The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in [198] his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were [549] possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grand-614 fathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers 561 (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ulu).

175 Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of 439 fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated
614 the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred
184 first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with 182 the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal [556] articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other [595] neighbors. Members of the Tyalung clan, for instance, were for a long time the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before [569] Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor. The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

175 Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households 567 and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established 175 among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada-- clan elders, 649 and gasyanda--village elders.

After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi 822 subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation 175 appeared, in the institution of "half-sharers." Nivkhi who lacked the imple-
433 ments of production fell into the position of participants, but those who used [549] was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox 77 Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island
[1] of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about the [1] waves, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'--a "master" of other animals. Almost every phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pul-yz'--the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'--the "master"

116, 423, 578, 627, 721

"Of the possession of land in our sense of the word the Gily nearest approach to it was a prescriptive right, sanctioned place snares along certain creeks. The right of all to roam freely recognized; but they would have resented the placing and backwaters by the Tungus and Orochons, although, rath they would have simply gone elsewhere. As among themselv and tracks for snaring had been made in olden [301] times; sanctioned by time are seldom transgressed. The abundanc prowess of the pioneers, yielded little cause for quarrel, a according to the number of snares which the owner of the hu a dispute arose, and was settled by reference to the klenu, duels. In the latter case the disputants fought with a weapon straight blade; but as they were always surrounded by a goo batants were parted when either became exhausted, and the a fatal ending."

aks have no conception. The by immemorial custom, to over the land in hunting was of snares in chosen creeks er than provoke hostilities, ves, the division of the creeks and the customary boundaries e of game, coupled with the nd spots were simply annexed it possessed. Here and there the elders in council, or by like a hedge-bill, with a odly concourse, the com-duel was not allowed to have

116, 627, 682

"Murder is not an uncommon occurr upon the slightest provocation. They ar dictated by superstition, which differ in punished by the friends of the deceased, death, generally by counter-murder. A notion of justice."

ence among these people, being often committed e governed by no established laws except those different localities. A murderer is usually who are bound in some manner to avenge his n eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is their 6

28

"The Gilyaks are, as we have seen, divided i coast people, besides the mainland or Amur khala, or clans. Each khal consists of a fami grandfathers, uncles, etc. The eldest repres members are to be found scattered in many v elders, to whom the injured apply. In cases c and the eldest male of the injured man's fami bows and arrows ready strung, but the counci peacefully, and ordinarily they succeed, the criminal pays a heavy fine.

The Russian authorities wisely refrain fro in each village, whom they term the starosta

nto tribes, viz. the Tim, Tro, and west Gilyaks. These tribes are sub-divided into ly circle. The limits are vague, but include entative of the khal is the chief, and the illages. Each village has its council of of mortal offence, both parties, the criminal ly, march out against one another with il sitting around urge them to end the matter rivals embrace, talk peace, and the n interference, and look to the richest man

, to keep order, etc."

makes the comparison ev
there have been cases wh
by decent people, for exa fore that behaved properly.
found in the peculiar man individual regards strange extent inclined to regard ever, this fact has in re and misinterpreted by som pointed out how the Gilya put themselves in the pla fellow-tribesmen, and to s must remember that, whe moral impulses such as pleasures, the sense of j make room for the egoist tends to repress understa vindictiveness, etc. - break face to face with stranger put their worst foot forwa with the civilized world.
Brunière, who in the year way of the Amur and the robbed and murdered out his case was and has re village of Vaida (32 versts Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) stil en more valuable. Unfortunately, here Gilyak have been wronged ample by soldiers who had be-

. The causes for that may be nner in which the uncultivated e peoples. He is to a certain foreigners as outlaws. Howecent times been badly misused ne philosophers. We have k themselves were able to ce of strangers as well as sympathize with them. But one ere strangers are concerned, compassion, the sharing of ustice, etc., more than ever tic impulses. Everything that nding and sympathy-greed, s out more easily if one is rs. The Gilyak unfortunately ard in their first acquaintance
The French missionary, Le 1848 came from China by Ussuri to the Gilyak was of pure lust for booty. But mained an exception. The from the present city of l has about 200 inhabitants

/59 cont./

614 as well as of the cult of ancestors, but I shall confine myself
171 here, for the time being, to what has been said, all the more since the institution of totemism has not assumed the same sharply pronounced form among this tribe that it did among other, specifically totemistic tribes, for example, the Australians, the North American Indians, the ancient Egyptians, etc.

614 Sacrifices to the clan gods are offered periodically. All
782 sorts of delicacies of the Gilyak cuisine are prepared by each 796 family prior to the day of the festival, and they are placed in particular vessels reserved especially for this occasion. On the next day the entire male population of the clan sets out in boats or, in case of a disturbance on the sea, on foot in the taiga and stations itself on its clan plot of ground near its clan sign. The elder in the clan takes a handful from each dish and throws it, crying out at the same time, "chukh!" i.e., "This is for you!" After this the feasting, games, wrestling, and other such diversions begin. In the spring, with the appearance of the seals, the sacrifice for the "sea or river" man is arranged, consisting of the solemn throwing of viands into a hole in the ice. On the Amur these sacrifices are made from a boat immediately after the opening of the river; the boats are decorated with sacred shavings, and gay races in them are arranged.

796 The Gilyak have a great number of clan festivals, but
614 the most important of these is the so-called bear festival. This ●628 festival plays a tremendous role in the social life of the Gilyak. In fact, it is not even a clan, but an interclan festival. The [574] clan arranging the festival takes on itself only the expenses and trouble of arranging the festival; the most important role is played by the outside clans invited to participate in it. Since a year does not pass without such festivals occurring in one place or another, assembling representatives of many clans for a number of days, these occasions play the same role in the social intercourse of the Gilyak tribe as the Olympics and other games once played in Greece. The winter bear-festival is called a game (chkhyf-lekhernd -- the bear game).

/94 cont./

*614 clansman who was not avenged or did not receive the honors
775 of the funeral ritual and therefore did not enter the "settlement of the dead," can pass into the clan of the evil deities or simply revenge himself on the clan however he can, on his own responsibility and risk. The same can happen with an offended member of another clan. The struggle with such foes of the clan or their placation is as urgent a requirement for all clansmen as the satisfying of the clan deities-protectors. Thus there arise common obligations with respect to the compensation of the shaman for his labors and dangers in the struggle with such foes, or common expenses and labors for placation, gift-giving, vengeance, payment of blood money, etc.

*614 6. One tkhusind -- common blood-money, ransom, ●628 fine; in the broad sense the mutual guarantee of the whole clan against any encroachment on the rights of a clansman by a member of another clan, and vice versa. By the tkhusind is understood not only the ransom obtained or paid by the clan in matters of vengeance, but also that which is exacted for every possible reason -- from the most serious to the most trifling. Thus, the tkhusind is exacted for the abduction of a woman, for an injury to a woman's honor, for the profanation of holy things, for example, the defilement of the hearth, the violation of a taboo at the bear festival, for theft, etc. In all such situations the mutual guarantee, both for the defense of a right violated by a member of another clan and in answer to a similar violation of a right of the latter by a kinsman, is incumbent on the clan. The ransom, however, is only a recent corrective of a weightier principle -- that of the clan defense, by force, of an injured right of a clansman. At the center of this entire institution lies the principle of blood revenge, the principle of a life for a life or for injured honor (for example, in the detection of a seducer in flagrante delicto).

/95 cont./

*614 It is quite another matter between men of different clans.
●628 Here the principle is implacable: the bones of the clansman must be raised! To raise the bones is the technical term for clan vengeance. Blood must be redeemed with blood, and only in very rare cases can blood redemption be replaced by ransom. This obligation is clearly colored more by a religious than an emotional element. Vengeance is obligatory not only for the contemporaries of the slain man, but, in the event of its non-fulfillment by them, for the two [672] following generations as well. It is obligatory not only in the case of premeditated murder, but for completely accidental murder as well, even one which is only indirectly
*614 connected with one or another person (1). And what is 825
672

> 1. One Gilyak of my acquaintance brought vengeance upon his clan when his rifle accidentally went off when he picked it up from the bottom of a boat, accidentally killing the helmsman.

still more instructive, it is obligatory also with respect to animals. Vengeance upon a bear who has killed a man is no less wrathful than it is with regard to a human murderer.

The ritual of such vengeance is extremely characteristic for understanding the psychology of this clan institution, and we shall begin our analysis with it. As soon as the news of a man's death in a struggle with a bear arrives, the whole adult population hastens into the taiga, in order to catch up with the "murderer" by means of his fresh tracks. If they do not succeed /96/ in catching the real culprit, it is necessary to kill at least three other bears (his "clansmen"). If this is not accomplished during the winter, it is necessary to do it during the summer, and in addition the "mountain man" gives them a "tkhusind," in the form of a plentiful catch of every beast.

/97 cont./

*614 If revenge is sanctified with respect to the bear, a ●628 divine being upon whom welfare depends and who frequently slays a man, not out of malice, but out of love for him, and accepts him into his clan, then revenge with respect to a member of another clan is all the more obligatory.

We have already indicated in the beginning the domination of religious over emotional motives in the imperative of revenge. If vengeance is obligatory to the third generation, if it is obligatory with respect to an accidental slayer, to a friend, a cognate, it is a burden pressing down on the clan rather than an impulsive act inspired by the immediate reaction of anger.

A much more significant role, at least in the sense of the strengthening, so to speak, of this original reaction, is played by compassion for the soul of the slain man and fear of it and the clan gods, gods who keep a loving vigil and for whom the unavenged blood of a clansman is undoubtedly the greatest insult.

775 The soul of a man who died a violent death cannot 766 migrate to the general "settlement of the dead," where it could continue the life it lived on earth. Until it is avenged, until the blood of the slayer gives it the power to raise its bones, it cannot leave the earth and is forced to circle in the air in the form of a bird-avenger, emitting terrible shrieks at night. Its end is frightful; gradually rotting, it finally falls to earth "as ashes," dying forever. The Gilyak call this bird takhch; it is a gray bird with a red beak, "loving war." In this epithet is probably also contained the origin of the belief in the bird-avenger: among the Gilyak war is exclusively /98/ the result of revenge, and, consequently, the birds of prey, "loving war," are obviously the souls of slain clansmen. Over the grave of the slain man, as a fearful memento, they place a stump with the torn-up roots upward (1), to which they

[764]

> 1. Over the graves of those who have died a natural death, the roots are customarily downward.

/98 cont./

775 766 give the appearance of a bird. Sometimes this bird is represented with iron teeth and appendages in the likeness of human feet (2), as in some representations of the swastika.

[126]

2. An example of such a memorial, brought from the lower regions of the Amur by the late acad. L. Schrenck, is preserved in the Museum of Anthropology and Ethnography of the Academy of Sciences in Leningrad.

775 ● 628 * 614 This frightful and at the same time unhappy bird, seeking consolation and return to the kingdom of its departed clansmen, wails of revenge at night and, of course, is quite capable of terribly avenging itself upon its clansmen who have forgotten their obligations.

Even where the affair ends with the payment of ransom, the bird remains unreconciled. Still another peace offering is necessary in the form of a dog, whose heart is given to the bird; otherwise it will take a cruel vengeance on both sides.

Since the soul of the slain man, like every other human soul, cannot exist longer than three generations, the obligations of revenge cease with the third generation. But until that time the pitiful fate of the soul of the slain man continues to torment the conscience of his clansmen and frighten them with the horrors of unfulfilled vengeance, giving them no rest. These same motives are predominant over the immediate instinct for repayment. That is why the wrath of the avengers never reaches to the destruction of the whole clan of the slayer, limiting itself to one, or two or three, of his clansmen; they carefully avoid the slaying of women and absolutely abstain from encroachment on property.

Nevertheless the imperative of vengeance is extremely intensive.

/98 cont./

* 614 ● 628 The news of a slaying in one moment unites all the clansmen into a unanimous whole, acting with feverish energy. A similar fever is manifested willy-nilly by the clan of the slayer. For the latter clan the matter is not merely one of protecting the slayer -- one man can always easily hide and await a peaceful solution of the conflict -- but one of protecting the whole clan, every clansman, for whom insidious attack lurks in every corner at all times and in every place at the hands of the avengers who are feverishly tracking down their victim. For them it is not necessarily the slayer that matters, but every male representative of his clan, even if he /99/ be a suckling babe. That is why mothers, in order to save their male children, at a moment of unavoidable danger are ready to resort to the most frightful expedients in order to disguise the sex of the youngster.

It is not difficult to imagine what both sides go through until the end of the conflict.

* 614 627 628 The most felicitous situation is when the representatives of both hostile clans live in the same settlement. In that case at least there is none of the torment of waiting. The affair is settled by armed conflict immediately after the slaying. The closest kinsman of the slain man, in the company of several armed clansmen, hastens toward the yurts of the clan of the slayer and attacks the first man he meets, to whose defense his clansmen immediately come forward, and then follows a general melee, which ends in several hours, and, if an equal number of victims fell on both sides, the incident is closed. There is also a more felicitous outcome when the representatives of a third clan living in the same settlement intervene in the affair, seeking, frequently not without success, to separate the foes and terminate the matter peacefully.

/99 cont./

* 614 ● 628 72 If the clans live in different settlements, however, there arises a state of war with all its consequences. Moreover, if the villages are located near each other, they place themselves in a full state of siege. There can be no question of routine activities outside the house; there can be no hunting or fishing, for an ambuscade may lie in wait at every corner. In extreme cases the men dare not leave their homes other than with women in front, ferreting in every bush, tramping down the grass, everywhere fearing an ambush. But these can only be palliatives; one fine night it will be necessary to meet the foe face to face in one's own settlement. Finally, where the warring clans live far from each other, it becomes necessary to undertake long expeditions on foot or in boats. This must be an imposing spectacle, when the multitude of warriors, dressed in their finest garments, with glittering spears in their hands and quivers on their backs, with knives and Japanese daggers in their belts, wrathfully brandishing their arms, make the primeval taiga resound with their wailing for revenge and appeal to the gods of all the elements for assistance:

Pal'- khurn myyá! Tly - khurn myyá!

Tol' - khurn myyá! Mif - khurn myyá!

"God of the mountain, hearken; god of the sea, hearken; god of the heavens, hearken; god of the earth, hearken!" -- brandishing their spears and thrusting them at /100/ every tree on their path with the cry: "Chkhar, myyá! -- O tree, hearken!"... But this exuberant mood soon gives way to a more subdued temper; as they draw closer to the enemy settlement, their enthusiasm is transformed into a concentrated seriousness.

The foe has taken his precautions; in his native territory he is more familiar with all the best places for an ambush, and at strategic points he lies in wait in artificial trenches ("little pits"), from which he pours a hail of arrows on the unwary enemy. There is also no lack

/100 cont./

614 of other obstacles in the path of the attackers. In hostile 628 territory all hunting is dangerous (in many clans it is even 562 prohibited, while some also forbid the use of water from the rivers and springs); the supplies brought from home do not last long, while an open, sudden attack -- bearing in mind ambushes and the impunity of the women's sentry duty -- is not always possible. With long patience and severe deprivations they must await the favorable moment or else in desperation resolve to take any risk.

Most frequently the defenders prefer to await the 562 attack in their own settlement. Then, abandoning the female population, which enjoys inviolability, the men gather in a separate yurt, from which, at the guards' first signal of the approach of the foe, they steal through secret passages and gather together beyond the yurts, ready to meet the foe. In accordance with interclan customs, the battle continues through one night or at most twenty-four hours, until, finally, fatalities occur, after which the enemy departs, and the survivors count the number of fallen men on each side. If the defenders have lost a greater number than the opposite side, a new caus belli arises. The attackers must in any case consider themselves satisfied. But the affair does not always end with a few victims. Instances are known where a whole clan perished, and only women remained alive.

There have been cases, on the other hand, where, to avoid the destruction of a small clan incapable of a strong rebuff, the self-sacrifice of one man has expiated the general guilt. I know of one case where, at the very moment that news came of the approach of the foe, a youth responsible for the conflict prayed his clansmen who were gathered about him in the yurt to save themselves by flight, offering to save the clan from destruction by his own death.
And when the clansmen, with downcast eyes, began to leave the yurt, he, quaffing a cup of seal fat at one draught for courage, flung himself headlong, brandishing his spear,
To meet the maddened /101/ throng of avengers.

/100 cont./

000 to meet the maddened /101/ throng of avengers. Chivalry
*614 manifests itself in many other forms. Although ordinarily ●628 the raid of the avengers is too impulsive for people to be 721 able to think about any kind of formalities of attack, [538] epics and legends have preserved many formulas for the declaration of "war" through special intermediaries, about whom we shall speak in more detail later.

The conventional formula laconically declares: "He (the avenger) has irrevocably said that he prepares to come to do battle with thee; if thou art stronger, thou wilt slay him, if he is stronger, he will slay thee -- thus he spoke."

Military expeditions are undertaken for purposes other than avenging the slaying of a clansman. Extremely frequently they are on account of women. "Lovely Helens" are the tragic causes of war among the Gilyak much more frequently even than slayings. The latter are extremely rare and never bear a mercenary character, being exclusively a case of a momentary flare-up on the part of an easily aroused "barbarian" because of a slight offense to his vanity. But conflicts over women are much more frequent.
Either a group of clansmen undertakes a purely romantic raid to abduct the beloved of their comrade. Or expeditions are undertaken with the forcible recovery of the abducted wife of a clansman as their objective -- a more serious incident, because this action is as obligatory for the clan (up to the third generation exclusively) as revenge and blood money for the slaying of a clansman. Customarily they strive to avoid bloodshed, choosing a time for the attack when the men are absent, but the matter rarely ends -- either at the time of the abduction or during the pursuit -- without bloody conflicts, which inevitably bring on the necessity of "raising the kindred bones," i.e., war with all its consequences.

/101 cont./

●628 Now let us proceed to the institution of ransom, "tkhusind," which has in part taken the place of revenge and in part coexists with "revenge," serving as its indispensable corrective.

The reasons that gave rise to the institution of ransom side by side with the imperative of blood retaliation, which was finally squeezed out completely by the former, remain completely unexplained in science to this day.

Among the Gilyak, we believe, it is easy to find at least the principal reason for this great transformation in social relations.
It rests on that special form of exogamy about which we spoke in detail in its place.

*614 /102/ Each clan is bound to a number of clans, at least four, 692 by bonds of the most intimate character. It takes its wives from 628 the akhmal'k clan or clans, and from these clans came its mothers; it gives in marriage its own women, daughters and sisters, to the ymgi clan or clans. These clans, in the natural order of things, are dear to it; mothers, daughters, sisters bind it to them in-separably.

The clan of the slayer can easily turn out to be the one that *614 takes its women from it, in which are its sisters and daughters, or 628 one which provides it with women. Hence the first great modifica-562 tion: the inviolability of women in conflicts of vengeance.

But the role of the women does not end here. If the slayer is from the akhmal'k clan, i.e., the clan from which come the mothers and wives of the avengers, it is not difficult to imagine that these women cannot be indifferent spectators of a war against their own brothers and fathers. If the slayer is from the ymgi clan, the wives of the latter likewise will not lightly reconcile themselves to the destruction of their husbands and sons at the hands of their own fathers and brothers. In both cases the intervention of the women is inevitable, and a few precedents of their pacifying influence suffice to turn the precedents into a lawful custom, at first coexisting with blood revenge and later squeezing it out.

Indirectly the influence of women in this respect must have found expression in still another way, purely mechanical, so to speak.
Their inviolability factually hindered to a considerable degree the realization of blood retaliation itself. Their sentry duty, the

/102 cont./

*614 only one of its kind, must have worn out the foe and weakened his ●628 spirit more than the most active resistance. Utilizing their habeas 562 corpus, day and night they go about the environs in perfect safety looking into every bush, every blade of grass, in search of the enemy in ambush. And if the attackers do not possess an overwhelming number that makes it possible to fall openly upon the expectant enemy, they will never succeed in eluding the vigilance of the inviolable chain of sentries, and the patience of the attackers, worn out by boredom, the march, the torment of waiting, of necessity breaks on the passive resistance of the weaker sex, and the basis for peace has been established.

In order to appreciate fully the importance of the passive [784] participation of the women in the struggle of the clans, it must [724] be kept in mind that in many clans it is forbidden to light a fire on alien territory, /103/ use the water of its rivers and springs, hunt, etc., so that, like the Biblical dwellers of Gibeon, the Gilyak find it necessary to set off on an expedition loaded down with skins filled with water and as much food supplies as a man can carry.
Under such conditions every extra day of waiting threatens death by famine, and thus the vigilance of the women necessarily conquers.

195 Here is one of the examples known to me. In 1851, 30 men
*614 of the settlement of Tebakh set off overland to take vengeance on 628 one of the clans of the settlement of Kol' for the slaying of a 562 clansman. After a long march, and a still longer and more fruitless 724 period of waiting as a result of the vigilance of the women, with poles in their hands, ceaselessly searching the locality, the water in their skin-carriers finally gave out, and the avengers had to depart with nothing and terminate the matter peacefully ... Thus small causes often lead to important consequences.

*614 Tylor was right when he asserted that exogamy weakened the 97 relations between clans and introduced peace, although he pro-[114] ceeded from the mistaken conjecture that the aspiration for peace brought to life the very institution of exogamy. It is true that primitive man is not so sentimental, he is mainly too "god-fearing," that he would sacrifice with a light heart his own fears of punishment for a breach of his blood duty to the voice of feeling, or

/103 cont./

*614 even to his own clear advantage, but he has, as we know, an 771 already tested expedient, with the help of which he pacifies the gods with full observance of his own interest; he resorts, as in other cases, to pious deception of the gods, which offers him the opportunity both to fulfill his religious duty and to derive material *614 gains from the conflict. Usually, this most important religious ●628 procedure of the institution of blood money is completely ignored, 771 and indeed traces of religious ceremonies of reconciliation are not preserved among all peoples, among the Gilyak, as we shall recount later on, this is distinctly clear from the ritual of ransom, which demands a preliminary imitation of blood revenge in the form of a battle between representatives of the warring clans, the killing of dogs, and the feeding of the spirit of the dead man with their blood.

628 Now let us proceed to the practice of this institution.
537 The principal role in the procedure of reconciliation is played 554 by the so-called khlaj-nivukh'i (1).
*614
[192]
[197]

1. I use the term of the more widespread western dialect.

Khlaj-nivukh -- literally: the explaining man, /104/ eloquent, orator. Such a man enjoys special regard in the eyes of the Gilyak, for in his view the eloquent individual is the chosen one of a particular deity who constantly inspires him, dwells in him, and inspires in him beautiful, convincing speeches and an irresistible influence on his hearers. The very quickness of speech, the ability to speak fluently and rapidly for a prolonged time, even apart from the content of the speech, is already considered a talent of the highest order. "His tongue turns like the wings of a windmill," thus, with awe, does the Gilyak characterize outstanding orators. The latter, in turn, regard themselves as chosen [537] ones. On the continent they always carry a wooden rod, on the head of which is carved a human face, depicting, apparently, that deity which inspires them and helps them to convince others. At pathetic moments they wave these threateningly, swearing to break them in the event of the failure of their arguments and bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their intractable opponent.

/104 cont./

●628 Most infrequently the khlaj-nivukh is a chosen one of the gods in 537 other respects as well: he is a rich man, adept in hunting, worldly-554 wise, courageous, has a great natural wit, and enjoys authority
*614 among his fellow tribesmen.

Every clan, every settlement has its own small khlaj-nivukh, but there are celebrities who enjoy extensive fame among many nationalities of the region, and who, when necessary, are sought after, just as renowned lawyers are among us. They perform their functions rather honoris causa, because the customary honorarium -- a Chinese silk costume and a Japanese saber -- can hardly be a recompense to a rich man for the loss of his time and the burden of the obligation. The clothing and arms presented to them serve rather as their insignia magistratus, their official vestment, in which they carry out their obligations during the discussions.

*614 And so, when the clan of the avengers has sufficiently worn 628 itself out in its attempts at a bloody retaliation, or if from the 537 first the slaying took place under conditions easily lending themselves to a reconciliation, then they begin to search for a khlajnivukh who would undertake the negotiations and be able to obtain the most profitable conditions. The khlaj-nivukh must necessarily be from a neutral clan. One may not send a clansman: in the first place, until the reconciliation, it is a sin to have anything whatever to do with the clan of the slayer; moreover, in view of the naturally inflamed feelings of the parties, negotiations through a clansman might end in another slaying.
The other side, in turn, selects its "orator," who is /105/ obligated to defend its interests in the negotiations over the ransom.
Ordinarily the offended side takes the initiative.

One fine day a company of the armed avengers, with their khlaj-nivukh at their head, appears at the settlement of the slayer.
In the adjacent taiga or on the shore of a river the avengers light a fire and make camp, while the khlaj-nivukh in his regalia, with a spear in one hand, a kettle in the other, goes alone to the enemy settlement. Here, in one of the yurts, await the opponents with their khlaj-nivukh at their head... Leaning on his spear, or sitting down and lighting his pipe (only with "his own" fire) he says: "I was sent to tell you that you have killed our man, and what a man! His right arm was worth so many "syalakhr" (1);

/105 cont./

1. The syalakhr is a monetary unit which the Gilyak for some reason translate into Russian by the word "tselkovi;" /one rouble/ and value in our money at three rubles. -- apparently the Chinese customs duty. It is in these units that the Gilyak evaluate their exchange values -- the shagund (see above).

*614 if he were living, would he be content to take that much? 628 His left arm was worth so much, etc." Then all the other 538 parts of the body are listed, and the amount of the blood 436 money is computed. If the opposing side agrees, it lays in the kettle of the orator as many pieces of wood as it has agreed to pay "tselovi." But agreement is never reached at once. The orator of the opposing side seeks to find excuses for the slayer and offers a minimum ransom. Many his opponent, and he wrathfully departs, threatening to break off negotiations. His colleague hastens after him, urging him to make concessions. They sit down, each one lights up a pipe, always with his own fire, they quarrel; again one of them flies into a passion and hastens off, again they come together and return to the settlement... [576] Etiquette demands that an agreement should not be reached at once, but only after stubborn opposition; therefore sometimes two and three days pass in endless meetings and [101] separations. Some khlaj-nivukh on the Amur resort at the [189] last moment, after the manner of the Tungu tribes, to the aid of their magic rods, which they threaten to break and thereby bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their stubborn opponents.

*614 When an agreement has been reached, the religious 628 feature that I mentioned above enters in, the procedure 538 of an imitation of a bloody battle, which is supposed to 536 conceal from the soul of the slain man and the clan gods the peaceful solution of the conflict.

/105 cont./

*614 A procession of the avengers with the khlaj-nivukh at 628 their head sets out toward the settlement of the foe, and 536 out to meet them comes /106/ a similar procession of the clan of the slayer. At a distance of several dozen sagenes from each other, both sides stop, and out comes the closest kinsman with his khlaj-nivukh, and from the other side advances the slayer with his "intermediary," both armed with bows and spears. At a signal given by the khlaj-nivukh'i they begin to shoot arrows at each other or attack with their spears, adroitly dodging the arrows and blows. The duel, of course, is fictitious, although there been instances where the opponents grew excited and the matter ended sadly. All this time the khlaj-nivukh'i pacify their clients [189] insisting on reconciliation. In the meantime the clansmen lead a dog apiece among their opponents and kill them with spears ("blood for blood"). Then the opponents hasten to embrace each other, and peace is concluded. The heart of the slain dog is sacrificed to the bird-avenger (see above), while the meat is eaten at the feast that follows.

*614 Then the representatives of both sides set off for the 628 yurt of the slayer, where the objects constituting the tkhusind are placed -- kettles, spears, sabers, silken materials, and so forth. All the clansmen participate in the payment of the latter, each according to his wealth, considering it a great sin to evade his proportionate share. On the other hand, the acquired tkhusind becomes the common property of the clan of the slayer /sic/. In part it replaces those valuables which were needed for the dead man in the "settlement of the dead"; in part it becomes a fund for the family of the slain man and the clan requirements.

608 The negotiations over tkhusind for other causes, such 537 as, for example, the abduction of a woman, the defilement 554 of sacred things, and so on, are also conducted through the intervention of khlaj-nivukh'i, but without any particular ceremony. The intermediaries judge the moot points in the presence of the assembled people, hear the opinions of those present, and the decision is, as it were, the verdict of the whole gathering.

/117 cont./

*614 But the worst of calamities -- a clansman has been slain!
628 War is inevitable! ... The whole population takes up arms.
701 There is no regular leader, no elder, and no elections. The 182 natural leader has long been known and acknowledged by all; it is the bravest and luckiest of the clansmen, it is the so-called
"master" "ez" -- all eyes are turned toward him!

And in a moment the equal among equals suddenly becomes a military leader, gives orders, distributes weapons, fixes the time of the march, etc., they obey him as they would a dictator.
If this natural leader has died or been killed, everyone knows the one most worthy to replace him.

*614 Suppose a civil dispute has arisen between clansmen or be-628 tween /118/ representatives of different clans. There are no 182 established persons who ex officio resolve disputes and difficulties.
Very often the accuser is himself judge and executor of the sentence. Once the defendant has refused to carry out his obligation of his own free will, the accuser, not stopping to meditate, unhitches a dog from the team of the debtor or climbs into the storehouse in order to take for himself something equal in value to his claim. And the accuser considers this in the order of things. Of course, such a method is not always possible. But even then the affair works out perfectly well without the powers that be. It is enough for the offended party merely to address himself directly or through a khlaj-nivukh (see above) to one or two authoritative individuals-"masters" from the clansmen of the offender, and the matter is very quickly settled. They summon the offender, who is usually escorted by his closest kinsmen, and sometimes by a khlaj-nivukh. Even outsiders gather. From the hearing of both sides and the opinions of those present, an opinion which is accepted by the majority assumes the strength of a verdict. Usually the offender submits voluntarily; otherwise, the managers of the affair proceed to the offender's storehouse and remove an adjudged amount.

/127 cont./ But these ties prove of

*614 particular value in matters of revenge. In urgent cases, when 615 a clan involved in war proves weak, the pandf'y assist it to 621 "raise the bones" and to protect itself against attack with the *628 same selflessness as they show toward their own clansmen.
Only in the payment of tkhusind may the pandf'y not participate. Still more valuable, perhaps, are the matrimonial ties in the matter of the reconciliation of clans, especially when the hostile clans are pandf'y to each other, as not infrequently happens, and we have already expressed in the section on revenge our own belief that the institution of blood money itself, in all probability, owes its origin to the beneficial influence of women and the religio-social bonds which tie together the matrimonial clans.

*614 Such are the relations between the akhmal'k and ymgi clans,
615 relations which broaden the narrow framework of the closed 609 clan and extend its sympathies to a whole series of foreign clans. This is a whole school of social training, a school of benevolence, hospitality, compassion, and, finally, social good-breeding. In this school are formed those social habits and feelings which finally become stronger than interclan ties and are transformed into sympathy for a whole tribe and finally for people in general. The term navkh, which the members of the ymgi and akhmal'k clans of the corresponding generations give to each other, has finally become the customary appellation with which any member of another clan or stranger is addressed. This formal change is none other than the expression of a true and profound change in attitude toward members of other clans.

609 Hospitality, courtesy, compassion -- these are virtues
504 which the Gilyak in reality practice toward all without dis-538 crimination, not only toward tribesmen of other clans, not [157] only toward indigenous neighbors of other tribes, such as the Oroč, the Goldi, and the Ainu, but also toward newcomers, the Tungus, the Yakut, and, finally, the Russians, who have done them so much harm. How often have escaped convicts slain whole families of Gilyak after the most hospitable

/276 cont./

534 Lakkan: Whatever I have, (with it) I am ready to aid thee, 583 although I have nothing.
534 Pevn: If thou hast something, wilt thou not pity me, wilt thou not wish to help?

Lakkan: To this day I have refused thee nothing, is it not so?

Pevn: Of course.

Lakkan: If thou shalt have something, thou wilt have pity on me. Once thou shalt have something, I shall also have, is it not so?

Pevn: If thus hast thou spoken, it gladdens me. Thus in truth thou art ready to give me what thou hast?

Lakkan: What I have, if thou shalt ask, I am ready to give thee.

After this the matchmaker again pours the drinks and, finally, unexpectedly announces: "Thou hast promised to give me what thou hast. Now you have a daughter, I have a son. Let us become akhmal'k."

To this Lakkan replies: "I have already given my word to others."

Pevn: What if you did give your word to another man?
You also gave your word to me before witnesses. I will go to court with you.

After such preliminary negotiations, they proceed to the 583 business negotiations concerning the bride price.
[524] Bride price and dowry. In the Gilyak institution of the bride price, payment for the bride, the term that the Gilyak call this institution is extremely characteristic. This term, I believe, throws light on the very origin of the institution.

194 In the Gilyak language bride price is expressed by the 583 word ar', ar'r from atimmd (?) -- to give as a gift, so that 192 literally ar', ar'r means a present, a gift, which the family or the clan of the groom gives to the family or the clan of the bride. That this term was not formed by chance is shown *628 from the following. In other ritual cases where compensation with valuables is obligatory, for example, in the case of ransom -- damages paid for an abducted woman, for a murdered man -- the term used is ur'kind, which means

/275 cont./
194 "to pay." It is curious that this very word /276/ ur'kind -- "to 194 pay" is derived from the word ur'kind, which in the middle voice 583 is a synonym of ukkskind -- to fight, to war (ijarkind is merely *628 the active voice of this same verb). In other words -- ur'kind was originally an institution of revenge, later replaced by ransom -- peacemaking for a payment of damages. This evolution can still be traced even now in the epos. In one poem written down by me, where the hero has gone to take revenge for his murdered father, they ask him on his return: Pytk ur'kind joylo? -- "Did you fulfill ur'kind for your father (literally ur'kind -- "fulfill"), did you take vengeance?" He answers: "Ah khukhal" -- "I killed them all." Here the term ur'kind is used in the sense of the act of blood revenge. But in another poem the same term is used in the sense of ransom. "Yvn nafkh ur'kim -- "For their (slain companion), they paid damages, ransom."

From all this it is clear that the bride price in its original 583 sense was not at all a payment for the bride, but a gift, although 194 obligatory. But this becomes obvious from the fact that this gift 431 was by no means one-sided. For the father of the bride it was just as obligatory to give, in addition to the dowry, a post-583 wedding gift to the groom, and these gifts of clothing continue in 431 various values for several years, and they were very often no less than the bride price (1). It is considered a disgrace not to

[126]

1. Here is an illustration of the institution of the bride price as an institution of mutual gift-giving, one of many examples which I wrote down. An elder in the settlement of Pomy, a man who was not well-to-do, gave as bride price for his daughter /sic/ two Chinese kettles, one Japanese /kettle/, and five dogs. In exchange, the father-in-law sent his son-in-law two Chinese robes and for two or three

Amur

/286 cont./

117 Settlement of Myshhy!. Ygna (Lang) -- Kugi from Rui (now 103 Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin).
193 Settlement of Lyyvo (third pad'). Dea to Koyma, pure Orayr (Ulcha from Sakhalin), name "long, long ago."

Settlement of Akhcha. Atkhong kugi (Ainu). Came to the Goldi and formed one clan with them (they gave to a Goldi the wife of a dead brother). They, however, live in Tebakh, from which they came to Akhcha five generations ago, as well as to Chil'mi.

Settlement of Tyl'mi. Khok-khal was taken into Kern-
117 khal on account of the war (before the arrival of Russians). Khok-
103 khal killed claiming, an inhabitant of Kal'ma, over a woman.
● 628 Khok-khal was small. Then the murderer said to his kinsmen:
682 "There are few of you; leave me, let them kill me." The Kal'ma people came and surrounded the house. He got through a chumashka with kaloga /Huso douricus/ oil. Then an old man opened a window for him, and he jumped out; the brother killed him from behind with a spear, but he managed (before that) to kill another with an arrow, and again a casus belli. It was then that the Kern-khal adopted Khok-khal and gave it its widow; they broke the fire and bought a bear.

Settlement of Tvarvo at the mouth of Petrovskiy Bay. The 117 Ahrong clan -- Kugi (Ainu), which several generations ago mi-
614 grated here from the south. This clan is also in Tebakh.

Another clan, Narlaf, came from Nyura two generations ago (1896).

117 In Taura, Chil'ba, and Tyr -- the Goldi and the Negda speak
103 their own language. If the father is Goldi and the mother Gilyak, 191 each of the parents speaks to the children in his own language, and the children speak both languages.

In the family of the Gilyak Kando the children for the most part speak Goldi, the easier language (1896).

117 Settlement of Tyr, Tyri. Khal Khok (Hôunchâ) came here
103 and departed. Six generations of it live here. According to a 193 legend, a long, long time ago its clan (Chukchaji on the Amgun)
[614] came from the upper reaches of the Amur. The leading party

/338 cont./

752 784 thank you!" If they do not exchange them, then one of the will drown. After this they become friends. One must resc [572] an alien khal, and even good Russians (not the tramps), but [614] drowned person from another clan is not cremated, but is su [628] rounded with sticks.
[766]

After the rescue and the shavynd procedure, the shama must /339/ carry out his procedure: he sends his spirit kekhn Tol for a small soul, which lies there on a small bed.

When a person who was drowning returns in a boat resc from death, he and his wife must break the old chumashka a make a new one. If it is not broken, husband and wife will 766 A man who drowned or one who was eaten by a bear w [777] be a god.

[776]

A drowned person is placed in a boat; the kinsmen get into another boat and float without rowing; they let the first boat, with the deceased, go ahead, and the deceased is crem where it carries him to the bank. Hooks are used for pulling the body onto the bank. Inau are placed near the place of cremation. When the Tymovsk Gilyak travel to Tro, upon s the inau they throw chukh-chugynd (sacrifices) into the strea

752 A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sa
782 fices a dog to Pal-n'ivukh and makes chukh-chugynd.

/355 cont./ A TRADING CUSTOM AMONG THE GILYAK IS connected with this steel. When a class is divided and part of it migrates to another place, the elders of the clan give the migrant breaks off a half of the steel and hands it over to the elder among the departing clansmen. With this steel the new settlers will light the fire on a new land. Only a part of the steel is to be handed from clan to clan for the same purpose. Hence the expression "to break the fire" came to signify the separation of the clan. This custom reminds us of Greece, where those leaving their native land to found new colonies used to take with them the sacred fire of the home hearth.

Another clan festival is held in the spring before the hunting of the seal. On this occasion, too, the operation of the shaman-ments are borne by the /356/ clan. With the approach of evening, when the moon rises, the entire male population of the clan gathers the women are excluded, given to the weakness. Here, in long rough, they bring all the choicest viands which, carefully prepared, had been left untouched for the moment of the sacrifice. Then, all those present squat down and each throws into the sea a handful first: each tough at a sacrifice to the deity, pronouncing the customary formula of prayer, Pur nimap-ximat (= "God, please!"), after which they gather in one yurt, where the ceremonies begin, in which the women take part.

6. The khlaj-guarantees life and security to each of its members (with inconsiderate as long as the individuals of another khlaj). The means a clan vengeance.

The settling of feuds in the region, it is true, has weakened considerably the efficacy of this institution, but has not destroyed it. Every murder, intentional or unintentional, calls for clan vengeance. The closest clansman of the murderer man -- his father, son, or brother, and in their absence his other clansmen -- must, in the figurative expression of the Gilyak, "raise up the kindred bones" (pu'ny yapnadlu), i.e., kill the murderer or at least some person of the male sex of his khlaj. And the wrath of vengeance is so great that not even two both children are spared. I have heard that the unhappy mothers of such children, out of fear of the avenger, have resorted to /356 cont./ every means to mark the sex of the newborn child. Only women are excluded from acts of vengeance. It is understandable that men the first moment of the murder feel the burden of the burdensome period for both clans. The clan of the murderer lives under a cruel sword of Damocles, awaiting a stroke from any comer, at any time, and in any place. The clan of the slain man feverishly tracks down its victim, who is on the lookout and in any case does not intend to give up his life cheaply. At the same time, in the first minutes immediately after the fateful murder, the clan of the murderer sends some people, a neutral khlaj (neutrality / neutral, a clansman would be killed) to the clan of the murdered man with apologies and an offer of ransom. But not always, and in any case not speedily, the avenger, having overtaken the murderer unit, weary of the unsuccessful hunt, the clan of the avenger consents to a reconciliation.

I shall describe one of the many variants of the procedure for reconciliation and ransom. Each of the hostile clans selects from among their clans a ulu (= "mediator") and a ulu-ximkhlaj (literally, orator -- from the verb "khlaj-yadh" -- to speak, and the noun "ximat" -- tongue, language). The mediators are between the parties. Each clan provides its khlaj-ninyakh with a silk gown, a cap of the same material, bow and arrows, a spear, and tobacco in a Japanese tobacco. It is, so to speak, the official uniform of the intermediaries. One fine day, an armed deputation of khlaj-ninyakh proceeds to the avenger and the khlaj-ninyakh at their head, appears near the hostile settlement. Then, somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, the new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. From here the khlaj-ninyakh of the avenger sets out for the village of the murder, where in one yurt his assembled clansmen (khlaj-ninyakh), with their orator at their head, await the embassy. The latter, having sat down and lighted his pipe (necessarily with his own tiaras), begin to set forth the demands for ransom. The role of the khlaj-ninyakh consists of stipulating as much as possible. The clansmen of the murderer reply with excuses and with a plea for a reduction of the conditions of the ransom. But the khlaj-ninyakh

/357 cont./ of the avengers, stubbornly insisting on his demands, departs in anger. The khlaj-ninyakh of the murderer goes after him and begins to make concessions, and the negotiations continue. More than once the two diplomats seat themselves on the ground and light their pipes, each with his own steel, until they finally reach the camp of the avengers, where the negotiations continue. It sometimes happens that the khlaj-ninyakh move back and forth in this fashion from one camp to another for two or three days. Finally an agreement is reached. Now the company of the avengers begins to draw near the settlement, and out to meet them come the clansmen of the murderer, and the two sides finally stop, facing each other within the distance of a bowshot. From one side, accompanied by his khlaj-ninyakh, the avenger steps forward, in gala attire, with a spear and a drawn bow; from the other step the slayer, also with a drawn bow, side by side with his khlaj-ninyakh. The bow of each adversary is aimed directly at the heart of his enemy... A momentary flare-up -- and blood may flow. But the khlaj-ninyakh of both sides must be always speaking over and over again about peace and forgetting. And this is accomplished. The slayer and the avenger agree on the that minute the avenger has bailed over with wrath and slain his enemy on the spot. Then the adversaries simultaneously throw down their arrows, run up and each other, and embrace. The reconciliation has been achieved, and the clansmen of the avenger, together with the latter, peacefully enter the yurt of the slayer, where the stipulated objects of ransom are laid before the plank beds and where /358/ excellent refreshments have been prepared. In another yurtanet, the avenger and the slayer stand close, facing each other, each with his spear resting against the breast of his enemy, while the khlaj-ninyakh call upon them for reconciliation, each of the clansmen on each side leads a dog between them, and then these animals are killed with spears (blood for blood).

/358 cont./ It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains the variety of the objects of ransom. More than once the two diplomats seat themselves on the ground and light their pipes, each with his own steel, until they finally reach the camp of the avengers, where the negotiations continue. It sometimes happen that the khlaj-ninyakh move back and forth in this fashion from one camp to another for two or three days. Finally an agreement is reached. Now the company of the avengers begins to draw near the settlement, and out to meet them come the clansmen of the murderer, and the two sides finally stop, facing each other within the distance of a bowshot. From one side, accompanied by his khlaj-ninyakh, the avenger steps forward, in gala attire, with a spear and a drawn bow; from the other step the slayer, also with a drawn bow, side by side with his khlaj-ninyakh. The bow of each adversary is aimed directly at the heart of his enemy... A momentary flare-up -- and blood may flow. But the khlaj-ninyakh of both sides must be always speaking over and over again about peace and forgetting. And this is accomplished. The slayer and the avenger agree on the that minute the avenger has bailed over with wrath and slain his enemy on the spot. Then the adversaries simultaneously throw down their arrows, run up and each other, and embrace. The reconciliation has been achieved, and the clansmen of the avenger, together with the latter, peacefully enter the yurt of the slayer, where the stipulated objects of ransom are laid before the plank beds and where /359/ excellent refreshments have been prepared. In another yurtanet, the avenger and the slayer stand close, facing each other, each with his spear resting against the breast of his enemy, while the khlaj-ninyakh call upon them for reconciliation, each of the clansmen on each side leads a dog between them, and then these animals are killed with spears (blood for blood).

/359 cont./ in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack is accidentally made in the morning, when the whole adult male population, armed, /360/ gathered in one yurt. The attack is made suddenly, at the same time in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/360 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/361 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/361 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/362 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/362 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/363 cont./ in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack is accidentally made in the morning, when the whole adult male population, armed, /364/ gathered in one yurt. The attack is made suddenly, at the same time in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/364 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/365 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/365 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/366 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/366 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/367 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/367 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/368 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/368 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/369 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/369 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/370 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/370 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/371 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/371 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/372 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/372 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/373 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/373 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/374 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/374 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/375 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/375 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/376 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/376 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/377 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/377 cont./ clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/378 cont./ against the enemy. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from their childhood, and the children spend much time in other parts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the warrior, after killing one man, also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurt. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for the slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. It is notable another had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, by this attack, considered itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the clearest testimony of the heavy losses they suffered in firework, guaranteed today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than some decorations.

7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopt person from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came to their assistance with the khlaj-of-adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in one battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted as ransom. The adopted individual is accepted into some

/378 cont./ clan,

/654 cont./

428 587 171 000 brothers-in-law none fulfills these two conditions, the becomes free and may marry an outsider if she so desires (3). /655/ In

(113) 3. The custom that the widow of the older brother goes to the younger brother, but the widow of the younger brother becomes free is also found among the Samoyed of the Turukhansk region (Kirovlapkin*, "Etnicesk. ocz./The Yenisei District/", Zap. Imp. Rusk. Geogr. Obshch., 1865, I, Etn. and Stat., p. 178. Tret'iakov*, "Turukhansk. krai/The Turukhansk Region/," Zap. Rusk. Geogr. Obshch. Po etnogr. Geogr., Vols. I, 1869, p. 403). Among the Yakut (Sauer, Kap. Billing's Geogr. astronom. Reise nach den nördl. Geg. Sunland", p. 164), and other Siberian peoples.

928 In 171 principal, therefore, the Gilyak law of inheritance is very similar to that of the Koryak, though still a few degrees more unfavorable for the female sex.

While we saw above that among the Gilyak the paternal 614 607 628 relatives enjoy rights that are not available to the maternal relatives, on the other hand, they also have obligations which the latter do not have and which more than ever characterize them as blood relatives. This obligation appears with the practice of blood revenge prevailing among the Gilyak. Like all primitive peoples, the Gilyak, too, adhere to the principle that every act of bloodshed committed against a human being requires retaliation in likewise bloody fashion, either by himself or by his relatives. And they believe no less firmly that if this requirement is not met, the person or persons guilty of the omission are bound to be punished by misfortune, all kinds of hardship, or even death. This notion, generally widespread among them, exerts a powerful, decisive, and enduring influence upon the behavior of both parties, the active as well as the passive one, in committing acts of bloodshed. It is in the interest of the attacker to commit his act from ambush in as unexpected and startling a manner as possible,

/655 cont./

614 607 628 and then in swift flight to reach a safe hiding place offering protection, in order not merely to escape immediate revenge in this way, but also to make it more difficult or even impossible for the opponent to carry it out in the future and thus expose him to the unavoidable evil consequences of neglected blood-revenge. The Gilyak therefore usually executes an act of bloodshed resolved upon in his heart in the most treacherous manner with the ngguela-dhakho, the large knife which, always worn at the belt, arouses the least suspicion and which he can most easily and inconspicuously plunge into his opponent's side while he is sitting beside him in apparent peace and eating a meal or smoking a pipe. Having fled to his native village, he will henceforth avoid setting foot in the village where he committed the act of bloodshed and will also carefully avoid its inhabitants elsewhere. The victim, however, if he has escaped with his life, henceforth thinks only of how he can take revenge on his enemy without delay, for the more time is wasted, the worse he can expect the consequences of his neglect to be and the more fraught with danger the future looms before him. The power which this constantly nourished superstitious fear can exercise over the mind and the entire being 157 626 of a primitive man was vividly brought to my attention in one case. The Gilyak Nendjan, a respected man in his village (Alfof), who visited me occasionally in Nikolayevsk and to whom I owe many an interesting bit of information concerning his people, was one day, when he appeared before me again after a long interval, in a strikingly downcast and depressed mood. His otherwise erect and quite stately figure, such as I seldom found among the Gilyak, appeared somewhat stooped, his eyes looked straight ahead, staring and sad, and words would not come. Since I would not desist from directing various questions to him, he finally broke out with the words, "I must die soon," and when I then asked whether he was sick and what ailed him, his answer was, /656/ "Not sick, and yet I must die soon." This thought seemed to dominate him completely, and then he told me the following: On a trip to the Manchu, while trading with them, he quarreled with a Gilyak from Kaki. The matter finally ended peacefully, however, and he regarded it as closed and forget it to such an

/656 cont./

159 628 extent that after their return home he once traveled from Alof to Kaki and stopped at one of the houses there. His host and hostess, well known to him, were quite friendly toward him; in the evening, however, after he had eaten the meal offered him, a man lying next to him on the sleeping bench, the very one with whom he had had the quarrel, suddenly thrust his knife into his side. Returning to Alfof, he soon recovered from his wound, but his blood enemy had set out for Langr the following night, accompanied by a relative, and had not been seen again. Meanwhile two years had passed, during which he himself had in vain gone to the greatest trouble to find any trace of him, but he could not go to Langr itself, because from the reverge threatening him, whereas his blood enemy would have the secure protection of his relatives. Thus, even in the future he had no prospect or hope of getting rid of the constant fear of blood revenge weighing upon him, "and therefore," he concluded, "I must die soon." I do not know what happened to him later, for I did not see him again, nor did I hear anything about him. Undoubtedly, however, the psychic condition in which such a superstitious fear of death puts primitive man can have a fatal effect simply through its influence on his physical condition and his behavior in the manifold dangers through which his life moves. And in this way, as well as in consequence of the universally practiced logic of post hoc, ergo propter hoc, the superstition connected with blood revenge is constantly nourished and spread.

614 607 628 Carrying out blood revenge is in part made easier and in part more difficult for the individual because it is not restricted to those who directly participated in the act of bloodshed, but also more or less involves their relatives and imposes certain obligations on them. Among the Gilyak, however, these obligations do not extend to all the relatives, but only to the ngafk, the paternal relatives. Without any qualifications and with all the consequences, they are faced with the obligation for blood revenge if the person concerned lost his life through the act of bloodshed, either immediately or as a result of wounds received, and is therefore no longer able to carry out the revenge himself. It must then be carried out by the son, brother, brother's son,

/656 cont./

614 607 628 grandson, etc., depending on the degree of kinship. No ngafk of the person slain can refuse to accept this obligation if it is his turn. On the other hand, if the person wounded by the act of bloodshed comes away with his life, he can extend the blood revenge remains reserved for him, but his ngafk have the duty to help him by finding out the whereabouts of his enemy, trying to arrange a meeting with him, and helping as much as possible in carrying out the revenge, indeed, if need be, even stepping in for him. Quite similar obligations exist, on the other hand, for the ngafk of the perpetrator of the act of bloodshed. /657/ They must do everything to thwart the designs of their opponents and to protect their kinsman from the revenge threatening him. Thus blood revenge with the demands and obligations growing out of it creates a strong family tie which arouses and preserves the consciousness of solidarity and homogeneousness in all members of the same paternal kin-group. The larger a kin group is, and the stronger this consciousness is in it, the more protection and help it can offer each one of its members. It is therefore understandable that the members of a paternal kin-group like to live in one place or within easily accessible proximity and also that those members who, as children and as a result of a second marriage of their widowed mother, moved away with their stepfather do not like to become estranged (1).

1. See p. 1062 above.

The solidarity of all the ngafk among one another with respect to blood revenge further offers each individual and especially the members of larger kin-groups a certain guarantee against wanton bloody attacks. And this is of no little signifi- 159 cance. The solidarity of

"The Russian occupation [LS closed in a radius of thirty mil smaller one around Korsakovsk

The island is divided into thr and Korsakovsk okrugi. Each o okruzhni nachalnik, over whom great authority, but in his turn oblast.

The biggest prison centre is Timovsk dostroct has two, one forty-four miles, respectively,

Immediately around these ce villages dotted about in the fore

5: of Sakhalin] is practically confined to the dis es from Alexandrovsk on the west coast, and an in the south.
ee administrative districts—the Alexandrovsk,
f these is presided over by a chief of the distric is the military Governor of the island. The lat is subject to the Governor-general of the Pri-A at Alexandrovsk. The next is at Korsakovsk, ar at Derbensk and the other at Rikovsk, thirty-fi by road inland from Alexandrovsk. [117] ntres clearings have been made, and beyond are st, with a population varying from 200 to none

641

641 CITIZENSHIP--conception of the relationship of the individual to the state; territorial versus gentile affiliation; distinctions between citizens and residents, and between different categories of citizens; rights, duties, privileges, powers, and liabilities of the citizen or subject (e.g. civil liberties, franchise, liability to military service); acquisition of citizenship (e.g., naturalization); loss of citizenship (e.g., through serious crime); notions of civic virtues; etc. See also:

Social stratification 56
Justice 69
Immigration 167
Symbolic representations of nationalism and patriotism 186
Forced or indentured labor 466
Taxation 651
Public service 683
Voting 686
Treason 687
Military service 701
Social insurance 745
Ideas about political behavior 829
Legal majority 884

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

177 648 873 Many Nivkhi with secondary schooling enter higher educational institutions. In 1953, 2 Nivkhi attended Leningrad State University, and 10 studied at the A. I. Herzen Pedagogical Institute. At present, 16 Nivkhi are attending the institute. Among the students there are also women. In 1953, Liza Dekhal' of the village of Pad on the Amur graduated successfully from the A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad. The Nivkhi Chuner Taksami of the [463] village of Kal'ma is today doing graduate work at the Institute of Ethnography of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Nivkhi with special training are working today as captains, enginemen on cutters, teachers, librarians and club directors.

177 648 474 The political activity of Nivkhi workers has grown tremendously. Many have risen to leading posts on collective farms and in various institutions; many work as instructors with rayon Party committees and executive committees.

[641] Wide educational work among the Nivkhi has been conducted and is conducted today by the cultural bases established on their territory. The first of these was founded in 1928-29 in the village of Nogliki, at the mouth of the Tym' River in Vostochno-Sakhalinskiy Rayon. The second cultural base of the peoples of the North was founded on Sakhalin in 1946, in the village of Yukovo. These bases have libraries, reading rooms, clubs, seven-year schools for Nivkhi and Evenk children, and also dormitories and boarding schools.

[52] At the amateur concerts on the collective farms, both men and women entertain, singing and performing native and Russian dances. Frequently the songs are created on the spot, impromptu. The collective-farm youth also participate in regional Olympic games.

[545] Theatre arts are also developing among the Nivkhi. In the beginning, the Nivkhi, who had never seen a theatre before the Revolution, were merely spectators at performances organized by Russians. Soon, however, dramatic clubs were organized in the collective-farm clubhouses, and the Nivkhi began to present plays in their own language.

[526] The Nivkhi are great lovers of sports. In former times they did not know how to swim and feared the water. Today the Nivkhi young people enthusiastically engage in water sports. There are now special sports omorochki (canoes) with a single oar, in which young men and women hold speed races.

[182] The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping.

The changed working, living and cultural conditions of Nivkhi life—the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective-farm villages of people who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old ties and rules, based on the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution. The old religious ideas, holidays and rituals have lost all their meaning. The 177 648 greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the Nivkhi woman was timid and oppressed, and knew only the narrow circle of 561 her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. During the early post-Revolutionary years, a great deal of effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to study, many young women and girls were ridiculed by their fr ıers, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their studies. It proved especially difficult to overcome the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. This tent was usually cold and damp. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help.

648

648 INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS--traditional friendships and rivalries with other states; relations between sovereign and dependent powers; determination of foreign policy (e.g., influence of domestic affairs); establishing, maintaining, and breaking diplomatic relations; foreign services (e.g., consular, diplomatic); specialized personnel (e.g., ambassadors, chargés d'affaires, military attachés, consuls); prerogatives (e.g., diplomatic immunity); activities of consuls and diplomats; transmission of intelligence and diplomatic messages; negotiation of treaties, military alliances, foreign aid programs and trade agreements; economic sanctions (e.g., embargoes); adherence to international conventions; international law; peaceful settlement of disputes between states (e.g., arbitration, special peace tribunals); relations with international political organizations (e.g., United Nations); international power politics; peacetime espionage; etc. See also:

War 72
Codes and ciphers 202
Foreign trade 439
Travel 484
International sports 542
Behavior toward strangers and aliens 609
Informal intergroup justice 628
Dependencies 636
Punishment of espionage 687

1: Shternberg--171 E-5 (1890-1897,1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak R

/111 cont./

*614 [167] Thus in the settlement of Kol' there are clans which bea designations, Tyvli-fing (inhabitants of the settlement of Ty M'yekhre-fing (inhabitants of the settlement of M'yekhri), N fing (inhabitants of the settlement of Nyenkhay), etc., altho representatives of these clans have lived for a long time in th above-mentioned settlement of Kol', having broken all their with the primordial abode of their ancestors (1). The only cl [171] 1. Similar territorial designations among the Australians were the reason that Kunov came to the completely unfounded conclusion that among these tribes there is no clan organization.

that have true clan names are those founded by emigrants fro
the neighboring Tungus tribes; thus were formed such clans the Tskharnung, the Choril, etc. And it is noteworthy that i just these clans we observe a clear transition to totemism. I the Negda tribe, for example, almost every clan traces origin from one or another kind of animal (tiger, toad, bear, etc.). Among the Gilyak such phenomena are very rarely en countered.

*614 177 648 622 /112/ Now let us proceed to what for the European is the important sign of clan unity -- to the organs of power. How complex, as we have seen, clan life is, the clan does not kn any established authorities. True, the Chinese, and after th the Russians, sought to establish among the Gilyak the institu of elders, and at that not clan but settlement elders, but it h no relation to the life of the clan. This was a nasty episode, that was all. The elders designated by the Russian authoritie were selected, not from among the best or even the wealthie inhabitants, but from the most officious ones, and these not only did not enjoy any authority, but rather scorn, and in som *614 instances even hatred. The primordial structure of the clan knew nothing of the kind. The patriarchal authority which, cording to the Biblical examples, is ordinarily associated wit

wes--314 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
31 Russia
3

vsk, our destination, is the cnetre of administration of the Timovsk okrug, one three districts into which the island is divided. The most prominent buildings are ne wooden church, built by the convicts, a large prison, and the house of the chief. official ranks as the third or fourth man on the island, being responsible, like his er officers of the Alexandrovsk and Korsakovsk okrugi, to the Governor only."

6

634 DISTRICTS--politic bracing a number of English or American (e.g., executive, a (e.g., appointment, prerogatives, functi

34

al organization of moderately extensive territories em-settlements or municipalities (e.g., a subtribe, an county, a French department); governmental personnel visory, administrative, legislative); mode of selection election, hereditary succession); jurisdiction, authority, ons, and activities associated with each position; etc.

Goldi RX3
Gilyak RX2

Go

177 The Soviet authorities transferred the Udege from the isolated huts
166 which were scattered over a wide area to larger compact settlements. This brought them within the range of medical attention and educational facilities. As a result of this contact with Soviet Russian culture, the young generation of the Udege now speak the Russian language 'almost without any accent'.[38] The next step in the development of the Udege will be that they will forget their own native tongue, and soon 'the last of the Udege' will really have disappeared.

THE NIVKHI

Gi

131 Near the mouth of the Amur is the National District of the Nivkhi.
161 They number just over 4,000, of whom 1,700 live in Northern Sakhalin, 101 and the rest on the Soviet Far Eastern mainland and on three small islands lying off the mouth of the Amur. These islands, Udd, Langr and Kevost, were ignored by the Soviet authorities until 1936, when the famous Russian pilots Chkalov, Baidukov and Belyakov, landed on Udd Island during their trans-polar flight. From that moment the islands became very popular. They were renamed after the three pilots, [167] and it became almost a Russian patriotic duty to develop and colonize the little archipelago. The Soviet Far Eastern fishing industry established [228] a plant there, and Russian workers' settlements were built on both Chkalov and Baidukov Islands, which had previously been inhabited exclusively by Nivkhi.

186 The Nivkhi of the Asiatic continent are very conscious of the fact that,
798 together with the Nivkhi of Northern Sakhalin, they form one single people. Accordingly, under pressure of persecution by the Soviet authorities in the late 'twenties', the Shamans of the mainland Nivkhi fled to their kinsmen on Sakhalin. But these Shamans only fell out of the frying-pan into the fire, because of the activities of the local anti-religious fanatics. In 1930 the League of Militant Godless in Northern Sakhalin even destroyed the Nivkhi cemetery in an attempt to cure the 'natives' of their religious prejudices. This action caused considerable unrest among the Nivkhi, who lodged a complaint with the authorities. The latter apparently condemned the 'left-wing excesses' of the Sakhalin atheists.[39]

● 634 In theory, the Sakhalin Nivkhi live in two National Districts, the 161 'Western Sakhalin National District', and the 'Eastern Sakhalin National District' which, together cover a large part of Northern Sakhalin. In point of fact, both National Districts have been completely fictitious right from the beginning of their existence. The so-called Western Sakhalin National District, for instance, had, in 1933, only a few hundred natives among its 17,000 inhabitants.

9: Hawes--314 I-3 (1901) 190
116, 631
636.63

"Rikovsk, our destination, is the cnetre of
of the three districts into which the island
the fine wooden church, built by the convic
This official ranks as the third or fourth m brother officers of the Alexandrovsk and K

03 Gilyak
Russia

administration of the Timovsk okrug, one is divided. The most prominent buildings are ts, a large prison, and the house of the chief.
an on the island, being responsible, like his orsakovsk okrugi, to the Governor only."

636.17

him at Ayan [Okhotsk Sea]; and when on the Baikal hove in sight, Muravyof went When near enough to be heard the gover shouted back: 'God helped us. . . we have Sakhalin is an island. It is possible to e by seagoing vessels either from the nor

From 1849 to 1855 Nevelski and other Russian the waters and harbors of the Amur and Sakhali sailed into the Amur from the north in [264] 185

517. Barsukof, I. Count Nikolai N. Mu

518. De Sabir, C. Le Fleuve Amour, 6

boat Wostok, coming from Japan, entered the r These important discoveries were known to was maintained for fear of exciting China and a the morning of September 3, 1715, out in a small boat to meet her.

nor called for news, and Nevelski accomplished our important task. . .
enter the gulf and the river Amur
th or the south.'

n officers were exploring and charting
n. A channel was found, and the Baikal
0. (517) Three years later (518) the gunraveef-Amurski, vol. i, 274.

3.

iver from the south.
very few people. The greatest secrecy rousing the hostility of other countries,

636.17

"Russia's success on the Amur is due Nicolai Nicolaewitz Muravyof-Amurski.
Muravyof set about extending Russia's p burg he selected Nevelski, a sea captain to help him carry out his plans. Throug Russian Government to undertake a secr to explore the northern part of Sakhalin, and the gulf and mouth of the Amur. (515

515. Barsukof, I. Count Nikolai

in Kamchatka, and, as soon as he discha carefully surveyed and charted the north no longer able to find a channel for his s his southward course to the mouth of the his achievement, he pushed on still farth
Broughton, thus proving most convincing

516. —Ibid., vol. i, 198, 222-224

in large part to one of her great statesmen, Appointed governor-general of Siberia in 1847, ower on the Pacific. Before leaving St. Peters-in the service of the Russian American Company, h his efforts Nevelski was commissioned by the et expedition with the following objects in view:
the strait between Sakhalin and the mainland,
) Early in the spring of 1849, Nevelski arrived

N. Muraveef-Amurski, vol. ii, 37.

arged his cargo, he sailed for Sakhalin. He ern point of Sakhalin and the Amur Gulf. When hip Baikal he went into a small boat and continued Amur which he entered. Not yet content with her south to the most northerly point attained by gly that Sakhalin is an island and not a peninsula. (516)

. Muravyof was anxiously waiting for 636.17

particularly England. (519)

519. Muravyof suspected an
He accused her of desiring t Pacific and to deprive Russi that England had designs on In 1853 he predicted that the ican possessions, and sugge
the United States and Russia N. Muraveef-Amurski, vol.

d dreaded England above all other nations.
o become the leading power in the North a of all influence and power. He believed the Amur and that her ships had been there.
United States would secure Russia's Amersted that an alliance should be formed between against England [Barsukof, I. Count Nikolai i, 323; vol. ii, 38, 46, 55]."

636.27

"Many of the peoples of these northern c stance the Yakuts, who manufacture a spir sidered an exception. There is, however, them from the 'burrs' of birch-trees. The of the wood, of the size of a lump of sugar beverage. The decoction is sweet to the ta the organs of respiration.

To-day Russian vodka, though prohibite and frequently obtained."

limes make intoxicating beverages, as for i it from toadstools. The Gilyaks may be con-a decoction, but little heard of, made by se exude a black juice so strong that a piece , is sufficient to make a big cauldron of the ste, and has a welcome softening effect on d by the Government, is eagerly sought after 636.62

"The Gilyak on Sakhalin. . . . . wi European. The chief causes of the dy narrowing limits of their hunting-gro inability to adapt themselves to anoth being forced upon them. The Governn recognizes them as Russian subjects, organization, and prohibits the sale c but hardly to be expected from officia is a patriarchal government which sh conditions."

ll surely die out with the further inroad of the ing out of the natives is [LSS: sic] disease, the und, the decay of the spirit of the race, and thei er mode of living which is gradually but surely nent's attitude towards them is a 'correct' one.
, interferes as little as possible with their scant of intoxicants to them. What is really required no ls whose function is the safeguarding of criminal all interest itself in the race and its changing

/248 cont./

Chekhov's imagination it is not hard to recreate even the form of the migration. Even at the present time the Amur Gilyak are in the habit of setting out for Sakhalin in their heavy boats each autumn to hunt for sable. Some travel to Agnevo, others to Mauko, still others further to the south. The sable in their homeland is incomparably better than the Sakhalin one, but he is so rare and those who hunt him are so many that the Gilyak prefer to leave their family hearths for as long as six months and to subject themselves to all the dangers of a thousand-vent sea voyage, driving toward those tempting areas where the population is sparse and sables may be killed by the hundreds. In early spring, loaded with their rich catch, they return to their distant hamlets. These journeys to the south of Sakhalin are of a comparatively recent origin. As late as one hundred years ago the ancestors of the present-day sable hunters did not travel beyond Tymovsk and the Tymovsk and at that time the Vast River was the northernmost point of their hunting. There is no doubt at all that in former times sable-hunting expeditions set out even farther to the north. We have been some reasons which compelled the Amur Gilyak to travel farther and farther away from their homeland and finally to transfer the center their hunting activities to the very south of Sakhalin, where the sable is quite poor and where their ancestors had been forced to buy from the Ainu the hunting territories which they now use. /249/ The reason is to be found in the gradual settling of northern Sakhalin by Gilyak from the continental coast. Originally, the ancestors of the contemporary Sakhalin Gilyak, like the Amur Gilyak of the present day, traveled to Sakhalin in companies of hundreds only in the season for sable hunting. Here they set their numerous traps on the banks of some stream and placed snares along the natural game trails in the forest, or crossing from one side of the river to the other. It is not surprising that an annual pilgrimage to the same area for hunting ended in permanently settling on this island with its game.

1; Shternberg--499 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX5 Gilyak RX2
Sakhalin

/249 cont./

Northern Sakhalin was especially favorable for resettling of a interesting fact only the northern part of the island is called Sakhalin by the Gilyak, which is additional evidence as to whence and in what direction the settling of Sakhalin proceeded). In the first place, the place were the place closest to the continent: half a day to a day's trip between the shores of the strait. Moreover, in addition to an abundance of sables in northern Sakhalin, the Gilyak from the continental coast found other living conditions completely identical with those on the continent; the same abundance and rich variety of fish (Siberian salmon, kalaga Atlantic herring, the Pacific of salmon, ~~сиг~~, etc.), an abundance of seals and dolphins. The Amur Gilyak were the only ones who found it disadvantageous to leave the banks of their homelands. These journeys to the south of Sakhalin are of a comparatively recent origin. As late as one hundred years ago the ancestors of the present-day sable hunters did not travel beyond Tymovsk and the Tymovsk and at that time the Vast River was the northernmost point of their hunting. There is no doubt at all that in former times sable-hunting expeditions set out even farther to the north. We have been some reasons which compelled the Amur Gilyak to travel farther and farther away from their homeland and finally to transfer the center their hunting activities to the very south of Sakhalin, where the sable is quite poor and where their ancestors had been forced to buy from the Ainu the hunting territories which they now use. /249/ The reason is to be found in the gradual settling of northern Sakhalin by Gilyak from the continental coast. Originally, the ancestors of the contemporary Sakhalin Gilyak, like the Amur Gilyak of the present day, traveled to Sakhalin in companies of hundreds only in the season for sable hunting. Here they set their numerous traps on the banks of some stream and placed snares along the natural game trails in the forest, or crossing from one side of the river to the other. It is not surprising that an annual pilgrimage to the same area for hunting ended in permanently settling on this island with its game.

1; Shternberg--500 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX5 Gilyak RX2
Sakhalin

/250 cont./

Mauko reached them also and installed elected starosti. There are such starosty, for example, in Tangui. It was from the Mauko that the Gilyak used to obtain all those objects which they could not produce themselves.

I shall not at that time enter into the question of how long the Gilyak have inhabited the island. I shall only say that when they first appeared there they must have been in possession of the entire economic inventory which they possess at the present time (with the exception, naturally, of firearms). Needless to say, the Gilyak could not have existed on Sakhalin without sledi (snowshoes), without trained sled dogs, and without iron tools, etc. His first cultural products must have appeared on the island as soon as they were especially favorable, at least with regard to fishing. It may be that the island first was such a cradle.

The Sakhalin Gilyak, unlike their fellows on the continent, have taken many very basic things from their civilized fellows. They have replaced the bow with the gun, their dishes made of wood and birch bark with metal kettles. They forge iron and artfully work with carpenters' and cabinetmakers' tools. They build yurts in the Manchu style and make stoves and tremendous ovens in the Russian manner. They master japanese sabers and the more expensive spears decorated with silver inlays. They wear robes and short trade of Chinese and Russian fabrics. They drink tea and smoke tobacco. They also have a special variety of potato. They have finally begun to plant potatoes. In the near future they may, perhaps, completely adopt the culture of their civilized neighbors. On what did they stop in their own independent cultural development?

Of all the borrowings made by the Gilyak, the use of iron is the most important and the oldest. Because of their remoteness from the centers of civilization, however, it has come to them in an extremely limited form. They not only do not know how to smelt iron, but are incapable of making tools. Iron is certainly iron itself was very expensive among them. Their boats and sledi do not contain a single iron nail, though the Gilyak

1; Shternberg--533 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX5 Gilyak RX2

/327/

Property. Among the Gilyak the notion of real property exists, although not in such a strictly individualistic sense as among civilized peoples. The territory of a settlement consists of the customary fishing sites, as well, as the stream, and the bank, along which they hunt sables. But the Gilyak never make any claims to nearby territory which they themselves do not use. In the first place, the sable is the property of people who recognize their rights to the streams and the nearby taiga where they set their traps, the Gilyak have freely permitted Tungus from the remote Gilyak settlement. A few individuals inhabit sable wisdom at Nikolayevsk, and it is enough to enmesh whole settlements in deceit and to breed imitators and a whole man of intermitable lawsuits. Moreover, the Gilyak were not particularly zealous in exerting authority within the clan, are becoming powerless when the quarrel is between members of different clans. The Gilyak are not particularly strong among the Gilyak of that clan which first settled near these streams and used them, and these streams, their tributaries, and separate extensions pass by inheritance and are divided among sons on the same principle as other kinds of real property among us. Moreover, if a stream is bequeathed to be shared among several brothers, the co-inheritors take turns using it through the year. It is worth of note that sables, being the remote divided among the brothers and clammen greatly vary in value with relation to the advantages of hunting, they are never re-allotted, but remain at the continual disposal of the same people. It is possible that the reason for this phenomenon is the fact that younger brothers in certain cases enjoy advantages in the matter of inheritance. On the other hand, fishing sites are not held in such absolute possession. Where the god has been lavish, the Gilyak does not consider himself justified in fencing off this bounty exclusively for himself. The Gilyak is not in the habit of lying in the hay of or eating and not giving to others. Very often the Gilyak move from one settlement to another or from one place to another for fishing tools. Land is not certainly iron itself was very expensive among them. Their boats and sledi do not contain a single iron nail, though the Gilyak

1; Shternberg--545 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX5 Gilyak RX2

/383 cont./

and other objects. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from childhood, and the children are shown the uphills with passion to this noble exercise, even by moonlight on frosty winter nights. In their civil relationships, as a general rule, the Gilyak display great activity, fidelity to their word, and conscientiousness. /384/ Unfortunately, the destructive influence of the rascally population of the Amur region has begun to extend even to the most remote Gilyak settlements. A few individuals inhabit sable wisdom at Nikolayevsk, and it is enough to enmesh whole settlements in deceit and to breed imitators and a whole man of intermitable lawsuits. Moreover, the Gilyak were not particularly zealous in exerting authority within the clan, are becoming powerless when the quarrel is between members of different clans. The Gilyak are not particularly strong among the Gilyak of that clan which first settled near these streams and used them, and these streams, their tributaries, and separate extensions pass by inheritance and are divided among sons on the same principle as other kinds of real property among us. Moreover, if a stream is bequeathed to be shared among several brothers, the co-inheritors take turns using it through the year. It is worth of note that sables, being the remote divided among the brothers and clammen greatly vary in value with relation to the advantages of hunting, they are never re-allotted, but remain at the continual disposal of the same people. It is possible that the reason for this phenomenon is the fact that younger brothers in certain cases enjoy advantages in the matter of inheritance. On the other hand, fishing sites are not held in such absolute possession. Where the god has been lavish, the Gilyak does not consider himself justified in fencing off this bounty exclusively for himself. The Gilyak is not in the habit of lying in the hay of or eating and not giving to others. Very often the Gilyak move from one settlement to another or from one place to another for fishing tools. Land is not certainly individuals, i.e., one-sixth of the adult population, make the trip to Nikolayevsk. The settlements richest in seals and dolphins are Tamiyvo, Vishvo, Pomr, and Tangi; this last is the company, which, in addition to the others. Potatoes are raised by the Gilyak in Khoe and Tangi. In the settlement of Tyki, the Gilyak have made a request concerning the settlement among them of at least one Russian with whom they could plant potatoes. The settlement of Tyki should be mentioned for several other reasons. In the first place, starting from this point the Gilyak are ceasing to hunt sables because of the intensifying competition from the Tungus who have killed off the sables in the vicinity of the settlement and now pursue them on their reindeer. In the second place, starting from this point, the Gilyak were successful in hunting wild deer and sables. In the second place, beginning at this settlement one notices a progressive improvement in the Gilyak dwellings, which are built in the form of small huts of different clam for the resolution of mutual disputes. But at the present time this institution is losing its strength, since the Russified Gilyak, who are simultaneously the chief cultivators of land lawsuits, deny to it respect and competence. The Russian administration is going to impart authority to this court of "wise" and honorable men in mentioning the "Gilyak-Orochi" by election, regulating the time of their meetings, the area of their authority, etc. And a first condition is that the "Ishay-orinkhi" be of various clans. Tymovsk is the place where the Gilyak are able to elect men intelligently and to appreciate the importance of the elected court sanctioned by the Russian administration.

To make some money,

V

Statistical Data

In conclusion, in order to provide some idea of the number of Sakhalin Gilyak and to present their economic status more

2; Schrenck--216 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1886 RX5 Gilyak RX2
Gold, RX3 Tungus RX5

/105 cont./

3. (cont.)
Grundzüge einer tungusischen Sprachlehre nebst kurzem Wörterverzeichniss /Principles of a Tungusic Grammar with a Short Vocabulary/, ed. by A. Schiefner, St. Petersb. 1856.

However that may be, gur becomes kil in the Chinese pronunciation, and I have heard the Chinese pronounce the name "Samagir" as "Sama-kil." Likewise the names of the other above-mentioned Tungusic peoples, the Ainu and Japanese, indicate that it seems to me not unlikely that they made this common ending into a collective name for all these peoples of the northern and lower Amur regions, just as the other Amur peoples, in their more essentially different Gilyak. From Kil and Kileng, however, arose, as was shown above, the Russian designation Kilgak and Gilyak. And then there arose the Gilyak-Orochi (1789). Perhaps strange fact that the collective name for a number of almost exclusively Tungusic tribes, which arose from the distortion of a Tungusic word by the Chinese, is adopted by the Russians and the one people who throughout the entire lower Amur region is not Tungusic in origin.

After this digression we now return to an examination of the historical accounts concerning the habitation sites of the Amur peoples, and first of the Gilyak. Very soon after the Russians learned of the existence of the Gilyak, they became acquainted with them themselves. During the years 1644 and 1645, on their first expedition into the Amur region, under Vasilij Pojarkof /Poyarkov/, they traveled throughout the region of the Gilyak on the Amur. Only after a four-days' trip down the Usuri -- which Pojarkof, by the way, thought was the upper Amur -- did the Russians encounter the Gilyak for the first end. who will be discussed later, the Natken (Natki) followed, and after them the Gilyak, who, as the report states, occupied the lowermost part of the Amur River to the sea. The Russians went through the areas of the latter two peoples in 14 days for each of them, until he reached the mouth of the Amur, where the late season obliged him to winter over. At what place among the Gilyak this first wintering of the Russians occurred cannot be ascertained with certainty: perhaps on the left bank of the Amur at Cape Tschuyrach, or Tschchyrkach, as the Gilyak themselves call it. for there in the ground overgrown with dense forest and strikingly luxuriant underbrush I saw envenemes which could very well have been the remains of former earth huts. In the summer of 1645 Pojarkof went from there to the sea and along the coast up to the Ulja /Uljа/ River, which he /108/ reached after twelve weeks and on which he again wintered. not to return to Yakutsk until the following year (1). No details, however, are known concerning this sea

1; Schrenck--217 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1886 RX5 Gilyak RX2

/105 cont./

(1) 1. Miller, Samml. Russ. Geschichte, Vol. II. 1758, p. 302. The name, "Nachtiffden von dem Amur-Fluse." in Blähing's Magazin für die neue Historie und Geogr., Part 6. Hamburg, 1778, p. 1786. Cf. also Fischer, Sibir. Gesch., Vol. II. 1768, pp. 788, 789. For Pojarkof's original report, see Dopolnenie k aktam istoricheskim, sobr. i izdanns. arkheograf. Kommissiey /Supplements to the Historical Documents Collected and Published by the Archeographic Commission/, St. Petersburg, 1848. Vol. III. p. 55 (the pertinent place in the report).

(2) voyage. I shall also give here the reports of Pojarkof's successor insofar as they pertain to the Gilyak and their immediate neighbors, in order to compare the statements and add a few remarks concerning them.

In 1651, Jerofei Chabarof /Khabarov/, going down the Amur by boat, entered its lower course. Chabarof was still Djutschoren living at a distance of a seven-days' journey from the Sungari, and then at a large village located on a mountain on the right bank the Atschan (Achan) people began to appear, whose territory. several days' journey farther down. Chabarof

1; Shternberg--541 E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX5 Gilyak RX2

/383 cont./

2; Schrenck--145 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1886 RX5 Gilyak RX2
Historical Manchuria, A62

/71 cont./

1. (cont.)
kraie /An Expedition in the Amur Region/" (Morsk. Sborn., 1859, No. 2, Unofficial Part, p. 334 and other).

Nothing is known of the Gilyak, who live in the lower Amur, sparsely populated bank of the Amur and also the left one from its last bend to the east is closed to them. Chinese -- Manchus -- as we shall see -- zealous traders themselves, nevertheless permit no Chinese to enter their territory, perhaps out of the just fear that the natives will learn the way for the raiders. On the basis of their own experiences on their trading trips to the Sungari, it is natural for them -- the Gilyak -- to regard the Manchu and Chinese, in the same way as the other Amur peoples, as identical with respect to political power and ruling position, -- though they distinguish between them with regard to nationality. They also see no great difference between the Chinese with the name of "Manchu" -- a circumstance that gave rise to much confusion concerning these peoples on the part of travelers (2).

2. For example, Orloi (cf. Tishmen'ev", Itor. obozr. obsaz. Ross.-Amer. Kompi., St. Petersburg, 1863, Part II, p. 84 and others), Tschichatschof (Tichmenjef, op. cit., pp. 89 ff.), Berezin (ibid., pp. 91 ff.), Anachinsk ("Eksp. v" Ameriku," Morsk. Sbornik., 1859, No. 1, Unofficial Part, pp. 115-118, 125, 126; No. 2, Unofficial Part, pp. 332 to 337; No. 3, Unofficial Part, p. 190, etc.), and others constantly refer to the Chinese Manchus from the lower Amur (Gilyak, Orochi, Tungus) as "Manchu." The same is done by Fargatschefskij /Pargachevskii/ ("Poezdka izum. prirody" ibid., Part I, Ann. "Vestn. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch.", Part XXI, 1858, Sec. II, pp. 161, 169) with

/106 cont./

175 stopped on September 29 and at a place on the left bank where there was a large village he erected a fort, Atschanksi gorod, for a wintering place. From there one could supposedly by a 131 ten days' journey reach the Gilyak, who lived all the way to the sea and around it (2). Chabarof, however, did not visit them.

2. Müller, Samml. loc. cit., pp. 320 ff; Fischer, op. cit., pp. 808 ff.; Dopoln. k" aktam" istorich., Vol. III, pp. 364, 368.

but in the next spring, after successfully enduring the siege of his fortress by the Djutscheren and Atuchanen, set out again upstream with his expedition. On the way, however, presumably in the region of the mouth of the Sungari, he missed the Cossack Iwan Nagiba who had been sent to look for him and to inform him of the arrival of a fresh supply of men and ammunition on the upper Amur. Nagiba and his small company of 28 Cossacks and volunteers went down the Amur from Bambalajev gorod (above the Deeja /Zeya/) for four weeks; then they heard from a captured Natken that Chabarof was farther 175 downstream among the Gilyak. They retained this man as a 648 guide. but after another journey of three weeks they found themselves so surrounded in the middle of the river by a crowd of Gilyak boats that they could not move forward or backward. For two and a half weeks they remained in this position, anchored in the river, until finally hunger and despair forced them to break through the ranks of the beseigers and make their way to a nearby village, where they confiscated some fish that was hanging out in front to dry. They were able to do this, however, only after a stormy battle in which more than 30 Gilyak died. Three days later they found themselves at the mouth of the Amur (3). Hard pressed by the Gilyak there as 114 3. Acc. to Müller, op. cit., pp. 328 ff. Here Müller gives June 28 as the date of Nagiba's arrival at the mouth of the Amur.

/106 cont./

175 3. (cont.)
648 and at another place (Büching's Magaz., Part 2, p. 508, July 2 (three days after the 114 Day of Peter and Paul), which however cannot be correct if the trip. as is said previously, started on May 4 and -- putting together the above-mentioned periods of time -- lasted ten weeks. In Fischer (op. cit., p. 837) it is said instead toward the end of July, which, however, would be somewhat too late according to that reckoning. In the detailed and rather drastic account by the Cossack Iwan Uwarof, a participant in the expedition 113 (see Dopoln. k" aktam" istor., Vol. III, pp. 354 ff.) almost all these details are lacking except the date of departure (May 4) and the statement that after traveling for ten days they already found themselves amidst many Djutscheren and Natkem, who thereafter kept attacking them and gave them no peace; the siege by Gilyak vessels on the Amur is said to have lasted only two weeks.

195 well and unable /107/ to make the return trip upstream, they 648 built themselves a larger vessel and began the sea journey along the coast to the north. On the thirteenth day after their departure (1). however, the vessel was crushed by drifting ice (2).

1. According to Uwarof's report (op. cit., p. 355), on the tenth day.

2. Müller (op. cit., p. 330) considers drifting ice in the Sea of Ohhotsk as inconceivable at that time of the year. On the other hand, thanks to the experiences of Middendorff, Starizkij, and

/107 cont./

175 2. (cont.)
648 others, we know that it is a characteristic 114 feature of that northwestern corner of the Sea
133 of Ohhotsk. See the present work, Vol. II.
113 p. 756 and my "Strömungsverhältnisse im Ochotskischen und Japanischen Meere /Currents in the Sea of Ohhotsk and the Sea of Japan/" (Mém. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St.-Pétersb., Ser. VII. Vol. XXI. No. 3). p. 10.

195 during which they lost their entire supply of food and ammuni-
648 tion and only after much hardship succeeded in saving their lives. They continued on foot for five days along the seacoast, living on roots, berries, seatang, seals, and whatever else the ocean washed up (3). Then they built a new vessel. with which 114 3. Fischer (op. cit., p. 818) also mentions walruses, as does Uwarof's account.

136 but it is well known that there are none in the Sea of Ohhotsk; this is probably a reference to whales, which abound in this sea.

in 14 days. by rowing they reached the Utschlada River, on which Gilyak and Tungus lived. They stayed there until December 15 whereupon they continued their journey inland and after 14 days, or, according to other information, after four weeks, came to the Tugur River, on which they found a large Tungus population with abundant food. The following spring, 1653, Nagiba went down the Tugur to its mouth and from there, with five men, started the return trip to Yakutsk along the sea and then across the mountains, while he sent back the other men under Iwan Uwarof in order to build among the Tungus on the Tugur a "Jassaschnoje Simowje," that is, a winter hut for collecting tribute (1).

/107 cont./

195 4. Curiously Uwarof says in his account 114 that he sent Nagiba with five men, whose 113 names he gives, to Yakutsk, while elsewhere he constantly refers to Nagiba as the leader of the expedition.

The next and last contact of the Russians with the Gilyak
195 648 which we know about from this period of the first Russian mili-114 tary expedition into the Amur region took place under Chabarof's successor, the Cossack Onufrij Stepanof. The latter had already spent the winter of 1653/54 in Djutscheren territory. In the neighborhood of the Gilyak" (5). In the fall of 1655, with the 113 5. Müller, Samml. loc. cit., p. 343. In Stepanof's report to the Yakutsk voivode, Michail Lodyzhenskij (Dopoln. k" aktam" istor., Vol. III, p. 524), it is said "v" Dyuchenskoi zemlie, ne doplyv" Gilyatskie semii, that is, in the country of the Djutscheren, above the Gilyak country.

"Syn bojarskoi" Fedor Puschtschin who had been sent from Yakutsk in the meantime, he again went into the lower Amur region, and this time beyond the Djutscheren to the Gilyak bordering them (6). Shortly before, the latter had killed a company of 30 Yakutsk Cossacks, who had reached them by land from Ohhotsk, and were now punished for it by Stepanof. Moreover, he built an ostrog /fort/ among them, to which, because of its position on a mountain slope, he gave the name Kosogorskoi (7). He spent the winter in it, toon from the Gilyak

6. Müller, op. cit., pp. 354, 355; Fischer, op. cit., p. 849.

7. In Stepanof's report the ostrog is called

/107 cont./

175 7. (cont.)
648 "Kosogorskoi"; see Dopoln. k" akt. istor., Vol. IV, St. Petersburg, 1851. p. 82.

a handsome /108/ tribute in furs. and in the spring of 1656 again went up the Amur. Two years later part of his company who did not want to submit to the delegate of the new commander, Pasckhof, and had fled, returned to the lower Amur. wintered at its mouth (1658/59), and went back upstream again with the rich tribute collected from the Gilyak (1). There are ստաս however, is certainly not the case (4). When Russians

192 4. In Gilyak "island" is pölio-mif, a compound word in which mif means "earth" or "land"; thus, La-mif -- the Amur region, Laer-mif -- Sakhalin, Chagi-mif --part of the Amur-Liman, etc. I do not know the meaning of pollo. According to Middendorff (Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p. 108), the name "Schantar" first occurs on the handwritten map of the extreme eastern part of Siberia drawn up in 1720 and based on the works of the two surveyors, Jewreinof and Luchin, and, to be sure, on it the more southerly of the two easternmost islands of this group bears the name, "Schandanskij."

195 When the Russians
648 under the Cossack Semjon Scabara first came to the Shantar
114 Islands in the summer of 1713, they found them uninhabited;
136 on only one of the three islands visited by them, on which there were ample food and good hunting and on which they spent the winter (5), did they meet a woman, whose language

5. According to Middendorff (op. cit.,

195 /109 cont./
114 purposes (2). Müller thought that their name was of Gilyak
(224) origin, since "schantar" means "island" in Gilyak (3), which,

113 3. Op. cit., p. 96. Also in Büching's Magaz. für die neue Histor. und Geogr., Part 2, second ed., p. 510.

fact this woman had been left behind on the island by her countrymen or whether, as Middendorff thinks (2), was abducted

2. Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p. 103.

by the Cossacks themselves on the mainland and was brought to the island. Subsequent expeditions to the Shantars con-175 firmed that they had no permanent inhabitants. On the second 131 trip, in 1715, under the Syn bojarskoi Filkejef, who, however, did not go there himself (3), the winter was spent on

3. Müller (Samml. Rus. Gesch., Vol. III, p. 107), who spoke to Filkejef himself in Yakutsk, says expressly that because of differences with his men he had himself put ashore with two Cossacks at the mouth of the Tugur. According, therefore, the statements by Sokolof ("Opis' Udskago ber. i Shantarsk. ostr. poruch. Kozmina /A Description of the Uda Bank and of the Shantar Islands, Commissioned by Kozmin/. Zap. Gidrogr. Depart., Part IV. St. Petersburg, 1846, p. 3, note 4) and by Middendorff (Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p. 99, note 1), who have Filkejef himself reach the Shantars, are to be corrected.

/109 cont./

195 5. (cont.)
131 p. 98), it was probably Large Shantar 648 Island /Bolshoi/.

they could not understand -- presumably a /110/ Gilyak woman, who, however, disappeared, and there is no information given about her anywhere later (1). It cannot be determined whether in

1. Müller, op. cit., p. 99.

Large Shantar Island, which proved to be uninhabited. Thro 195 carelessness in making fire, it is said, the forests on the isla 131 caught fire and as a result the sable disappeared there. On th 195 return trip the following summer the Cossacks wanted to do 648 some fishing along the coast of the mainland between the Tu and the Amur, but most of them were killed by the Gilyak (4

4. Presumably there is a connection between this event and the story that Sokolof relates, apparently copied verbatim from a logbook, in Morskoi Sbornik (1862, No. 6, Miscellany, p. 107 -- it is the entry hinted at by Middendorff, op. cit., p. 99, note 2, which he was unable to find again as the result of an incorrect citation). Seaman Petrof, who had participated in Iwan Schestakof's expedition to the Shantars in 1730, related that they had found on Large Shantar Island and had taken aboard three Russian men, who gave the following information about themselves: they had spent about 20 years on the island; when they had come to the land of the Gilyak to fish, the latter had overcome them and killed 17 of them; only three of them escaped the Gilyak and got away to Large Shantar Island where they had lived ever since. One can see that the account is quite similar to the one mentioned above, though, if it is the same event, the twenty-year stay on the island does not fit, since it could only be twelve. But this number is given only roughly and, in view of the style of the narrative, which clearly shows a gap, could just as well refer

/295 cont./

III.

Legends about the Past

In connection with the excavations (1), the old man Toyon

1. Which Shternberg carried on.

said: "These are Korean. Long, long ago there was a war. Formerly Koreans lived here; then the Chinese came and drove them out.

"Long, long ago the Chinese lived in Puir on the Amur. The Chinese pursued them and shot at them with a cannon.

"There were at that time few Gilyak. By a cape on a hillock near the very village (Langr) they placed a cannon (the hole remained) and shot at the Russians around the boulder stones in the bay of Puir (Pakhzyr boulder stones). The hole on the hill is almost overgrown; formerly it was four meters deep and surrounded with stones. The cannon ball made the forest burn for eight nights; a lane was created. The cannon ball was found in Kol' -- four people cannot lift it."

According to a legend, 28 skulls were seen by the lake, which "at night cried and went to drink water; now all the water has dried up," "vessel dry up," i.e., is lost.

One old man assures us that within his memory and the memory of his father the Gilyak and their neighbors have occupied the same places since olden times. The Manchu (the Chinese, Manzy) have come here since the Russian War. They did not build large towns; they settled in groups of one or two houses, and only in Tyr, Akhcha, and Mykhyl' did they have guards. Their governor lived in Tyr.

With the appearance of the Manchu, during the war with the Russians, the Gilyak left by sea for Sakhalin and other places, but upon the departure of the Manchu, they began to come back.

/295 cont./

173 [648] According to a different version, when part of the inhabitants ran away and another part was captured, three persons (two men and one woman) saved themselves, /296/ who killed two suns. When they came back, they found mountains where the Amur had been, and they went back (from Shul'gin Khokfing, 80 years old).

The Manchu fought with the Russians who had come down; in the spring during the run of the hump-backed salmon, some Russians hid themselves in the taiga, and they could not be found.

The Russians from the Amur saved themselves on the Amgun; the Manzy pursued them, but unsuccessfully. Then a Chinese general asked the god for snow, and snow fell knee deep, and they found the Russians by their tracks and slaughtered them.

After the war with the Russians, the Chinese set up a post on the upper Amgun (the Burukhan) -- "while the post stands, the Russians are not allowed to pass." Now the post has fallen down.

On the Amgun there is also a mountain, "Namnakhan," 19 kilometers below Guga, with hoof prints. This is where the Manchu spent one night during the war with the Chinese.

There is a stone kettle and a boot on the cliff "Gulyakhan," the storehouse of the Shadrinkskiy mines.

According to a legend a Manchu inscription is preserved on one of the mountains.

The guides of the Chinese on the Amgun were Negidal from the clan Umkan, while on Lake Orel' -- N'as'khajl.

The Russians roasted children on their bayonets and ate their meat; they cut off women's heads (1896).

173 648 A legend has been preserved about the way in which the Amur natives fought the Russians. Once the Manchu pursued the Russians, but left a part. The Russians, on their way back, decided to attack Tyr, thinking that they were Manzy. The Gilyak placed stones on wooden boards and fastened them. When the Russians came up to the cliff, they let go of the rope, and all the Russians perished except one who started to swim; he was caught, and the Kern-khal handed him over to the Arn-khal, who held a bear festival in the taiga.

/296 cont./

173 648 The following case occurred in Macha (the left bank of the Amur), opposite Kal'ma. The Gilyak set out to hunt and built a balagan; coming back they saw a great number of people. Then they ran away undetected, gathered together people from all the villages, and set up ambuscades in different places behind the rose-willow trees. When the Russians came out, they shot them all.

Sometimes the Gilyak used the following method of fighting: They tied a cut tree trunk in such a way that it leaped out and struck the legs, and the enemies fell; then they completely killed them off (the settlement Kaki).

Recollections have also been preserved about the relationship between the Chinese /297/ officials and the Amur natives. The Goldi even paid for dogs, the Gilyak -- per person; the Chinese officials collected by whim, and their khalki (boats) with people had to be fed. In exchange for this, they gave receipts which gave one the right of entry into the town of Sungari (Ychkh-khotin). Otherwise the natives would be tortured in the town. The storyteller, a Samagil, in his youth went without a receipt; he said that they paid 40 rubles for a fodder /kormovogo/ man and 20 rubles for an ordinary person, and one sable from each person.

IV.

The Union of Clans and the Bear Festival

614 796 Two clans come together -- k:khal m'ek:r: vytch. They come together in a single yurt; outsiders may also be present. They discuss, and, if there are no obstacles (for example, they have not taken wives from one another), the khlaj nivukh declares that the two clans may join into one. The other representative answers: "It is true, we have accomplished great things together; you also helped us, and we also helped you. Once we form one clan, we shall become k:khal." He says: "There are no obstacles. Our sons and daughters will be our brothers,

/341 cont./

VII.

Miscellanea

● 648 199 The exploitation of the Sakhalin natives by the Russians (Gibel'ka's story). The merchant Ivanov sorely abused the Gilyak, Ainu, Orochon, the Amur Gilyak; he ruined the Tymovsk Gilyak and others. He forced people to buy packages of tobacco and then took two or three sables per package. /342/ He collected debts by force, breaking into the storehouses, breaking trunks, holding in one hand a revolver and a dagger. He used to give some kind of okht to women (see above, p. 480, "Women, Childbirth, and Children"), and they slept with him. Then he became rich.

But the god did not forget all his deeds. Once his son went boating on the Amur and drowned. The Gilyak in Pronga recognized the cast-up body and informed the mother. But when she arrived the body was gone; she saw only the tracks of a bear. By these footprints she reached the place where the bear dealt with its prey. Only a gold ring was left at the scene of the feast. The mother cried and cried and went back. Ivanov himself, not yet an old man, began to pine and to lose weight; no medicines helped. Finally he died. The Yakut Semenchuk was one of those who dug him a grave on the cemetery hill. But the hole filled with water, and, no matter how they dug, the water kept increasing. This was the tears of those people whom he had abused. These tears do not disappear. Alongside of it a grave was dug for another, a poor person, and it was without water.

867 A good father teaches his son not to abuse anybody, not to laugh at anybody.

567 Slaves -- krygrys (1894). In Kuklyakh (?) a krygrys was exchanged for a woman. In Vaydakh -- a krygrys, Khyumik, a limping woman; she was beaten and beaten, everyone ordered her about," "she did not have time to eat"; one could not sleep with her, for no one wanted to have krygrys children. There were krygrys also in Tongakh, Tevakh, Kutr. The atk (see p. 222, IV) of Gibel'ka had krygrys.

10 cons / 4. (cont.)

to the number of Russians originally present on the island, so that now the number of years of the way would have been assisted, for the island original reads: shi'ts ulk' 'bito na tom' ostrovie tam' e' ji, kotorye zdesiya' e' ti, ostrovie tiya' chisel' ne' ma.

This information is also interesting because to a certain extent it is confirmation that in 1730 (see 1729 as is said in Middendorff and others, Sakhalin) the island actually been on the Shantars, about which Middendorff, on the basis of the short and insufficient reports in Müller (cp. 1.c., pp. 130 ff.), is in doubt. According to him, the islands seen by Schenkand on the trips back and forth between Kamchatka and Udskoi Ostrog were not necessarily the Shantar Islands at all, since he navigated between the southern point of that peninsula and arrived at its east coast. This, however, seems to me wholly unfounded, since Schenkand, also, according to data from his own reports presented by Müller, took place not only in the Sea of Okhotsk between the west coast of Kamchatka, Udskoi Ostrog, and Okhotsk. Müller himself expresses no doubt or uncertainty about the fact that Schenkand had visited the Shantar Islands, but only regrets being unable to give more detailed information about his trip because of the absence of the logbook.

Noteworthy that all the accounts concerning the temporary stay of the Gilyak on the Shantar Islands are inadequate and stay visited the large islands within sight from their coast, namely wooded, and still uninhabited, on which they could peacefully pursue the hunting of the porcupine, the sable, etc., and the productive fishing and animal-trapping along the coast. Indeed, I am even inclined to believe that whereas their westward expansion along the coast of the mainland at first did not reach the Tugur and perhaps not beyond it, they did visit the Shantar Islands, even the westernmost of them, and Beie Island (Novokhitri) located beyond Tugur Bay. At least the name "Ngorkah," which allegedly the Tungus gave to this island (8), is undoubtedly of Gilyak

/111 cont.)

6. Middendorff, op. cit., p. 110.

origin, in that "Ngorkah" /112/ in Gilyak means "animal rock" (1).

1. From nga = animal, and ph = rock, rock-like shape, stone, etc.
2. Similar Gilyak place names are Tchirkatch, Tchibokch, Tchirch, etc.

But the Gilyak were surely never very numerous on the Shantar Islands, since the Gilyak population on the adjacent coast of the mainland is not large and since navigation around these islands is difficult and dangerous on account of the rapid and changing currents, the flowing ice floes, the frequent fog, the pounding surf, etc. It was therefore natural that as soon as the Russian appeared on the coast there, and as they took possession of them, the Gilyak remained away from them, then, at least, in 1853, they were apparently not there. The month of the Tugur when a party of Russian took up winter quarters at the mouth of the Great Ulban (3). It is very probably

3. Kimmin, according to the accounts of the priest from Udskoi Ostrog.

/112 cont.)

2. (cont.)
(Ketchinskii), who learned of it while traveling through his diocese in the winter of 1859-1860 (Zap. Geog. Obsh., Part VI, p. 36).

that it was because the Gilyak had just seen themselves pushed off the Shantars by the Russians that they appeared so hostile toward them when the latter advanced from there into their territory on the mainland. It is no wonder that they took advantage of their greater numbers to drive off and scare off the intruders. Now since, as Middendorff has shown, the trips by the Russians to the Shantars took place almost without incident, then, the Gilyak lost their former hunting territory altogether. It seems, then, that what they regarded as their proper and territory on the islands in the northwest of their area of distribution, they surrendered to the Russians without any resistance on their part.

Much less can be drawn from the oldest Russian reports from the lower Amur about possible border shifts in the south of the Gilyak territory. Here, at the time of the first contact with the adjacent neighbors and nation, and at most the number of days required to reach the Russian settlements in Gilyak territory, all of the statements run differently, in that, according to Popéof, the Sirinkes beside the Gilyak spoke, according to Chabarof the Achanzes, and according to Ispopof the Dyarskaves. The next question is how are these peoples to be identified with those known to us today from the lower Amur region and how are those apparently contradictory reports to be reconciled?

As Millier (3) and after him Fischer (4) correctly remarked

3. Samml. Russ. Gesch., Vol. II, p. 320.

4. Sibir. Gesch., Vol. II, p. 309.

/113 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/114 cont.)

that one can hardly doubt that some there increased considerably. In the northern, Gilyak part of Sakhalin, on the other hand, a decrease in the population has taken place. I believe that Schenck, who was interested in coming to know the Gilyak Gilyak left the island, perhaps as a result of the pressure from the Ainos, and they moved to the Amur Estuary and the Sea of Okhotsk (2). A more numerous Gilyak

2. See p. 214 above /ustanovlenii/.

/114 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/115 cont.)

Gilyak, who, however, occupy only a small territory in the Amur region. Sirinks, certainly much more numerous in Russian times, are dispersed over a wide territory and therefore are only sparsely represented everywhere, some living on the mainland along the mouths of the Ussuri and Sungari. The southernmost part of the Amur River, between the mouths of the Sungari and the Sunja (Nurevaf Mountains, is a prairie wilderness almost completely without people, and then begins the upper Amur region, which is only temporarily visited by nomadic hunting parties, except for the part cultivated by the Manchu, Chinese, Dear, and, intermediate between the Sungari and the Sunja, Sirinks.

In general the population situation on Sakhalin is different from that on the Amur. Here, they have never been pushed off by Ainu, seems to have a greater population than the northern, the Gilyak part of the island, and, in the southern part, settled on both sides by the branches of a warm current, a climatically very favorable region. The Ainos, then, must, which, especially on its east coast toward the Sea of Okhotsk, has an extremely cold climate and consequently a very sparse population, from the time phenomenon may be in historical and political circumstances rather than in physical conditions. Warred upon and subjugated by the Japanese, they were pushed back and driven away, and constantly oppressed and afflicted since then, the Ainos moved out of their region and, as I have shown, have not represented opportunities to become familiar with and to appreciate the type of construction of the Chinese House, that certainly have contributed most of all to its adoption and further spread among the Amur peoples.

As early as April and May, when spring comes, the Gilyak

/114 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/115 cont.)

/117 cont.) NEXT COMES THE OKCHAMAN, who, however, occupy only a small territory in the Amur region. Sirinks, certainly much more numerous in Russian times, are dispersed over a wide territory and therefore are only sparsely represented everywhere, some living on the mainland along the mouths of the Ussuri and Sungari. The southernmost part of the Amur River, between the mouths of the Sungari and the Sunja (Nurevaf Mountains, is a prairie wilderness almost completely without people, and then begins the upper Amur region, which is only temporarily visited by nomadic hunting parties, except for the part cultivated by the Manchu, Chinese, Dear, and, intermediate between the Sungari and the Sunja, Sirinks.

In general the population situation on Sakhalin is different from that on the Amur. Here, they have never been pushed off by Ainu, seems to have a greater population than the northern, the Gilyak part of the island, and, in the southern part, settled on both sides by the branches of a warm current, a climatically very favorable region. The Ainos, then, must, which, especially on its east coast toward the Sea of Okhotsk, has an extremely cold climate and consequently a very sparse population, from the time phenomenon may be in historical and political circumstances rather than in physical conditions. Warred upon and subjugated by the Japanese, they were pushed back and driven away, and constantly oppressed and afflicted since then, the Ainos moved out of their region and, as I have shown, have not represented opportunities to become familiar with and to appreciate the type of construction of the Chinese House, that certainly have contributed most of all to its adoption and further spread among the Amur peoples.

As early as April and May, when spring comes, the Gilyak

/118 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/119 cont.)

/118 cont.)

Chinese origin (1). To make the fish-skin vessels use

1. During my stay in the Amur region, among the numerous specimens that been crown with the inscription "Souvenir de mission" and a bronze medallion bearing the picture of the Emperor Nicholas I (?) inscription were found on a woman's robe from the village of Wan or one of the nearby villages. In all probability these pieces came from the Russian mission, which, in the years 1840 to 1848, after he had spent the winter in Wan, was sent every year to visit the Gilyak. His colleague Venanti, who by order of the Apostolic Vicar of Manchuria made a journey in 1850 from Amur and Sakhalin to the Gilyak on the Amur to investigate the crime, saw many of these medals between the crosses and medallions (Cmoc. Amaiam dos trayaps, Ibid. Ibid., Vol. XXX, 1851 (Vol. II), p. 218). To supplement the reports collected by Venanti, and Gilyak from Amur and Sakhalin, it should be noted here in passing that a number of these medals were also found among the Gilyak, on the left bank of the Amur, between the villages of Wan and Sofaxch, at the point where the rocks in a strange gate-like formation come close to the river. I visited this place in my winter journey on March 19 (April 1), 1855. The already mentioned Gilyak in charge of the village of Wan was named for me as one of the Gilyak who had come to Wan to answer my questions concerning the details of the matter. Since, however, the Gilyak consider it bad luck /ubiyat/ to destroy a piece of paper with

/119 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/120 cont.)

/119 cont.)

1. Venanti, "Excursion dans les parties inférieures de la Mandchourie, 1850" (Compte-Rendus des voyages, Vol. XXX, 1851 (Vol. II), pp. 218 ff.). Here, it is not difficult to recognize the Olcha villages of Adi, Polu, and Ochke in the Tschang-Sian-ur villages, mentioned by Venanti, "Adi," the first, going downstream, "Polu," and "Ochu." It has always been known that people without "ji" (Russian, 1894, note 1) that the "Kili-ula" belonging to the Tschang-Sian-ur, who living with the Hoit de la Brontes gave rise to Venanti's voyage, and other villages, "Ochke" also such as the crown (1).

1. Gerndel'st". "O protsessii. shiai. Amura" (Vestn. Russ. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. 00, 1857, Sec. III Mixed Sciences, p. 1 ff.). 2. Bone, "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 3. Amurkoe" "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 4. Amurkoe" Izvie /Pitsy on the Agricultural Conditions in the Amur Region" /Pitsy" in spite of the Treaty of Aigun, Ibid., 3. Trubetskoyer", August-December, 1859, pp. 1 ff.).

Thus, the way of wearing the hair among all the indigenous peoples of the Amur region is a sign of their dependence on or independence of the Manchu-Chinese, or, on Sakhalin, on the Japanese. The boundary up to which the Chinese, among the Amur peoples, and on the Japanese, on Sakhalin, /ka/ /ka/ extend designates at the same time the boundary of the effective rule of the Manchu-Chinese or Japanese over these peoples. It is a sign of their dependence on the Chinese or the Japanese. In the western part of the Amur region and Sakhalin it now seems that the Chinese and Japanese, in the Amur region, the Chinese, and Ainu, only at certain points separates clearly related tribes (for example, the Olcha from the Samagir

/120 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/121 cont.)

/120 cont.)

Gilyak, etc.). These peoples therefore regard the unshaved and influence in this manner they escaped continuous exploitation by the Manchu officials and the Chinese merchants, they could enjoy a relatively good life, and, in contrast to the neighbors, the Manchu-Chinese, and, secure in their possession, they never have been pushed off by Chinese, along with this felt a desire and an incentive to concern themselves, beyond acquiring the most necessary and simple goods of daily life, with their clothing and other equipment, in which they were furthermore lent a helping hand by the trade with the Chinese, conducted on their frontier and in their own interest, consequently.

1. See p. 144 above.

Returning specifically to the clothing of the Gilyak, I must mention a little-known fact, namely, that the making in for sewing and embroidering the Gilyak of today use only steel needles, which, in contrast to the making of the Ainos, Orochon, Olcha, etc., are made of the Chinese, from the Russians, and on Sakhalin from the Japanese (1). The use of bone needles, which, in contrast, negin,

1. Steller's statement that the Kamchatdal obtained steel needles from the Japanese and the erroneous explanation of these determinations, I have dealt with in my discussed above (pp. 871 ff.).

from bone, "the needle"; see Fl. XXIX, Fig. 12, was by the Ainos in the Sea of Okhotsk, and, according to Bone, they brought which a step provided with two nappes rum and into which the nappes are made. Among the Gilyak, however, in contrast to the Ainos, the upper one can be moved along it. If one lifts the

/121 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/122 cont.)

/121 cont.)

Gilyak, etc.) Their habitation area, along the eastern slopes of the great Chingan Mountain, around the tributaries of the Sunari, along the Amur, Ussuri, and Sungari, and, finally, also in a little dependence on the Dear and indirectly on the Chinese (4), 4. See p. 94 above.

they also certainly share the hair style of the latter, it gradually disappears going northward, and along the upper Amur and in northern Manchuria, the Gilyak region more than the clothing of the Manchus, they have actually always remained under Russian influence and have, in spite of the Russian conquest of the original and natural hair style, with the hair completely unshaven and either strung loose, or, in the back, tied in a bunch on the crown (1).

1. Gerndel'st". "O protsessii. shiai. Amura" (Vestn. Russ. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. 00, 1857, Sec. III Mixed Sciences, p. 1 ff.). 2. Bone, "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 3. Amurkoe" "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 4. Amurkoe" Izvie /Pitsy on the Agricultural Conditions in the Amur Region" /Pitsy" in spite of the Treaty of Aigun, Ibid., 3. Trubetskoyer", August-December, 1859, pp. 1 ff.).

Like the hair style, there is another aspect of the external appearance which to some extent characterizes individual peoples of the Amur region and which, in contrast to the hair style, adornment worn on various parts of the body.

All the indigenous peoples of the Amur, and among them the Gilyak, have the use of earrings, or, more properly, ear adornments, which, however, differ in order of only a little on the crown (1).

1. Gerndel'st". "O protsessii. shiai. Amura" (Vestn. Russ. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. 00, 1857, Sec. III Mixed Sciences, p. 1 ff.). 2. Bone, "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 3. Amurkoe" "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 4. Amurkoe" Izvie /Pitsy on the Agricultural Conditions in the Amur Region" /Pitsy" in spite of the Treaty of Aigun, Ibid., 3. Trubetskoyer", August-December, 1859, pp. 1 ff.).

Ainos, Orochon, Olcha, etc., are made of the Chinese, from the Russians, and on Sakhalin from the Japanese (1). The use of bone needles, which, in contrast, negin,

1. Steller's statement that the Kamchatdal obtained steel needles from the Japanese and the erroneous explanation of these determinations, I have dealt with in my discussed above (pp. 871 ff.).

from bone, "the needle"; see Fl. XXIX, Fig. 12, was by the Ainos in the Sea of Okhotsk, and, according to Bone, they brought which a step provided with two nappes rum and into which the nappes are made. Among the Gilyak, however, in contrast to the Ainos, the upper one can be moved along it. If one lifts the

/122 cont.)

2. (cont.)
Schenck Sirinks KXI
Gilyak KXI
Nivx Ada

/123 cont.)

/122 cont.)

and Gilyak, and nowhere coincides with the boundary of tribal and tribal boundaries, for example, between the Ainos and the Amur Tungus or Ainu on the other. Inasmuch as the Ainos, and the Gilyak, and, finally, also the Amur Tungus on the Sakhalin Chinese or Japanese is of the Amur region and the Sakhalin Chinese or Japanese, and, however, this border line is also of great ethnographic interest.

Like the hair style, there is another aspect of the external appearance which to some extent characterizes individual peoples of the Amur region more than the clothing and hair style, namely, the use of earrings, or, more properly, ear adornments, which, however, differ in order of only a little on the crown (1).

1. Gerndel'st". "O protsessii. shiai. Amura" (Vestn. Russ. Geogr. Obshch., Pt. 00, 1857, Sec. III Mixed Sciences, p. 1 ff.). 2. Bone, "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 3. Amurkoe" "Ochoin" ulenti. sembi." 4. Amurkoe" Izvie /Pitsy on the Agricultural Conditions in the Amur Region" /Pitsy" in spite of the Treaty of Aigun, Ibid., 3. Trubetskoyer", August-December, 1859, pp. 1 ff.).

Ainos, Orochon, Olcha, etc., are made of the Chinese, from the Russians, and on Sakhalin from the Japanese (1). The use of bone needles, which, in contrast, negin,

1. Steller's statement that the Kamchatdal obtained steel needles from the Japanese and the erroneous explanation of these determinations, I have dealt with in my discussed above (pp. 871 ff.).

from bone, "the needle"; see Fl. XXIX, Fig. 12, was by the Ainos in the Sea of Okhotsk, and, according to Bone, they brought which a step provided with two nappes rum and into which the nappes are made. Among the Gilyak, however, in contrast to the Ainos, the upper one can be moved along it. If one lifts the

/A63 cont./

similar in shape to that of the Chinese and Japanese (5). /A65/

2. Hamsa Hmsh, "Tdatsi koko" (Siebold, Nippon, VII, p. 194).

One might suppose that the traveler was concerned with, not the originals Gilyak, but only with imperfect copies of Japanese pottery which he saw among the Gilyak, but this would still not remove the contradiction with my above statements, because Japan goes on to say that there were especially many porcelain factories along the Amur (Aiaisi) near Kidzi (1). This,

1. Op. cit., p. 172.

however, no longer refers to the Gilyak, whose territory does not begin until somewhat below Kidzi, but even among the Olcha, to whom it must refer, and still further upstream among the Goldi, at least as far as the Umsa, I never saw such factories or any of their products. And Hamsh had the same experience, except that in the Goldi village of Sulfu he saw some earthenware pots among the household utensils of the native (2). This village, however,

2. Hamsh, "Putesh, na Amur" (A Journey to the Amur), p. 145.

is in the vicinity of the Sungari, where, as we shall presently see, totally different conditions prevail in this respect. If, therefore, one a to believe Hamsa Hmsh's report, and, according to my experience, they fully merit it, one is forced to assume that the Olcha, and probably also the lower Goldi, at the beginning of this century were making pottery and porcelain and sold the products even among the Gilyak as far as Sakhalin, and that the natives were likewise familiar with this industry — an industry which had been completely lost fifty years later when I explored the Amur region. How this happened will be illuminated as much as possible in one of the following chapters in the discussion

/A65 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

I do not specify more precisely the date and the manner of the origin of the art of pottery among the Eskimo, I feel able to draw the conclusion, on the basis of the above considerations regarding the Paleo-Asiatic peoples, that the Eskimo left their Asiatic homeland without any knowledge of the art of pottery and not learned it in America, probably as the result of influences which came to them from the south.

To return to the Amur region, I repeat that the potter's art of the Olcha, Chilchi, and Akim of which Hamsa Hmsh spoke was of or in only of recent origin and among the first two peoples, after the destruction of the pottery manufactories in the lower Amur region, on the other hand, may have prompted the Goldi to take up the art of pottery for wooden implements; to turn their large bowls and plates which are still generally used by the Gilyaks and Olcha under the designation sangi-ge and bowls; respectively.

Among the Goldi the art of porcelain industry was destroyed along the lower Amur by the Manchu, it made rapid and unimpeded progress in southern Manchuria and along the Sungari and its tributaries. /A67/ According to the notes of the Chinese Ci-tschen in 1722, the Manchu at that time did not have any earthenware, but only wooden vessels, bowls, and plates (1). With the increasing colonization of the country by the Chinese, however, many pottery and porcelain factories also came there. Near Sur-mu-tsching in Liao-tong Williamson (2) saw many such factories and various

1. Vasil'ev, "Zapiska o Ningutie (Notes on Ninguta)" (Zap. Imp. russk. Geogr. Obshch., Vol. XII, 1872, p. 96).

2. Journeys in North China, Manchuria and Eastern Mongolia, London, 1870, Vol. II, p. 187.

/A65 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

preservation and augmentation of their wealth, it is possible to the Gilyak to a high degree, for with the large number of participants at a hunt the hunter's expenses supply of /A66/ would be gone in no time, apart from other dangers. Furthermore, thanks to this characteristic of the Gilyak, the art of pottery, in their character, there appeared at the very beginning of their relations with the Russians and Chinese, which may be hardly be equated in the history of the relations between primitive and civilized peoples: instead of being exploited by the Russians through liquor and losing everything, they, on the contrary, knew how to win many an advantage from the Russian sailors and Cossacks with their small wooden pots. The Japanese, their moderation and power of resistance were also greatly aided by the fact that during the first years of the Russian occupation of the Amur region only very little liquor was imported, while the number of the Russian consumers of it grew rapidly (1). Later, however, after

1. For instance, in 1855 the crews of several war vessels and the Ayghuzhin and several detachments of Cossacks from Transbaikal were added to the previous Gilyak settlers in the Tatarska Strait. Thus, at the end of the Crimean War, when the importation of liquor into Nikolaevsk, handled by many and in particular North American and Hamburg trading ships, /A67/ greatly increased, and, simultaneously, the ancient, original ways of life and views of the Gilyaks were more and more undermined and began to disappear under the impact of Russian immigration and colonization, it was also the end of their moderation and power of resistance to alcohol, and as early as the mid-sixties we read in the local newspapers, as well as in the reports of returning travelers and other eyewitnesses, of the ever increasing drunkenness and gluttony among the Gilyaks, especially during their best festivals and other celebrations (1).

1. Cf., for instance, Arth. Nordmann,

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

"Ueber den Fischfang und die Jagd der am Amur wohnenden Gilyaken, Ein Beitrag zur Kenntnis des Fischfangs und Jagdwesens," Bull. de la Société Impériale des Naturalistes de Moscou, Vol. XXXIV, Part II, 1861, p. 291; and Tsunetchine Pemor'e, 1866, p. 50 and elsewhere.

Tobacco smoking is common among all the peoples of the Amur region, and, indeed, both men and women smoke, and the Gilyaks, Olcha, and Orok and Japanese have gradually become tolerant to it as an early age. It seems obvious to me where these peoples first learned about the tobacco plant and its use. As it is well-known, tobacco is native to the tropics of America, at least the northern part, obtained the tobacco plant and the customs of smoking tobacco, and, indeed, this is said to have happened only about two and a half centuries ago when the now reigning Manchu dynasty ascended the throne (1644), upon whose accession the Chinese also adopted the Chinese tobacco plant (1) and under whose protection the cultivation of tobacco rapidly spread throughout the country (2).

2. Ibe, L'Empire Chinois, Paris, 1854, Vol. I, pp. 222-224. Pommieroye, Voyage en Chine et en Tartarie, Paris, 1860, p. 198. Williamson, Journeys in North China, Manchuria and East Mongolia, London, 1870, Vol. II, p. 68. Wassiljew ("Chinesische Mandschurei," = Zap. Imp. Russk. Geogr. Obshch., Buch XII, 1857, pp. 92, 93) is of opinion that it was first introduced into Manchuria by the Chinese, who, in contrast to the Manchu, were accustomed to the use of tobacco and smoking.

2. Under Emperor Kia-king (1796-1820)

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

he had no knowledge of the Orok migrations through the Tymy Valley studied with Gilyak villages in which there are many /A67/ Orok, and on these migrations, which take place every winter (for the purpose of trade with the Gilyak, Aino, Chinese, and Japanese, and, in recent years, also with the Russians) he has given a report in their direction and final aims (2), the Orok use, as

2. See p. 38 ff. above; also Vol. I, pp. 169 and 170, of this work.

has just been described in detail, the reinder for harnessing in place of the dog.

Although in the above I had to reject the idea that a change in the way the reinder was used could have taken place among the Orok and Gilyak living in the Tymy Valley, on the other hand, this seems to me quite undeniable much further back in time. Siberia, in the north, is the region where the reinder is native, and, in the south, it was domesticated and used in the Altai region, across the mountains and the Ural, in Europe, in the Amur, and along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, may have prompted them to use their reinder as their engine in the transport of goods. Among the Gilyak and Orok living in the Tymy Valley, that, in, between them and the Gilyak and Orok living in the Amur, and along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, the reinder, in contrast to the dog, is used for pack purposes, and, in the last decade, the Japanese, too, after they have applied themselves, with the help of the Aino, to the herring fishing on the coasts of southern Sakhalin and the catching of [illegible] in the mouth of the Poronai, generally appear at the mouth of the Tymy Valley, at the time of the migration of the Gilyak and Orok living in catching it with great energy and ruthlessness. Pulajskol, who met them there at this occupation in August, 1881, reports, among other things (1), that they had first erected a well of the kind described above reaching across the entire river all opened one-twelfth of the width of the river only as a result of his threatening demands, but then immediately above the first barrier they erected a second well in the middle of the river. Under these circumstances it is understandable that they annually take large quantities of this species of salmon out of the

1. Op. cit., pp. 70-79 and p. 99.

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

Tymy River, no less understandable, however, is the harm that they do through this to the Orok and especially to the Gilyak of the entire Tymy Valley who rely on the abundance of fish of that river.

Nothing special is to be said about the catching of the fish living in the Tymy River, which, with the exception of the sturgeon, sheatfish, pike, etc. for it is carried on with ordinary nets. During this /A67/ periods when there is no more important fishing, therefore especially in winter, and, indeed, in the ice, in the same way as sturgeon is then caught. In the cattle, lake-like wide places with a depth of two to three fathoms and more along the banks of the Amur River, and which are always connected with it by a more or less narrow channel, or, in other words, in the mouth, of course, I have seen the Gilyak set up bag-shaped nets on poles in order to catch crucians and similar fish; which are abundant in these small lakes.

One type of fishing must be given special consideration, both on account of its extraordinary importance and of its novelty, and also on account of the characteristic, original way in which it is carried out. This is the hanga fishing along the west and east coasts of Sakhalin. The Japanese, who, in contrast to the Gilyak, watchful Pall) for the Gilyak and the way it is used have been discussed above, have, in the last decade, appeared in great numbers appear directly under the ice of the sea permits the Gilyak to employ the simplest means to catch them in abundance. All that they need for this is a span-long iron hook Gilyak kasch-kesu, Fl. XI, Fig. 2/1030/, Fig. 1) hung on a cord about three feet long which can be moved up and down by means of a wooden handle. The Gilyak fishing beside the hole in the ice catch with this short fishing-rod without any bait, in that he lets it down into the water and immediately draws it up again, pulling one fish after another onto the ice. In the few minutes that I stood by it it was not long before I had caught a fish myself. Thus, in the west coast of Sakhalin — my Gilyak pulled out several dozen fish, and the Japanese sometimes caught as that fish hung in their nets. Some far beaches fish of fish, he lets the signal cord fall and draws together the opening of the bag, whereupon it is dragged ashore with the sturgeon. Sometimes, in the intervening between two sturgeon at the time, other fish, sometimes even sturgeon and beluga, are in these bag nets. Since such labor and troubles are connected with making a /A67/ the Gilyak usually erect them only to catch the species of salmon most important to them and at the same time are according to the great multitudes, the Gilyak-tiche. They cannot have enough of this fish, and therefore at the time of year in which the Gilyak are most occupied with it, because the Gilyak area of the Amur River.

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

Nevertheless, the Japanese, in contrast to the Gilyak, carry out their reinder on the /A67/ paths made by their dog sleds through the Tymy Valley. Such a possibility for the Orok, growing out of their good relations with the Gilyak and enabling them to use the paths made by the Gilyak sleds through the entire Tymy Valley, and, indeed, across the mountains and the Ural to the Amur, and along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, may have prompted them to use their reinder as their engine in the transport of goods. Among the Gilyak and Orok living in the Amur, and, along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, the reinder, in contrast to the dog, is used for pack purposes, and, in the last decade, the Japanese, too, after they have applied themselves, with the help of the Aino, to the herring fishing on the coasts of southern Sakhalin and the catching of [illegible] in the mouth of the Poronai, generally appear at the mouth of the Tymy Valley, at the time of the migration of the Gilyak and Orok living in catching it with great energy and ruthlessness. Pulajskol, who met them there at this occupation in August, 1881, reports, among other things (1), that they had first erected a well of the kind described above reaching across the entire river all opened one-twelfth of the width of the river only as a result of his threatening demands, but then immediately above the first barrier they erected a second well in the middle of the river. Under these circumstances it is understandable that they annually take large quantities of this species of salmon out of the

1. Op. cit., pp. 70-79 and p. 99.

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

their reinder, however, the Gilyak invariably directed him toward warlike than toward gain and profit. Such made them recognize that they did not have to fear any curtailment of their wealth, because to the intimidating behavior of the Gilyak, a considerable gain, for the treasures of previous fur-[illegible] the Gilyak, in these bag nets. Since such labor and troubles connected with making a /A67/ the Gilyak usually erect them only to catch the species of salmon most important to them and at the same time are according to the great multitudes, the Gilyak-tiche. They cannot have enough of this fish, and therefore at the time of year in which the Gilyak are most occupied with it, because the Gilyak area of the Amur River.

Nevertheless, the Japanese, in contrast to the Gilyak, carry out their reinder on the /A67/ paths made by their dog sleds through the Tymy Valley. Such a possibility for the Orok, growing out of their good relations with the Gilyak and enabling them to use the paths made by the Gilyak sleds through the entire Tymy Valley, and, indeed, across the mountains and the Ural to the Amur, and along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, may have prompted them to use their reinder as their engine in the transport of goods. Among the Gilyak and Orok living in the Amur, and, along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, the reinder, in contrast to the dog, is used for pack purposes, and, in the last decade, the Japanese, too, after they have applied themselves, with the help of the Aino, to the herring fishing on the coasts of southern Sakhalin and the catching of [illegible] in the mouth of the Poronai, generally appear at the mouth of the Tymy Valley, at the time of the migration of the Gilyak and Orok living in catching it with great energy and ruthlessness. Pulajskol, who met them there at this occupation in August, 1881, reports, among other things (1), that they had first erected a well of the kind described above reaching across the entire river all opened one-twelfth of the width of the river only as a result of his threatening demands, but then immediately above the first barrier they erected a second well in the middle of the river. Under these circumstances it is understandable that they annually take large quantities of this species of salmon out of the

1. Op. cit., pp. 70-79 and p. 99.

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

their reinder, however, the Gilyak invariably directed him toward warlike than toward gain and profit. Such made them recognize that they did not have to fear any curtailment of their wealth, because to the intimidating behavior of the Gilyak, a considerable gain, for the treasures of previous fur-[illegible] the Gilyak, in these bag nets. Since such labor and troubles connected with making a /A67/ the Gilyak usually erect them only to catch the species of salmon most important to them and at the same time are according to the great multitudes, the Gilyak-tiche. They cannot have enough of this fish, and therefore at the time of year in which the Gilyak are most occupied with it, because the Gilyak area of the Amur River.

Nevertheless, the Japanese, in contrast to the Gilyak, carry out their reinder on the /A67/ paths made by their dog sleds through the Tymy Valley. Such a possibility for the Orok, growing out of their good relations with the Gilyak and enabling them to use the paths made by the Gilyak sleds through the entire Tymy Valley, and, indeed, across the mountains and the Ural to the Amur, and along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, may have prompted them to use their reinder as their engine in the transport of goods. Among the Gilyak and Orok living in the Amur, and, along the Poronai to the Bay of Patience, the reinder, in contrast to the dog, is used for pack purposes, and, in the last decade, the Japanese, too, after they have applied themselves, with the help of the Aino, to the herring fishing on the coasts of southern Sakhalin and the catching of [illegible] in the mouth of the Poronai, generally appear at the mouth of the Tymy Valley, at the time of the migration of the Gilyak and Orok living in catching it with great energy and ruthlessness. Pulajskol, who met them there at this occupation in August, 1881, reports, among other things (1), that they had first erected a well of the kind described above reaching across the entire river all opened one-twelfth of the width of the river only as a result of his threatening demands, but then immediately above the first barrier they erected a second well in the middle of the river. Under these circumstances it is understandable that they annually take large quantities of this species of salmon out of the

1. Op. cit., pp. 70-79 and p. 99.

/A66 cont./

(cont.)

(cf. Schenck, op. cit., p. 199).

especially well-worked pieces and which causes them necessary use such pieces not to sell them, but rather /A67/ to store them away carefully as capital, so to speak, and to bequeath them as an heirloom to their wife, or, whereby they change owners, to be sure, but still remain in the realm of the Gilyak. More over, in view of the great importance of fishing, much time is spent on the manufacture of each individual piece of this kind, and, as is always and everywhere the case, not everybody can have a great skill. At the time of my stay in the Amur region the village of Chyla (1), located on the Amur directly above

1. On the ethnographic map of the Amur region which is appended to the first volume of this work.

2. This appears on the map of the Amur region which is appended to the first volume of this work.

their home there.

/320 cont./ Маскина ТЫ МАНЕК ВУНДЫ ЗЫ ТИНЕМ, Aino in Sakhalin [illegible] but their skill at forging iron more and more and finally practically gave it up entirely as a result, so he thinks, of being flooded with Japanese goods.
We must add that this step backwards by the Ainu certainly had another, deeper reason, which the Japanese traveler probably would not or could not mention -- the apparent backsliding in which they found themselves in relation to the Japanese, concerned with outright exploitation by the latter, under which they were bound to sink more and more into poverty, misery, and indolence. The Gilyak of Sakhalin, on the other hand, were in a more favorable situation because of the greater distance of their sites from the Japanese. Thanks to these circumstances and, at the same time, their greater energy and intelligence, they were able to remain independent of them. Indeed, fear of the Japanese and the idea (one which had bedeviled their neighbor, the Ainu, may have chiefly prompted them to retreat more and more northward on Sakhalin and, finally, even to emigrate, or, in consideration of a more distant path, perhaps more correctly said, to migrate back in large part to the opposite mainland (2).

2. Concerning this emigration or migration back by the Gilyak from Sakhalin to the mainland, see pp. 316 and 247 above (tr-translated/.

At any rate, the political independence which they were able to maintain on Sakhalin with regard to the Japanese and to the Amur region with regard to the Manchu-Chinese was a powerful lever for the preservation and increase of their well-being, as well as for the further development of already acquired skills, among them the art of metal forging, and all the more so the more abundantly the springs of their subsistence flowed, as was especially the case along the large and fish-rich Amur River.

Like the Ainu and Gilyak, the third people on Sakhalin, the Orok, also owed their knowledge of iron and the working of it to the Japanese, though they did not obtain it directly from the most numerous and generally most popular of all domestic animals, simply as table hunting, among the peoples of the upper Amur region; who say on hunting almost entirely for their food and in large part for their clothing, the meat animals, elk, red deer, roe deer, and wild pig, stand in first place as the objects of hunting. Also comparing to this is the fact that the large animals named first are also used for tributary payments to the Manchu officials (6), and the young and still soft deer antlers are

/388 cont./

6. I again draw attention to the fact that the descriptions belong to the period of the past, a a time when almost the entire Amur region was still under Chinese rule.

an important trade item. To be sure, the precious fur-bearing animals, especially the sable, are found in ever more and more boots, and, accordingly, zealously hunted, by the upper Amur people, too, but their number has so greatly decreased in the course of time, both because of the constant and strenuous hunting and because of the frequent and extensive forest fires, in part caused by negligence and in part intentional, that, in addition to them, other animals formerly regarded as worthless and ignored have acquired value. In particular, as the sable gradually disappeared, the squirrels serving as food for it became so much more common and numerous that along the upper Amur and in /Ma/ tributaries the squirrels have always become the principal objects of attention for the hunters, and, though of little value individually, they reign their value and expense because of their great numbers. The Schilka and Argun Cossacks, who annually in the fall and organized in small companies (sotsky undertake long hunting expeditions lasting for weeks and months in the Onochon and Manegir territories, therefore simply call this hunting of sable, in accordance with its chief purpose,
"beltowje" (1), i.e., squirrel pursuit. Thus, another

1. Accordingly, the verb "beltowat," i.e., to pursue squirrel-hunting, in that of the two civilized peoples with each other. Thus, they in the Amur center, so to speak, at Nikolaevsk, and at Ma-tions in the lower Amur region. This is especially true of the Amur Gilyak, while those on Sakhalin and the southern coast of the Sea of Okhotsk hardly less a peripheral position in this respect than the cultic peoples of the region. The farmer, however, are also favored more than the latter two by their geographical position, in that, besides the sea route to the Japanese by way of the Amur and along the west coast of Sakhalin, they also have a second wattg artery on the Amur River, which leads them to the Chinese living on it as well as on the Sungari. Finally, in the trade with the Russians, too, the Gilyak, and, to be sure, again those of the Amur River, occupy a central and favorable position, which, to be sure, in contrast to the neighboring peoples, merely as a result of the fact that the occupation of the Amur region in the 50's by the Russian started at the mouth of the Amur and the first settlement were founded in Gilyak territory, in particular the Nikolayev post, which for some time remained the headquarters of the Russian administration and from which the further exploration of the lower Amur region and its peoples began.

/391 cont./

If one calls to mind the violent and bloody resistance with which the Gilyak opposed the Russian freebooters in the seventeenth century, which ended only by the latter being the

1. See pp. 218-227 above.

means as good-natured, docile, and indolent as the Tungus, but rather, far to the contrary, are malicious, spiteful, and deceitful, while at the same time energetic and even ready to shed blood
if humiliation or greed are involved (1), it might be surprising

2. The killing of de la Brunière by the Gilyak mentioned above (p. 576, note 1) is evidence of this. Shortly before my arrival in the Amur region, the crew of a

/391 cont./
2. (cont.)
whaler that had run aground in the vicinity of the northernmost Gilyak settlement was killed by the especially notorious Gilyak from Tamankaw and the boat was plundered. In 1895, among the Gilyak of Pogbobi, I saw a bucket bearing a number and an English inscription, which presumably came from it.

that the occupation of their territory achieved by the Russians with very few means in the beginning took place in such a peaceful manner and so little bloodshed. Thus, completely the love of trade inherent in the Gilyak to a high degree very generously contributed to this. The possibility was being able to exchange in the Russian settlements an assortment of products of which they had an abundance, and for which they otherwise could find no market, such as fish, game, beasts, etc., for wares articles greatly coveted by them, especially material for clothing and tobacco, must have made them peaceably disposed toward them, and the great advantage that they were able to draw from this trade by their industriousness, cleverness, and skill kept nothing from them, as they, as they themselves and their rapidly growing numbers and strength aroused in them.
The Schlakeyev post became the most important trade center of the Amur Gilyak, and, thanks to the active trade /Mit/ that the latter maintained with their fellow-tribesmen along the Sea of Okhotsk and on Sakhalin, as well as with the Ainu and the Tungusic Amur peoples, many Russian wares were soon widely distributed in the region. Nevertheless, in my time among the Gilyak of Sakhalin, where, apart from the Marawjof post in Aniwa Bay, already destroyed again, there were not yet any Russian settlements, there was a suspicious and hostile attitude toward the Russians, which made it necessary for the traveler to be on his guard against treacherous attacks. In the evening, when they sat around the fire blazing in the yurt, I repeatedly heard them argue about the Russians who had come into their country and, in the conviction that I did not understand them, express the opinion that they were now only exploring the country, just as I was doing, in order to take possession of it later and to push out of it and demoy all the Gilyak. At some places, as in Tyk, Dut, and the upper-most Tymy villages, they sometimes even show greater hostility and intolerance and hostility in that they did not want to permit me to stay in their yurts or to make a fire on their hearth for the preparation of my meal, and refused to sell me the necessary food for my dogs from their supplies. This latter refusal was even worse than the two first ones, because it could not be overcome by threats and force in hand, as they could. Thanks to their passion for trade, however, I was always able to get my way finally. Thus, completely the contrary could not resist the trade articles which I had with me and produced apparently without design, and, if just one yielded to temptation and made a small exchange, the ice was broken and offers rained down from all sides, so that I soon had find too many articles of what was needed. With the opening of trade, however, agreement was always also reached on all other matters. The Gilyak show much practical sense, cleverness, industry, and skill in trading. Only articles of luxury practical utility excite their inclination to buy: on the other hand, everything that they need, or, whatever been striking, is, to be sure, gazed at and admired (with the frequently repeated exclamation of "ta-ma-ki," accompanied by striking the head with the palm of the hand), but not acquired as a rule, provided, to be sure, they can maintained with their fellow-tribesmen along the Sea of Okhotsk and on Sakhalin, as well as with the Ainu and the Tungusic Amur peoples, many Russian wares were soon widely distributed in the region. Nevertheless, in my time among the Gilyak of Sakhalin, where, apart from the Marawjof post in Aniwa

/392 cont./
Bay, already destroyed again, there were not yet any Russian settlements, there was a suspicious and hostile attitude toward the Russians, which made it necessary for the traveler to be on his guard against treacherous attacks. In the evening, when they sat around the fire blazing in the yurt, I repeatedly heard them argue about the Russians who had come into their

/392 cont./ Тунгусы ЧЕЛЕВЕКЕ, ОЧЕ ЧЕЛЕВЕКЕ, ЛЕ ЕЛЕВЕКЕ ОЧЕ ЕЛЕ Tungusic neighbors, who are more skillful and active in hunting, and the Amur Gilyak, who have the men dealings with the Chinese, also trade with them, and, in consideration, have long along the Sea of Okhotsk and on Sakhalin and buy from them the desired furs. The Amur Gilyak -- particularly the Tchomi Gilyak too, are the life and soul of this entire trade, through which Chinese wares are brought into circulation throughout the territory of the Gilyak and of the tribes immediately neighboring them, the Negda, Reindeer Tungus, Orok, and even the Ainu, and they are also the ones who draw the greatest advantage from
it. There is not a single Chinese merchant in this whole area.
The northernmost and easternmost point in the lower Amur region is an area where Chinese may not stay longer than a few days.
Located still in Chita territory on the Amur, near the Gilyak settlement, which, only a few miles to the east, is called Tschomi, via the oft-mentioned Tymi-Chaselach route from the Liman (1). It was said that sometimes a Chinese merchant

1. See pp. 144 and 909 above.

meals through from Pulj along the deserted left bank of the Amur to the Negda on the Angoni, he carefully avoids the right bank, inhabited by the Gilyak, and, to be safe, he always, whether he, will not permit any Chinese merchants in their territory and 3 years ago killed one who ventured in. Whether they amount this hostile attitude toward the Chinese merchants in order to defend themselves against the domination of the Manchu-Chinese in order to shake it off is still unclear, but in any case it is greatly to their advantage commercially. For the role that is played further upstream by the Chinese merchants living among the Olcha, Goldi, Samagir, and other peoples of the lower Amur region or visiting them, in that they act as middlemen in the trade between them and the Manchu-Chinese wholesalers along the Sungari, falls in the Gilyak-Tungusic area, inasmuch they are not allowed to come, to the Amur Gilyak themselves, and the latter perform their role of middlemen with great skill and success. The alertness, versatility, and enterprising spirit that /406 cont./ They are not permitted by the Manchu-Chinese government to go further upstream, just as they are not permitted to cross the Amur to the south. Nor are permitted to enter the Amur above the mouth of the Sungari, the so-called Sachala River -- a prohibition whose observance the Manchu officials stationed in Dshdag-Aibo at the confluence of the two rivers have to watch over very strictly (1). Hence this is

1. Cf. pp. 73 and 800 above.

also the extreme western and southern boundary of that part of the Amur and Sungari region known to the Gilyak through personal experience. Beyond this they know about the name of "Hajoch-chanan" and "Sungaj-chotan" (Bhagatu) located, respectively, the above-lower Amur and Sungari, and, to be sure, inhabited tributary, which they call "Ungoj-chotan" (Bhagatu), the Manchu and Tungusic, as a whole, simply means "river", as well as about the "large" town of "Aicho" (Aigun) on the Amur.
River is based only upon hearsay, on tales which they have heard in part from the Chinese on the Sungari and Amur and in part perhaps through Dahian-Yakut traditions in Bodaisk. The Gilyak, the Tungusic-speaking people of the Amur, do not access to the Sungari, which is prohibited for all foreigners, and enter /Mit/ that it views them as its subjects, though it does much for such a people, and, in return, it does not does not yield either military or tribute-collecting officials to them, as a consequence of which the Gilyak regard themselves as independent of it. Perhaps it neglects to do this for reasons of prestige, in order not to expose itself to resistance, the refusal of which would involve more cost than benefit. On the other hand, it tries to make up for it by collecting from the Gilyak coming to trade in Bar-Aigun a tribute, or possible for permission to do so, which must be obtained from it first.
The Gilyak have no choice but to submit to its demands, if they want to be able to participate in the trade, and to have maintained the whole long journey in vain. At the same

/407 cont./
must submit to being treated like the Goldi and other peoples directly subject to the Manchu-Chinese. And in order to achieve this purpose, they, the Gilyak, must, of course, gen-selves cold me, toward them on their part just like the latter, that is, they bend the bow before them in greeting or to make a request, which otherwise is not at all customary among them. The Gilyak in Bar-Aigun put on an act of complete submission to the Manchu-Chinese government, and the latter is satisfied with this, along with the gifts collected from them in the form of tribute and probably going into the pockets of the local officials, and otherwise leaves them in peace.

The treatment of the natives of the lower Amur region appearing amongst the Gilyak, and, indeed, somewhat of the Manchu officials and Chinese merchants there is extremely harsh, inconsiderate, and humiliating, and in particular the gentle and shy Goldi, who live closer to them and are directly subject to them, have to suffer under them. According to the description of Chibiloff (1) and Bachmann (2), which I have followed up the Sungari

1. Khabarovski Uyezd. Rusk. Geogr.
Obshch., Vol. II, 1866, Sec. II, p. 227.
In the excerpt in Petermann's Geograph.
Mitteilungen, 1867, p. 97.

2. Ir. Barabash", "Sungarlik. Eksped. 1872 g.
/The Sungari Expedition of 1872/" (Vostoc Sborn., 1874, No. 3, p. 141).

to Pe-tuna (Bo-duna) in 1866 and 1872, they first had to pay for a permit for travel to Bian-xian and for the trading itself, which was done in the village of Sunsu, lying somewhat below the latter, by paying a considerable amount of sycoeen and beaten cartridges and glue to the Manchu official stationed there.
Upon reaching Bian-xian, they first of all have to pay the tribute (ashin) owed to the Chinese Manchu government, and, indeed, may begin to trade with the Japanese, submit to a ceremony introduced by the latter which consist of two or three blows across the back with a stick received by each of them, as a land on the lower Amur west coast. A principal center for this trade, however, is the village of Najero, not far from Bian-xian, to which which the Ainu come for the purpose from considerable distances themselves, from Aniwa Bay and elsewhere (3). For

/411 cont./

1. See, op. cit., p. 84. Schmidt,
op. cit., p. 92.

egoistical reason the Japanese view this trade with great dislike and try as far as possible to prevent it, because they want to get for themselves the profit from the trade in furs. Since they do in a way which is very injurious to the latter, in that they buch good for below the place in part under threats of punishme the Chinese merchants, and, indeed, sometimes by sub-ing, as payment for alleged debts (3), the Ainu, whenever they

3. Bune, op. cit., p. 71.

cass, avoid trading with them and try to sell their furs, kept hidden from them, to the Sakhalin Gilyak or, preferably, to the Amur Gilyak and Olcha from abroad. The latter are said to pay them two to three fathoms (atm span) of Chinese cotton cloth for one sable pelt, depending on its quality, and yet as much for one squirrel pelt and one fox pelt, depending on skin, so that the latter, with a length of 1/4 arshin, which is easily attained in a year of the unavoidable stretching of the for in skinning, will bring about ten fathoms of the material named (4) - prices which generally correspond to the value

4. Bune, op. cit., p. 84.

given above for these articles among the Gilyak.

Having reached Sunsunu, the Sunsu voyagers, before the may begin to trade with the Japanese, submit to a ceremony
introduced by the latter which consist of two or three blows
across the back with a stick received by each of them, as a

/811 cont. /

[811] Nature of their administration from the highest Japanese officials. After this is done, the goods are taken away from them and brought to an official building of the Japanese, which no one except them may enter, in order to be subected to a close scrutiny (5). It can hardly be doubted that some of the pieces and certainly not the worst ones, never find their way back to their owners. The Japanese, however, do not permit themselves to treat the newly arrived Gilyak and Oroka in the same arrogant and pedantic manner as they do the Aino, despite the reason that others-no they might emily they every abnegation from trading with them and the alleged communication that they [illegible] to them would be lost. Besides [illegible] this trade is all the more profitable for them because it is practically unstable, fur, and river-otter fur in, articles which they procure in great quantities and almost without cost, thanks to their [illegible] [illegible] purchased at a little price from the Aino, as well as in furs, and for which they have no market in Japan because of the well-known aversion to fur among the Japanese. They further owe great profit to the popularity of their iron kettles, provided with handles, among the Gilyak. Finally, their tobacco, tabe, porcelain and lacquered wooden bowls, and the like are equally marketable articles for them in this trade, in exchange for which they principally try to obtain from the Gilyak and Oroka those valuable, red and blue Chinese silk materials and the eagle tails likewise mentioned several times. How much the one as well as the other is among them can be seen from the high prices that they pay for them. According to [illegible] the Japanese are for a period of six months in the place of silk material seven fathoms long and one ninth wide five river-otter pelts, five fox pelts, and five sable pelts, and for an eagle tail three Kadzibuno [illegible] 12 otter pelts, and from the fat ten

5. According to Rudanofski, in Tichmenef's [illegible] Sbornik, chapter, Russkiie-amerikanskie Kompanii, Part II, p. 118.

/811 cont. /

[811] supply of such observations, and concerning Japan, the homeland of the Ainam, they know only that it is a land beyond Sakhalin (Ainu-moshi) and separated from it by a narrow sea" (Opisch-Sakhalin, p. 11). In the years immediately following the occupation of the Aino region by the Japanese, however, the Japanese also tried to keep the traders from their own areas from Batamom and Endaigoro, the second most northerlyin the southern part of Sakhalin. At the same time, we extend their colonization of the island as far north as possible in order to prevent any eventual expansion of Russian posts beyond it and especially any alienation of the Aino subjugated and exploited by them (1). In 1859, for instance, the Gilyak coming to Sakhalin to trade were no longer admitted to Batamom by the Japanese but only as far as Endaigoro, and in the following year the Gilyak were even prevented from entering even that place, so some of them remained in Kunashiri and some went to Sakhalin and to the mainland (2). Under the appointed hostess, or second elder. A black tea-otter fur was agreed upon as the annual gift (tribute) that the elders were to bring to Japan (4). Since the Gilyak and the Aino are at the same time, and in fact, interwoven with gold and promised to sell them all the other skins commodities at a very cheap price. That "foot, linoleum, or boje," which, according to the map drawn by Batoshi on the basis of the original sketch by Sugiyamo Tokiusu and Mamia Rinshi (6), is near Cape Omiu (the southern tip of the Bay de la Jonquiette), is undoubtedly the Gilyak village of Dal, and that the whole of the above incident refers to the subjugation of the Sakhalin Gilyak, or making them tributary.

1. Concerning these events, see pp. 152-156 above.

4. Atlas to Siebold's Nippon, Plate XXV.

/811 cont. /

[811] [illegible] them as to how they came to be tributary to the Matanchi, he received the following information from several Sakhalinsk Gilyak: "Long ago, in the Gilyak language, "when they were not yet tributary, some Matanchi women came to them every year in order to buy furs. The Gilyak, however, hated them as unfriendly and disdainful toward the inhabitants of the island, and they, in turn, were consequently frequently beaten between them, whenever a great number of Matanchi landed one day, suspected the island everywhere, and much persecution of the heart of the inhabitants fled to the mountain out of fear, but some of them stayed behind, and the coast was surrounded by the Matanchi, who conferred with them and appointed one of them as their chief, called or elder. Chief Kaiyo, or elder, the wet coast of the island near Inn (Sushotan, Hyoi). Similarly, they invented two men from the northern part of the east coast with the office [illegible] and [illegible] Matanchi.

3. Mamia Rinshi also shows the names of these three [illegible] who were the first to become tributary.

become acquainted with one of the most distinguished Aino, the aged Inotsaburo, upon whom, as an Aino elder, the Japanese had conferred a number of rights and duties, and who is discussed written in the Matanchi language, which his father had received at one time from the Matanchi, and, consequently, the office of a tribute journey to Sam-min on the Amgun, and through which he, as an intermediary, was able to obtain a number of furs and a tribute, or, more accurately, a special statement in furs, was collected from the aos as from the other only in Sam-min for the granting of permission to trade. The Gilyak, on the other hand, were required to pay tribute to the Matanchi-Chinese authorities, and in their territory, in Mylki near the mouth of the Gorin, there was a permanent residence for Matanchi officials who were entrusted to collect the tribute. From this comparison it [illegible] that the Aino and the Gilyak were subjugated Matanchi's tribute in the Amur region and made to bear-min on the Amgun. Such a misunderstanding could arise all the more easily since Sakhalin Aino, according to his own words, had himself never been in Matanchi country.

/811 cont. /

[811] and reliable Japanese traveler. Krusenstern (1), for instance,

1. Reise um die Welt (Voyage around the World), Petersburg, 1810-1812.

reported that when he met the Gilyak ("Tatars") in Kaidobita Bay, near the northern tip of Sakhalin (1803) — it was pointed out above (p. 67), as I mentioned, he was unable to distinguish the one — one of them was distinguished from the rest by his clothing, which was a red silk robe and a Chinese cap. Since the Gilyak were, at the time, and "without doubt" was their chief — evidently, therefore, one of those [illegible] or [illegible] appointed by the Matanchi and Japanese officials. Collected by the importance, however, is a second, very definite sounding report which we owe to Fr. Schmidt, who, in 1854, in Sapyo, in

1. "Histor. Berich," etc., p. 94.

Aino and Sakhalin Gilyak to the Matanchi likewise did not exist, and that there were none of these appointed chiefs or elders among them. "Since the Gilyak were subjugated by other tribes, they refused to pay tribute to the Matanchi. The former were visited twice in one year from the Matanchi, and, consequently, the office of a tribute journey to Sam-min on the Amgun, and through which he, as an intermediary, was able to obtain a number of furs and a tribute, or, more accurately, a special statement in furs, was collected from the aos as from the other only in Sam-min for the granting of permission to trade. The Gilyak, on the other hand, were required to pay tribute to the Matanchi-Chinese authorities, and in their territory, in Mylki near the mouth of the Gorin, there was a permanent residence for Matanchi officials who were entrusted to collect the tribute. From this comparison it [illegible] that the Aino and the Gilyak were subjugated Matanchi's tribute in the Amur region and made to bear-min on the Amgun. Such a misunderstanding could arise all the more easily since Sakhalin Aino, according to his own words, had himself never been in Matanchi country.

/811 cont. /

[811] no doubt that the greater moral austerity of the Gilyak is tied up with their greater wealth and the fact that they have been brought, namely, their greater energy, self-control, and moderation, which, as has been pointed out (1), they also show in their drinking of liquor. On the other hand, however, in comparison with the other Amur peoples, the Gilyak were always in a more favorable situation with regard to namely inasmuch as their dwelling sites were the farthest from the two civilized peoples of Ist Asia, the Chinese and Japanese, and the latter do not have any contacts with the Gilyak territory. Some demonstration as effect they have upon the native is evident from the fact that the Japanese and Chinese always come, the former to Sakhalin and the latter into the Usuri and lower Amur region, without their wives and children, always liquor and other compact commodities, try to acquire conclusions among the women and children of the Gilyak, or the Orochi, Oroka, and Olcha. It was therefore to the advantage of the Gilyak, see namely with regard to trade, but also in connection with the Aino, they refused to pay tribute to the Chinese and Japanese, but, in fact, in all evidence of [illegible] throughout centuries and energy (1).

1. See above, p. 719.

1. See pp. 143 and 144.

with the exception of the Amur region by the Russians in the Ilhim, conditions changed, much to the disadvantage of the Gilyak, for the occupation begins precisely in their territory and they were the first and the most drawn into close contact with the new civilized peoples approaching them from the north, a contact which, in the end, was always of the Gilyak, a disadvantage to them, as it always is to a primitive people in such instances, and as subsequently, to a lesser degree, the Gilyak also found it [illegible] to tell his daughter as a countryman as a wife in exchange for the [illegible] of the Gilyak, or the Japanese, or the Russian [illegible] in some other form.

/811 cont. /

[811] people who themselves are obliged to bear the tax-yasik yoke, [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Section 12

Social relations: political and legal position. Social organization on the basis of wealth. National communism. Inviolability of property. Hospitality. Caution and indecision in journeying and weather tests. Superstitious calming of storms. Greeting and expressions of thanks. The custom of giving gifts and return-gifts to one another. Reliability in business affairs. Time reckoning. Calender. Cosmic conceptions. Amusements: singing, music, dancing, games.

In connection with the family, the basis of all social organization, the most essential and important characteristics of the latter among the Gilyak and the neighboring peoples in the lower Amur region were discussed in the preceding section: morality, slavery, blood revenge. It remains for us to consider those aspects of their social life which are less directly and immediately connected with the family.

At the time of my stay in the Amur region the Gilyak were not subject or tributary to either China or Russia. At the beginning of the century the Chinese government had exerched some authority over them on the Amur as well as on Sakhalin and in consequence it appointed elders from among them, who were to collect a certain amount of tribute in their districts and deliver it to Deren. In the twenties, however, as was discussed in detail above (1), it relinquished this authority and confined it to those parts of the lower Amur region located farther upstream around the Sungari, so that the Gilyak and the Olcha remained only nominally subject to it. And since from then on no tribute was collected and delivered to the Manchu-Chinese government, the posts of village or district elders created by it automatically perished, too. For the Gilyak in particular, more conscious of their freedom, they had already in my time /664/ disappeared from memory to such an extent that I never heard them mentioned by the local inhabitants of the Gilyak term for them. On the part of the Russians, however, in my time, at the beginning of the fifties, a firm foothold was held at individual points in the Amur region, namely, at Nikolaevsk, at Petrovsky, at Nikolayevsk, and Mariinsk (1), but they did not pay any attention at all to the natives and left them with their own institutions to deal with and to deal out justice in the order within the Russian settlements (2). Thus in my time the arrangements made

1. See pp. 970 ff. above.

1. See pp. 174-181 above.

2. Only after the conclusion of the Treaty of Aigun (1858) and the definitive occupation of the Amur region by the Russians were village elders (Russ. starosty) appointed by them from among the Gilyak and the other natives and put under the district chief (Russ. starshy /Ispravnik/) residing in the nearest port. Dr. Seeland, who had already met such village elders during his stay in the years 1874-80 (Russische Revue, Vol. XXI, p. 238), failed to recognize the wholly Russian origin of this arrangement, and, therefore, failed to distinguish adequately between what was originally peculiar to the Gilyak and what they took over from the Russians -- and at that time this had already spread very far and deeply -- deprives his description of them of almost all its value.

This is my Time the arrangements made by the Manchu-Chinese for governing the Gilyak had already disappeared, and they had not been introduced by the Russians: the people were left to themselves and within the limits mentioned, could do as they pleased. The following remarks pertain only to this period, certainly a very favorable one for the study of their primitive life.

Beyond the family and the paternal kin-group, the Gilyak have no legal-administrative structure or organization of self-government. Their affairs are individually provided by them themselves with authoritative power, say, for preserving order, for settling disputes, and the like. And there seems to be no need for that among them. Since they wage war with their neighbors or among themselves, undertake no joint raiding expeditions into foreign territory, collect no tribute and do not have to deliver any, they do not need no leaders, chiefs, elders, or Russian settlements (2). Thus in my time the arrangements made

2. Only after the conclusion of the Treaty of Aigun (1858) and the definitive occupation of the Amur region by the Russians were village elders (Russ. starosty) appointed by them from among the Gilyak and the other natives and put under the district chief (Russ. starshy /Ispravnik/) residing in the nearest port. Dr. Seeland, who had already met such village elders during his stay in the years 1874-80 (Russische Revue, Vol. XXI, p. 238), failed to recognize the wholly Russian origin of this arrangement, and, therefore, failed to distinguish adequately between what was originally peculiar to the Gilyak and what they took over from the Russians -- and at that time this had already spread very far and deeply -- deprives his description of them of almost all its value.

The following remarks pertain only to this period, certainly a very favorable one for the study of their primitive life.

Beyond the family and the paternal kin-group, the Gilyak have no legal-administrative structure or organization of self-government. Their affairs are individually provided by them themselves with authoritative power, say, for preserving order, for settling disputes, and the like. And there seems to be no need for that among them. Since they wage war with their neighbors or among themselves, undertake no joint raiding expeditions into foreign territory, collect no tribute and do not have to deliver any, they do not need no leaders, chiefs, elders, or Russian settlements (2). Thus in my time the arrangements made

Finally, they also embrace the communistic principle in that they have no limitations or restrictions on fishing and hunting, except for the places on the river where they have their dwellings, and these are in fact farther from the Amur than large and self-shooters are set up. Thus they tolerate it, wholly without limitation, when the Liman Gilyak go to the Amur River to fish, and the Tschonsi Gilyak go for downstream on the Tymy River for salmon fishing, and the latter, in turn, move to the seacoast to catch kaigu. It is true, the Tschonsi and the Tymy Gilyak have fixed frontiers with each other. Also, in the great forest the Gilyak permit even Olcha and Samagir to penetrate into their territory without molesting them.

Like the communist, the inviolability of property is also based upon the national principle. I have seen even old and dignified Gilyak men who could not resist a small theft, for example, a piece of tobacco, or the like, quite apart from the young people, who go so far as to cut open and pillage travel bags, etc., as happened to me in the village of My in the Amur. I mean, I was repeatedly warned by the Amur Gilyak about the inhabitants of the village of Langi, located at the entrance to the latter. The opposite, however, that the Russians steal from the Gilyak, happens much more frequently, and the temptation to remove a makeshift door or a fish net hanging in front in order to enter a storehouse and to pillage it is indeed much greater. Even the small hatch boxes were not safe for their contents, though they did not contain anything but a few articles of symbolic significance. Thus it came about that I became acquainted with the principal international relationship between the two peoples from the Jilyakizad Russian term for "to steal" (ukradnuch, Russ. ukrasti), and the Gilyak word (emgarunch) did not become known to me until much later. But it hardly ever happens that one Gilyak will steal anything from another. Indeed, I met persons, such as Kimuk in Tschach, Mradamin in Bachach, etc., whom I could fully trust even from an international standpoint. The former, for instance, after a few days, returned to me a cigar case which I had left in his yurt, and there was not one slight pinching. I had even greater confidence in the latter. Since I had to face the danger that a mechanical workshop erected in the immediate neighborhood of my house prepared for me, in the form of three spears hewn from the large and self-shooters are set up. Thus they tolerate it, wholly without limitation, when the Liman Gilyak go to the Amur River to fish, and the Tschonsi Gilyak go for downstream on the Tymy River for salmon fishing, and the latter, in turn, move to the seacoast to catch kaigu. It is true, the Tschonsi and the Tymy Gilyak have fixed frontiers with each other. Also, in the great forest the Gilyak permit even Olcha and Samagir to penetrate into their territory without molesting them.

Like the communist, the inviolability of property is also based upon the national principle. I have seen even old and dignified Gilyak men who could not resist a small theft, for example, a piece of tobacco, or the like, quite apart from the young people, who go so far as to cut open and pillage travel bags, etc., as happened to me in the village of My in the Amur. I mean, I was repeatedly warned by the Amur Gilyak about the inhabitants of the village of Langi, located at the entrance to the latter. The opposite, however, that the Russians steal from the Gilyak, happens much more frequently, and the temptation to remove a makeshift door or a fish net hanging in front in order to enter a storehouse and to pillage it is indeed much greater. Even the small hatch boxes were not safe for their contents, though they did not contain anything but a few articles of symbolic significance. Thus it came about that I became acquainted with the principal international relationship between the two peoples from the Jilyakizad Russian term for "to steal" (ukradnuch, Russ. ukrasti), and the Gilyak word (emgarunch) did not become known to me until much later. But it hardly ever happens that one Gilyak will steal anything from another. Indeed, I met persons, such as Kimuk in Tschach, Mradamin in Bachach, etc., whom I could fully trust even from an international standpoint. The former, for instance, after a few days, returned to me a cigar case which I had left in his yurt, and there was not one slight pinching. I had even greater confidence in the latter. Since I had to face the danger that a mechanical workshop erected in the immediate neighborhood of my house prepared for me, in the form of three spears hewn from the large and self-shooters are set up. Thus they tolerate it, wholly without limitation, when the Liman Gilyak go to the Amur River to fish, and the Tschonsi Gilyak go for downstream on the Tymy River for salmon fishing, and the latter, in turn, move to the seacoast to catch kaigu. It is true, the Tschonsi and the Tymy Gilyak have fixed frontiers with each other. Also, in the great forest the Gilyak permit even Olcha and Samagir to penetrate into their territory without molesting them.

Like the communist, the inviolability of property is also based upon the national principle. I have seen even old and dignified Gilyak men who could not resist a small theft, for example, a piece of tobacco, or the like, quite apart from the young people, who go so far as to cut open and pillage travel bags, etc., as happened to me in the village of My in the Amur. I mean, I was repeatedly warned by the Amur Gilyak about the inhabitants of the village of Langi, located at the entrance to the latter. The opposite, however, that the Russians steal from the Gilyak, happens much more frequently, and the temptation to remove a makeshift door or a fish net hanging in front in order to enter a storehouse and to pillage it is indeed much greater. Even the small hatch boxes were not safe for their contents, though they did not contain anything but a few articles of symbolic significance. Thus it came about that I became acquainted with the principal international relationship between the two peoples from the Jilyakizad Russian term for "to steal" (ukradnuch, Russ. ukrasti), and the Gilyak word (emgarunch) did not become known to me until much later. But it hardly ever happens that one Gilyak will steal anything from another. Indeed, I met persons, such as Kimuk in Tschach, Mradamin in Bachach, etc., whom I could fully trust even from an international standpoint. The former, for instance, after a few days, returned to me a cigar case which I had left in his yurt, and there was not one others were to follow (3). This method was at least more per-

3. Concerning this, see p. 662 above.

ponsful, for it increased the food supply of the people and saved dog food, the lack of which was already making itself felt at the time.

I never saw or heard of a Gilyak who, upon entering a dwelling-house, greeted the host, hostess, or any other acquaintance with a word or gestiue, nor it it done upon his departure. As I gather from Middendorff's handwritten notes, given to me to use, this coming and going without any salutation surprised him, too. With me they likewise constantly came and went without a salutation, or at most, later, with a "adrkmu" and "pouchnachu" (see above) addressed to the hostess. Only in the presence of Tungusic and Chinese do they imitate the /672/ Tungusic Amur peoples by dropping on one knee in front of them and bowing their heads, but this is done only in order to give them a sign that I wish to bring punished by them, since the Manchu officials in Sanatun and other places strictly insist upon such a show of deference. But what surprised me even more is the fact that I never heard "thanks" seems to be missing entirely from their lexicon. I never heard it used by them, either among themselves or to me. Middendorff and Czichon, who had more experience, should like to ascribe this to the incompleteness of our word list, which it in general very poor in expressions for abstract concepts and sentiments. On the other hand, it is true, I never heard that they really had gratitude in their hearts, they would not have a word for it and that it should simply have always eluded us. As soon as the cry "nimach nimach" rang out, the fire, stirred up by the women, crackled more vigorously, a saber-shaped piece of wood (Gilyak warwarn) was used to scrape and heat the stone from the person entering, a bowl of fish oil and rna was offered as a welcome, and, no matter how late it was, a meal was prepared. Then the host and the guest sat down by the blazing fire, the guest of the day were discussed, in which the women also customs may have arisen in consequence of the long trade relations of the Gilyak with the Manchu-Chinese and Japanese, who in Sanatun, as well as in Suiranusi, have their officials and trade agents who demand such capitular benevolentiae in their own interest and sympathy by the Manchu-Chinese Republic. Nevertheless, the energetic Gilyak paid no attention to the djiticr elders appointed by the Manchu-Chinese government for the purpose of collecting tribute and previously disliked by them, and permitted neither a Manchu official nor a Chinese trader to enter their territory. The gentler and more fearful Olcha, however, did not have the courage for such a decision; they were still afraid of a very strong Manchu-Chinese domination and of the events that seem to have followed the abandonment of the trade centers of Deren located in their territory (2). This fear can be explained in part by the fact that the lower Goldi immediately adjacent to them and the Samagir on the Gorin still remained under Manchu-Chinese rule and the Olcha received many a fugitive and immigrant from there. In part it was also fostered by the fact that the Chinese trader mayting here and there among the Olcha, the Gilyak, and the Goldi control, such as had formerly been exercised by the Manchu officials in Deren, now treated the Olcha with even more imperiousness and audacity, especially since they found among them longcustomary, humble submissiveness.

2. See pp. 978-982 above.

The fear of a return of Manchu-Chinese rule and the accompanying insecurity with regard to property, as well as, on the other hand, the Tungusic nature of the Olcha with them in their industriousness and gain-seeking in comparison with the Gilyak, further explain the fact that greater, fewer prey-animals were by far play as considerable a role among them as among the Gilyak, and the social organization which has developed on the basis of it is more or less missing among them. Not that there are no wealthy individuals among them, for example, Tudo in Tschiloi, who was one of the few Olcha who even owned a lyax-fur coat (3).

3. See p. 979 above.

officials in Sian-min a certain amount of tribute in order to obtain permission to do so. Nevertheless there was a considerable difference in the position of these two peoples with respect to the rule over them, abandoned only recently and to a certain extent compulsorily by the Manchu-Chinese Republic. The energetic Gilyak paid no attention to the djiticr elders appointed by the Manchu-Chinese government for the purpose of collecting tribute and previously disliked by them, and permitted neither a Manchu official nor a Chinese trader to enter their territory. The gentler and more fearful Olcha, however, did not have the courage for such a decision; they were still afraid of a very strong Manchu-Chinese domination and of the events that seem to have followed the abandonment of the trade centers of Deren located in their territory (2). This fear can be explained in part by the fact that ual phases of the festival. On the other hand, there are very considerable differences between them, determined chiefly by the different method of sowing and the spaciousness of the dwellings of the continental and the Sakhalin Gilyak.

2. See pp. 978-982 above.

As plain as the exterior of an earth-yurt of the latter is -- a low conical, snow-covered hemispherical dwelling with a smoke-hole on top by the smoke streaming out -- its external decoration for the bear festival is just as shabby. As a rule, only one or two young trees, stripped of their lower branches, are stuck in the snow at the entrance to the yurt. With a few ragged-shaped, curled wooden-shavings (kach) hanging down from their crowns and from the branches of neighboring shrubs, they do not have the most eaten in the same dwelling a few weeks or a month previously or even in the course of the year in its skin used for the exterior decoration. Only in the front of the dwelling, some yurts also set up obliquely into the snow and sometimes supported by a small railing, and in front of it a pair bundle of wooden curls (kach) (2).

2. See the woodcut. p. 1186.

I saw this. for example, in Tyk. Dul. Jelik. Pud-wo. and elsewhere along the /732/ west coast and in the Tymy Valley of Sakhalin.

which were strung in a row by means of the Peramina vertebrae on the branches of the brush. and beside them hung Goldi birchbark bowls and baskets. such as are fouhd also on the grave sites. of deceased human beings and which apparently were offered as a sacrifice to the manes of the slain bear.

It is not to be assumed that the Gilyak of Sakhalin differ essentially from their fellow-tribesmen on the mainland in the basic ideas about the bear and the festival dedicated to it. especially since we must think of how the Gilyak spread. that. having come to Sakhalin from the mouth of the Amur. they found a home there for a long period. and only then. oppressed by the Ainu. migrated back to the mainland for the greater part (1). In individ-

1. See pp. 214 /intranslated/. 247 /intranslated/. 889. and 892 of this work.

768 cont.

A rough little rod or a similar stick (wadžach) stuck in the ground is likewise said to mark a place where a corpse is buried. (Bm. I, p. 18.)

51. Gilyak. In September, 1854, the Gilyak of Kulk discovered that one of their burial houses, raff, had been destroyed by Russian soldiers and the ground on which it had stood was dug up, and they came to complain about it. I then learned that the ashes of cremated corpses are under the little houses and variously colored rags, peculiar implements, and the like are deposited there. Near Kulk, in the birch forest along the Amur, four or five such small houses stood together and formed a burial place, while such structures are otherwise often found individually in the midst of the forest. The Gilyak said that in the destroyed little house the ashes of a Nivkhi child had been put in one vessel, over which the same number of sable furs had been placed. The latter was done in order to prevent a sudden dying of their children such as had taken place during the year. Now, since the house had been destroyed, they feared the return of the epidemic. (Bm. I, p. 24.)

52. Gilyak. Every spot where a corpse is deposited or a dead person's ashes are to be found is regarded by the Gilyak as sacred and inviolable to some extent. No Gilyak therefore would wantonly touch a raff. Moreover, the latter may never be interfered with by outsiders, Russians, or Orochi. Therefore, though the Gilyak from Kulk bewailed and complained about the plundering and destruction of their raff, they nevertheless decided not to transport the remains to the villages where they themselves had moved from Kulk. (Bm. I, p. 56.)

53. Gilyak. Investigates the interior of a little burial-house he always finds in it a longish finished and in an upright position: kakk, also tars. The middle of it is pierced, and the hole has a peg, kylms, stuck in it; a strip of linen is wound around the board, and sometimes the lower end, too, is wrapped in linen and decorated with various rags, kakk- or tars-rawk (Plate LXVIII fig. 2). Close to the board and likewise in an upright position there is a little stick, pyk-ngir, parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-ainlk came to the offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid, it consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship, but, in distinction to the Tungus-Manchu system, the specific terms of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of the 19th century some remnants of the group marriage. These relations were brought into play for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were related to one four ago groups: 1) grandfathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (ytyk), the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) mothers and sisters (turngi) and 4) children (ata).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of fishing, into a commercial enterprise, undoubtedly aids stimulated the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred first among the Amur and Sakhalin Nivkhi, who had long been in trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga tooth-boxes for tea, silk, and other luxury articles. They also bartered with the Russians, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tyzhing clan, for instance, were for a long time the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Orok. Thus, long before Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be drawn into rich and poor. The rich could have several wives and 3-4 slaves. The rich made a wide-price always included large quantities of imported valuables, but commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only the medium of barter and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households and marry free women. The slave's property was inherited by his children. Slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 19th and the early 20th centuries, the Manchus established among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, and gyapsin-ulitge (like a village).

After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi clan structure accelerated considerably. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation appeared, in the institution of "half-sharers." Nivkhs who lacked the implements of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox Christians, but their view of supernatural was of a very primitive character. Fig. 2 shows a pole of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about the "master" of the earth, water, and fire. The kilor-khoir was in essence their thinking in yr-ngi "master" of their animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its "master" (ulyr-ngi): the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrandi, or Tolyr'—the "master" of

Contemporary Life of the Nivkhi

In 1918, soon after the establishment of the Soviet government in the Far East, this area, as, indeed, almost all the Nivkhi lived, became the scene of civil war and intervention. Guerrilla units were organized to fight the White Guards and interventionists. The bitter fighting lasted several years.

In the beginning of 1920, the laboring people of Sakhalin overthrew General Kolchak's appointees and reestablished the Soviet regime, which immediately began to carry out the nationalization of industrial enterprises, workers and peasants and the Nivkhi and other peoples of Sakhalin. However, the Soviets lasted only three months in Sakhalin. On March 31, 1920, Japanese landed on the island and occupied the city of Aleksandrovsk. The poorly armed Red Guard units were compelled to retreat and withdraw to the taiga. They became guerrillas. Based, as the classification system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of the 19th century some remnants of the group marriage. These relations were brought into play for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were related to four age groups: 1) grandfathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (ytyk), the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) mothers and sisters (turngi) and 4) children (ata).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of fishing, into a commercial enterprise undoubtedly aids stimulated the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred first among the Amur and Sakhalin Nivkhi, who had long been in trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga tooth-boxes for tea, silk, and other luxury articles. They also bartered with the Russians, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tyzhing clan, for instance, were for a long time the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Orok. Thus, long before Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be drawn into rich and poor. The rich could have several wives and 3-4 slaves. The rich made a wide-price always included large quantities of imported valuables, but commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only the medium of barter and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households and marry free women. The slave's property was inherited by his children. Slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 19th and the early 20th centuries, the Manchus established among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, and gyapsin-ulitge (like a village).

After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi clan structure accelerated considerably. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation appeared, in the institution of "half-sharers." Nivkhs who lacked the implements of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox Christians, but their view of supernatural was of a very primitive character. Fig. 2 shows a pole of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about the "master" of the earth, water, and fire. The kilor-khoir was in essence their thinking in yr-ngi "master" of their animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its "master" (ulyr-ngi): the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrandi, or Tolyr'—the "master" of

In 1951, the Nivkhi collective "Chir-Unvd" collected 200 tentners of potatoes and cabbage per hectare. In the collective farm, which, from 1949 to 1951, the cultivated area increased by 30%.

Along with agriculture, the "Chir-Unvd" collective engages in animal husbandry. Since the war, it has substantially increased its herd of cattle and established a sheep-breeding farm. Other collective farms also are progressed.

An essential prerequisite for the successful organization and development of collective farms was the unification of small villages, formerly scattered in the taiga. Before the Revolution, Nivkhi villages often consisted of no more than 3-5 households. But, in the large collective farms, the houses were scattered without plan. The enlargement of old villages and the construction of new ones proceeded rapidly after the beginning of the collectivization of the Nivkhi economy. The modern Nivkhi villages are comfortable, well-planned settlements. In the building of new villages, particular attention is given to selecting convenient and wholesome sites. Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi, who lived in dugouts, and moved, most of the continental Nivkhi lived in frame huts resembling the Manchu dwelling.

The most widespread of the new dwellings is the warm Russian log house. Near the houses of the collective members are various barns, sheds, etc. Almost every collective farm village is a member of public buildings: a school, a reading room, a club, an administrative building, and buildings devoted to some specialized branch of farming, e.g., a poultry-house, cattle-yards, etc.). Almost every collective-farm village has a kindergarten—nothing the Nivkhi never used in the past. Today, many individual collective-farm families build their own private toilet-houses.

The material surroundings of the Nivkhi home have also changed, and are today similar to those of Russian homes. Some collective-farm villages have electricity and radio. In the Nivkhi homes, especially on the continent, one sees radios, sewing machines, gramophones, and, in the place of the birch-bark wallpaper, and a variety of bought furniture, as well as curtains and bedspreads. The Nivkhi are very fond of pictures; there are now quite a few stalls of their homes with illustrations, placards and photographs.

The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping, and, in the past, wrestling, the living game of Sakhalin, and the game of the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective farms of Nivkhi who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old clan structure. Among the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution, the old religious ceremonies, the clan elders, and the "half-sharers" have the greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the Nivkhi woman was cloistered and oppressed, and now only the narrow circle of her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. Now, along with the collectivization of her husband's labor, her effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to do so, they met with resistance from the husbands. Their wives, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their activities. In general, the women succeeded in overcoming the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. It was usually only a temporary hut. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help.

Many Nivkhi with secondary schooling enter higher educational institutions. In 1953, 2 Nivkhi attended Leningrad State University, and 10 studied in the A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad, 3 studied in the Khabarovsk Institute. Among the students there are also women. In 1953, Lisa Dakhat' of the village of Pal on the Amur graduated successfully from the A. I. Herzen Institute in Leningrad. The Nivkhi Chuner Takanul of the village of Kal'ma is today doing graduate work at the Institute of Ethnography of the USSR Academy of Sciences. Nivkhi with special training are working today as captains, engineers on cutters, teachers, librarians and club directors.

The political activity of Nivkhi workers has grown tremendously. Many have risen to high-ranking positions in the collective farms and industry; many work as instructors with rayon Party committees and executive committees.

Wide educational work among the Nivkhi has been conducted and is continued today by the collective farms and industrial enterprises. The best of these was founded in 1928-29 in the village of Noglikl, at the mouth of the Tym' River in Vostochno-Sakhalinsky Rayon. The second cultural base of the people of the Nivkhi was founded in 1932 in the village of Pal on the village of Yukovo. These bases have libraries, reading rooms, clubs, seven-year schools for Nivkhi and Russian children, and kindergartens and nine-year schools.

At the amateur concerts on the collective farms, both men and women entertain, singing and performing native and Russian dances. Frequently the Nivkhi are invited to the rayon and oblast' concerts. The collective-farm youth also participate in regional Olympic games.

Theatre arts are also developing among the Nivkhi. In the beginning, the Nivkhi, who have lived near the Russian villages, were only the passive spectators at performances organized by Russians. Soon, however, dramatic clubs were organized in the collective-farm villages, and the Nivkhi began to present plays in their own language.

The Nivkhi are greatly interested in sports. In former times they did not know how to swim and feared the water. Today the Nivkhi young people enthusiastically engage in swimming and other sports (especially rowing and canoe seasons) with a singleoar, in which young men and women hold speed races.

The Nivkhi have also preserved native sports, such as rope-jumping, and, in the past, wrestling, the living game of Sakhalin, and the game of the collectivization of their economy, their participation in industry, the unification in collective farms of Nivkhi who had formerly belonged to different clans, and the general rise in their cultural level—all these factors have completely destroyed the old clan structure. Among the numerous remnants of clan relations which had survived until the Revolution, The old religious ceremonies, the clan elders, and the "half-sharers" have the greatest change has occurred in the position of women. In former times, the Nivkhi woman was cloistered and oppressed, and now only the narrow circle of her domestic duties. She could be bought and sold, or turned out of the house. When she met men, she had to cover her face and turn her back to them. Now, along with the collectivization of her husband's labor, her effort had to be applied toward the elimination of survivals of the past. When they attempted to do so, they met with resistance from the husbands. Their wives, husbands and mothers. Some were unable to withstand the pressure and discontinued their activities. In general, the women succeeded in overcoming the ancient custom of placing a woman in childbed in a special hut, built near the dwelling. It was usually only a temporary hut. The woman had to remain under these conditions for several days without any help.

Golds KAS
Olcha

G /657 cont./
614 example, in the above-mentioned case of Nenjdan, drive one to 602 bloodshed, and then the instinct of self-preservation may keep many 628 a one from plunging into the hornets' nest of a strong and large kin-group. Quarrelsome and rapacious members of such a kin group, however, confident in the protective power standing behind them, may be goaded on all the more in their wantonness and may let themselves be carried away to commit acts that lead to blood feuds or that are a direct challenge for blood revenge, as, for example, is said of the Tammla-wo Gilyak on Sakhalin by their countrymen on the Amur. On the whole, however, this abuse does not nullify the beneficial effects which blood revenge with its rules has among the Gilyak, in that with the legal relations still unregulated, it gives the individual a certain amount of protection, and, to be sure, it strengthens the basis of every social arrangement and development, the family.

G
Gi
648 Concerning the family relations of the Amur peoples living
177 adjacent to the Gilyak, the only ones who, as was pointed out at the beginning of this section, can be spoken of here, I must limit myself to a few statements tied in with the above remarks about the Gilyak.

/658/ In the preceding chapters the high degree of equalization that has taken place between the Olcha and the Gilyak in all aspects of the external life has been discussed -- an equalization which must be regarded as an assimilation of the former by the latter. This kind of equalization has also taken place with regard to the family relations of the two peoples, which, in fact, became the basis for the most penetrating and enduring manifestation of this assimilation, both externally and internally.
G
Gi
[582] And the medium that served and still serves to bring about this equalization may be clearly discerned, namely, the frequent mixed marriages which have taken place between these two peoples since the Olcha migrated to the Amur and, after the loss of their reindeer, settled down there as fishermen in the immediate neighborhood of the Gilyak, marriage which even today are concluded between them continually. In this manner the

G
Gi /658 cont./
648 Gilyak family customs and organization 177 brought to the Olcha and in the course o and spread in much the same form amon they were bound to undergo certain mod character, in that they were transplante
G
Gi different people with respect to their nat
157 Olcha, a branch of the large Tungus trib [101] Siberia and the Amur region, are by nat hearted, gentler, more pliable, more ca going than the Gilyak. They do not hav energy of the latter, but, on the other h having their avariciousness, treacherousn
G
Gi These original character traits of the Olc [177] wise undergoing change as a result of the people by the Gilyak -- and this has in p but they appear time and time again, an also in their family relations.

Among the Olcha, for instance, in
G
Gi erally customary purchase of wives, ther 648 of women, though by far not as frequent Gi the Gilyak, primarily for the reason that 583 demands, they more readily come to ter 157 another and with their neighbors of the T for abduction quick and decisive action i in their nature, and, finally, probably a of peace and fear of the evil and bloody usually follow the abduction of a woman however, they most often carry it out ex from where they can most expect lasting among the Gilyak, either because they h intercourse with these neighbors of theirs women have a special attraction for ther hand, the high demands of the Gilyak fo cially if they are to go out of the country settlement impossible. In such cases, wh told me about, bloody conflicts are unav are constantly being f time have taken root

g them. Of course, ifications in their general
d in the soil of a very tural disposition. The e spread over all of ure much more kindarefree, and more easy
e the perseverance and and, they are far from ness, and vindictiveness.
cha, however, are like-e assimilation of this part already taken place -- nd, among other things,

n addition to the gene is also the abduction and usually, as among
, with more moderate
ms in dealing with one ungus tribe, and that s required, which is not lso out of a natural love consequences that-Strangely enough,
actly in the direction
revenge, namely,
ave the most active or because the Gilyak n, and, on the other their daughters, espe-
, often make a peaceful hich the Gilyak often oidable, although they

G Gi /658 cont./
648 do not by far reach the proportions that blood feuds caused by Gi the abduction of a woman and its attendant outrages among the 583 Gilyak themselves not infrequently assume. And this is again 157 attributable to the more peace-loving Tungusic disposition of the Olcha.

G Gi /659/ In general, all acts of bloodshed, and especially 648 those carried out in an unexpected, treacherous manner, are far rarer among them than among the Gilyak, and hence the occasions for blood revenge are far fewer. But it is even more characteristic of them that in cases where such an occasion arises the matter may have a peaceful outcome, for they can be persuaded to desist from blood revenge by a payment, which could scarcely ever happen, or only in the rarest cases, among the Gi Gilyak. For example, the Olcha from Pulssa let themselves be [628] bought off by the Gilyak Judin of Tebach for an act of bloodshed [583] which his brother had committed among them, whereas he himself relentlessly sought to take revenge on an Olcha from Uchtr for the abduction of his daughter.

Gi If, as may be seen from what has been presented, many 648 a harshness of the Gilyak family relations is softened among the 157 Olcha by their gentler nature, so also, on the other hand, does 439 the moral austerity prevailing among the Gilyak undergo a considerable relaxation among them. To a large extent this is due to the fact that they do not have the energy of the Gilyak in refusing the Chinese merchants and traders entry into their territory, much less a more or less permanent stay in it. As has already been mentioned (1), there are many places in Olcha

1. See pp. 144 and 946 above.

territory where Chinese traders stay among them temporary or even almost permanently, and they have all the more corrupting an effect upon them because they have no dwellings of their own, but, with concubines taken from among the natives themselves, set up their domicile in their houses and in their midst. Also, the liquor that these traders always have at their disposal con-000 tributes no little to the corruption of morals. Accordingly, the

NTIN

FRO

RECE

FICH

NUED

OM

DING

HE

general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves. Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen. If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

672

672 LIABILITY--conception of the liability of individuals and groups for breaches of legal norms; extension of liability to others (e.g., parents, spouse, sibmates); exemptions from legal responsibility (e.g., minors, insane persons, chiefs); recognition of extenuating or aggravating circumstances (e.g., youth or old age, sex or class status of aggressor or victim, accident, self-defense, intent, negligence, recidivism); liability of animals or inanimate objects (e.g., "the ox that gored"); etc. See also:

Collective responsibility of families 59
Collective responsibility of kin groups 61
Responsibility of a principal for acts of his agent 676 Sanctions 681
Moral accountability 812
Status of minors 868

/95 cont./

*614 628 It is quite another matter between men of different clans. Here the principle is implacable: the bones of the clansman must be raised! To raise the bones is the technical term for clan vengeance. Blood must be redeemed with blood, and only in very rare cases can blood redemption be replaced by ransom. This obligation is clearly colored more by a religious than an emotional element. Vengeance is obligatory not only for the contemporaries of the slain man, but, in the event of its non-fulfillment by them, for the two following generations as well. It is obligatory not only [672] in the case of premeditated murder, but for completely accidental murder as well, even one which is only indirectly connected with one or another person (1). And what is still more instructive, it is obligatory also with respect to animals. Vengeance upon a bear who has killed a man is no less wrathful than it is with regard to a human murderer.

*614 825 672

> 1. One Gilyak of my acquaintance brought vengeance upon his clan when his rifle accidentally went off when he picked it up from the bottom of a boat, accidentally killing the helmsman.

The ritual of such vengeance is extremely characteristic for understanding the psychology of this clan institution, and we shall begin our analysis with it. As soon as the news of a man's death in a struggle with a bear arrives, the whole adult population hastens into the taiga, in order to catch up with the "murderer" by means of his fresh tracks. If they do not succeed /96/ in catching the real culprit, it is necessary to kill at least three other bears (his "clansmen"). If this is not accomplished during the winter, it is necessary to do it during the summer, and in addition the "mountain man" gives them a "tkhusind," in the form of a plentiful catch of every beast.

/96 cont./

*614 825 672 766 But if they are lucky enough to overtake the bear-"murderer" or his "clansman," they wreak upon him their most extreme wrath. As their first responsibility they knock out his teeth with an ax, and, while they are skinning him, they stab him with knives from all sides and heap on him the choicest verbal abuse. Having stripped off the bear skin, they wrap the body of the murdered man in it (if his body has remained uneaten; otherwise it is replaced by a half-length representation in wood) and, seating him in a squatting position on the sled, place the bear head under his seat, and in this way, with loud howls mixed with exclamations in honor of the murdered man and in deprecation of his murderer, they bear him to the settlement. If the bear has not been found, they place under the seat of the dead man a half-length representation of a bear, while the body is arrayed in a cloak of shavings (1). Not far from the 556 with a feeling that is strange for people with a primitive mode of life. There is fear and respect and even reverence in this feeling. That a rich man should inspire fear and respect is a thing easy to understand, but the feeling of some sort of reverence has its own peculiar source, not completely alien, however, to our understanding. In primitive society the rich man ordinarily had his personal talents to thank for his material success -- hence the respect for him. But since all human success is at the same time a gift from the gods, the rich man also stands out as their favorite, 556 their chosen one. The degree to which the Gilyak are inclined 538 to attribute supernatural origin to wealth can be seen from a widely 171 diffused legend among them concerning a certain Tungus, still living today, who amassed his wealth by unscrupulous exploitation and robbery, a legend which affirmed that this virtuous man /380/ had secured his wealth thanks to a golden rain which showered down upon him when he was hunting in the taiga. And this golden rain was, of course, a favor from the god to his favorite.

[778] 1. Shavings are regarded by the Gilyak as sacred, as an object of magical power. The cult of the sharpened pieces of wood (inau; see the section on religion) plays an enormous role in the religion of the Gilyak. Ordinarily they bury chosen ones in cloaks of shavings. Such an honor, for example, is accorded to the mother of twins or triplets, who is regarded as a being of a higher order. Among the poor this finery takes the place of the magnificent traditional funeral garments of Chinese silk, which causes one to think that at a remote period garments of shavings were generally used and that antiquity has invested them with a halo of sanctity.

/379 cont./

675 432 437 427 426 Since the Gilyak have notions of property, there naturally exist among them contracts of purchase and sale, barter, loans, etc., but most frequently of all, of course, these contracts have the character of barter.

426 Two words about debt obligations. The Sakhalin Gilyak does not borrow money; his debts arise principally from the nonfulfillment of one side of the property obligations of a contract. No interest is charged for waiting for repayment. Interest is known [184] only to the Amur Gilyak, who borrowed it from the Manchu, but [177] even among the Amur Gilyak interest is extorted only for the loan of money or sable skins, but never for loans of any other nature. The [614] popularity of debt obligations among the Sakhalin Gilyak con- [672] sists, first, in the fact that there is no period of expiration with regard to debts (complaints about the payment of debts incurred 30-40 years before arose not infrequently), and secondly that in the event of the insolvency of a debtor and his closest relatives or after the death of these persons, the clan, in the person of the clansmen, answers for the debts. The fund from which debts are made good, in the event of nonfulfillment of the conditions of a

673

673 WRONGS--general definitions of acts which violate legal norms; major categories of breaches (e.g., crimes, torts, violations of contract, sins); recognized gradations in the gravity of offenses (e.g., malum prohibitum and malum in se, misdemeanors and felonies, venial and deadly sins); etc. See also:

Specific offenses and their sanctions 68
Sex perversions 83
Breaches of etiquette 676
Breaches of ethics 677
Taboo 784

6Z

71

/48 cont./

174 This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-583 in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also ex-
614 plains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not 615 from the clan of his mother by the term sokh /sic; see yokh on 606 p. 76/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

174 Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price, 583 the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin
614 against the clan of the one abducted, a sin which demands atone-[693] ment, by force or by a material fine from the abducter. Among [689] the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third gen-
[682] eration inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin,
[192] as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tkhusind, among the Gilyak.

174 In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps 583 somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands,for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the superstitious spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

771 In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could

/367 cont./

000 suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy. Shamanism, 756 with its ecstasy, seems to me to be a borrowed phenomenon. It
771 does not fit in with the religious beliefs of the Gilyak. It is true
[754] that he believes the shaman, trusts him to cure the sick, superstitiously fears him, believes in his predictions and in the power of his magic, believes, for instance, that the shaman can kill any man no matter how far away from him this last may be (thus they say that the Rykovo shaman killed the Nikolayevsk one by shooting a bird that was flying past); shamanism, however, is not typical
756 of Gilyak religious views. It is perhaps appropriate to mention at this point that shamans do a great deal of harm to their worshipers.
[754] In the case of the unsuccessful outcome of their treatments, they often pass the blame onto quite innocent people, whom they subject to physical violence and to cruel persecutions if the patient
[158] dies. Also, by suggesting to their patients that their illness is the result of possession by devils, they cause serious psychic disturb-
[782] ances in people whose nervous state is healthy. The prayers of the Gilyak are quite characteristic, simple and clear like their beliefs. "Kur, piongukhia!" (Oh, God, please!) -- the Gilyak limits himself to this when he asks for something from his god.

776 The Gilyak have a hazy conception, or better a feeling, about 577 a supreme deity, the father of all men and of all that exists, but for him it is just a vague feeling for which he does not have a clear formulation. The gods have a relation, not only to the material 577 life of man, but also to his moral life. Moral principles of com-
573 munal living, helping one's neighbors, and respect for the life [776] and property of another enjoy divine sanction. Violating them leads to punishment in this life (sickness, premature death) and in the future life. I happened to hear such a statement from a Gilyak: "If a rich man abuses a poor man, it is a great sin, but if a poor man abuses a rich one (in the material sense, if he borrows and does not repay, deceives him, etc.), that is not a sin!" This statement sounded all the stranger to me, because the Gilyak who made it was a very rich man himself, a big kulak, who did not hesitate to oppress the poor in any way. I do not venture to judge how much this extremely altruistic belief is really the belief of the Gilyak, or whether it is the result of Russian influence, or mere hypocrisy.

/367 cont./

577 In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a 783 clear conception of sin ("umgysh"). It goes without saying /368/
673 that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure,
688 there are a great number of acts, indifferent from our point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person; for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to [682] atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other
[821] misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning
[829] have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

771 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses
775 his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life. There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor. After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight
766 with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars
[764] on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

/382 cont./

428 inheritance immediately. If the widow is old and there is even [768] one young or grown-up son among her children, the family continues to live as it did during the father's lifetime. The grown-up son will be the sustainer and worker of the family. A question of the division of the inheritance only arises when the children, coming of age, subsequently desire to separate. If a Gilyak dies without leaving children, or only leaving children of the female sex, the property passes to that brother of the deceased who marries the widow; if the inheritance is a large one, the other brothers and daughters of the deceased, even the married ones, share in the inheritance. A childless and aged [768] widow passes into the care of the brothers of the deceased, who divide the inheritance among themselves. It is necessary to note
428 that a Gilyak without children or sons takes measures in good 597 time to make sure that he will have an heir of the male sex, which always coincides with the necessity of having an assistant-worker in the maintenance of the household and a sustainer in his old age. With this aim the Gilyak adopts the son of one of his ruvn or a poor clansman-ruvn, who works together with him and is his heir. It
428 is noteworthy that even when there are children, a person who has worked in the family for a long time receives a share of the [606] inheritance. Sons-in-law who work with their father-in-law until his death are without a question his heirs, according to the wish of the testator. Heirs of the male sex receive equal shares of the inheritance. Only in a case where a younger son has lived with his father up to the very time of his death, while the other brothers have separated, does he obtain a little more than the other brothers.

673 Juridical Morals. Among the Sakhalin Gilyak one hardly ever [674] encounters crimes of a mercenary character. The Gilyak keeps his treasures in the storehouse, which is never shut. The Gilyak calmly leaves valuable objects in the taiga, on the road, in an uninhabited summer dwelling, without fearing for their safety. In my presence a Gilyak left in the taiga, two steps from the road, a piece of silk material and a valuable spear. "No one [422] will take it" he said calmly. /383/ If a Gilyak is sometimes tempted by the possessions of another, it is always in the field of

/383 cont./

422 delicacies and edibles, and the Gilyak, like almost all barbarians, 673 regard such transgressions indulgently. During my journeying to the north of Sakhalin, I had the opportunity to observe this characteristic of the Gilyak. They took without permission, or asked me for, dried crusts, sugar, or tobacco, but never once did they 673 try to take objects of much greater value. Theft is a sin among 962 the Gilyak, and he who commits it covers himself with disgrace. And disgrace and shame are a great punishment to the Gilyak. The Gilyak who is convicted of doing something shameful goes out into the taiga and lays hands on himself (hangs himself). Never does a Gilyak commit suicide out of fear of poverty, which, in view of the custom of mutual assistance, is a cause of fear to no one. Nor will any physical sufferings impel him to such an act, but he will yield to the feeling of shame or strong personal grief and take his life.

674 Murders among the Gilyak are very rare and never have 190 a mercenary motivation. Murders are committed principally in 526 the heat of passion and frequently under the most inconsequential
152 circumstances. For example, the Gilyak have a habit of wrestling,
273 and sometimes during the fighting the opponents grow so heated that they take to their knives. In general the Gilyak reaches for his knife at the first feeling of irritation, but he is by far not as prone to resort to weapons as the southerner. Fear of Russian justice has had a beneficent influence on him in this respect. The Gilyak youths, fearing being borne away by passion, have begun to throw down their knives before beginning to wrestle. But Russian vodka has caused frequent slayings among Amur Gilyak in an intoxicated condition. I shall not discuss the murders committed deliberately to satisfy the demands of clan vengeance or conjugal honor. Such murders are regarded by the Gilyak as lawful, although with the settlement of the Russians they have begun to disappear.

683 Insults by word or deed are also an infrequent phenomenon among the Gilyak and end in either a reconciliation or a duel. In the first case, the offending party, recognizing his guilt, atones for it, voluntarily presenting the injured party with dogs, a robe,

674

674 CRIME--prevalence and incidence of crime; common and rare offenses; crime statistics (e.g., number of reported violations, arrests, and convictions for various offenses); types of offenders (e.g., juvenile delinquents, criminal castes; narcotic addicts, professional criminals); motives in crime (e.g., greed, frustration, sexual jealousy); contributory social factors (e.g., poverty, oppression); criminology; etc. See also:

Socialization	86	Crime prevention	625
Neuroses and psychoses	188	Sanctions	661
Organized vice	548	Litigation of civil cases	691
Ingroup antagonisms	578	Juvenile delinquency	738
Banditry and piracy	579	Suicide	762

/382 cont./

428 inheritance immediately. If the widow is old and there is even [968] one young or grown-up son among her children, the family continues to live as it did during the father's lifetime. The grown-up son will be the sustainer and worker of the family. A question of the division of the inheritance only arises when the children, coming of age, subsequently desire to separate. If a Gilyak dies without leaving children, or only leaving children of the female sex, the property passes to that brother of the deceased who marries the widow; if the inheritance is a large one, the other brothers and daughters of the deceased, even the married ones, share in the inheritance. A childless and aged
[968] widow passes into the care of the brothers of the deceased, who divide the inheritance among themselves. It is necessary to note
428 that a Gilyak without children or sons takes measures in good 597 time to make sure that he will have an heir of the male sex, which always coincides with the necessity of having an assistant-worker in the maintenance of the household and a sustainer in his old age. With this aim the Gilyak adopts the son of one of his ruvn or a poor clansman-ruvn, who works together with him and is his heir. It
428 is noteworthy that even when there are children, a person who has worked in the family for a long time receives a share of the [606] inheritance. Sons-in-law who work with their father-in-law until his death are without a question his heirs, according to the wish of the testator. Heirs of the male sex receive equal shares of the inheritance. Only in a case where a younger son has lived with his father up to the very time of his death, while the other brothers have separated, does he obtain a little more than the other brothers.

673 Juridical Morals. Among the Sakhalin Gilyak one hardly ever
674 encounters crimes of a mercenary character. The Gilyak keeps his treasures in the storehouse, which is never shut. The Gilyak calmly leaves valuable objects in the taiga, on the road, in an uninhabited summer dwelling, without fearing for their safety. In my presence a Gilyak left in the taiga, two steps from the road, a piece of silk material and a valuable spear. "No one [422] will take it" he said calmly. /383/ If a Gilyak is sometimes tempted by the possessions of another, it is always in the field of

/383 cont./

422 delicacies and edibles, and the Gilyak, like almost all barbarians, 673 regard such transgressions indulgently. During my journeying to the north of Sakhalin, I had the opportunity to observe this characteristic of the Gilyak. They took without permission, or asked me for, dried crusts, sugar, or tobacco, but never once did they 673 try to take objects of much greater value. Theft is a sin among 962 the Gilyak, and he who commits it covers himself with disgrace. And disgrace and shame are a great punishment to the Gilyak. The Gilyak who is convicted of doing something shameful goes out into the taiga and lays hands on himself (hangs himself). Never does a Gilyak commit suicide out of fear of poverty, which, in view of the custom of mutual assistance, is a cause of fear to no one. Nor will any physical sufferings impel him to such an act, but he will yield to the feeling of shame or strong personal grief and take his life.

674 Murders among the Gilyak are very rare and never have 190 a mercenary motivation. Murders are committed principally in 526 the heat of passion and frequently under the most inconsequential
152 circumstances. For example, the Gilyak have a habit of wrestling,
273 and sometimes during the fighting the opponents grow so heated that they take to their knives. In general the Gilyak reaches for his knife at the first feeling of irritation, but he is by far not as prone to resort to weapons as the southerner. Fear of Russian justice has had a beneficent influence on him in this respect. The Gilyak youths, fearing being borne away by passion, have begun to throw down their knives before beginning to wrestle. But Russian vodka has caused frequent slayings among Amur Gilyak in an intoxicated condition. I shall not discuss the murders committed deliberately to satisfy the demands of clan vengeance or conjugal honor. Such murders are regarded by the Gilyak as lawful, although with the settlement of the Russians they have begun to disappear.

683 Insults by word or deed are also an infrequent phenomenon among the Gilyak and end in either a reconciliation or a duel. In the first case, the offending party, recognizing his guilt, atones for it, voluntarily presenting the injured party with dogs, a robe,

/771 cont./

766 wagn (†). The trunk is chopped off several feet above the roots, 778
532

† On the specimen given to the Academic Museum by the author one of the rear extremities was supplied by a piece of wood specially inserted, which subsequently fell off (see Plate LXVI /p. 1266 /, Fig. 1).

pointed (the top of the stump), /772/ and, with the pointed end, is sunk into the ground at the place where the ashes of the murdered person lie, so that the root, representing the wagn, [674] projects above it. Since murder is not infrequent among the Gilyak, there are wagn in many villages on the Amur, for instance, in Wassj, Kaki, Wair, Kalgho, Tebach, and elsewhere.

According to Surgin's information, a wagn is set up only for a murdered person who was killed by the hand of a Gilyak from another village. On the other hand, if one Gilyak kills another in the same village, the latter does not get a wagn. Similarly no wagn is set up if a father or mother kills the son, and vice versa, or a brother, or in general if one relative kills another. In such cases the corpse is simply cremated. The same is done with the corpse of a suicide; it is cremated, and no wagn is set up.

778 The bird's head of the wagn is said to be patterned after the 532 ugn (Colymbus arcticus). This bird is regarded as sacred by the 825 Gilyak and is kept, stuffed, in the same flying position as it has on the wagn. Such stuffed skins of Colymb. arcticus and septentr. are sometimes seen hanging on high frameworks in Gilyak villages. In the representation for the wagn, the Gilyak give the head of the ugn teeth of iron, which are supposed to serve for him to take revenge on the murderer (1).

[628]
[627]

1. Perhaps the wagn, by its threatening aspect, is supposed to be a reminder of the obligatory blood revenge, and this is the reason that no wagn is set up in cases where revenge is deemed inadmissible -- as between relatives and the

/169 cont./

833 daytime the favorite place for "catching" one's an'g:ej is lo-
* 835 cations where berries are gathered; in the evening -- anywhere outside of the settlement, near the well. In the winter, in the yurt: in the daytime, in the absence of strangers; at
* 835 night, after all have gone to sleep. Finally, there are periods 221 when the group spouses are free from any restrictions. The married men go for several weeks into the taiga to their hunting territories, while in the summer and winter they continually travel about on visits or to festivals. At these times
* 835 there is complete freedom for the group spouses. Only one [521] thing is most strictly demanded: neither the participants themselves nor any strangers who have chanced to be witnesses to the relations of group spouses have the right, under the penalty of sinning, to tell anyone, no matter who, and especially the persons concerned, about such relations publicly. But these demands of non-publicity, established in the interests of peace between group spouses, with the aim of preventing possible fits of jealousy, have in no way diminished the publicity of the institution of group marriage itself, the publicity of the conjugal rights themselves. These rights
[671] have been nationally formulated in legal theses which have [867] come to be common property (the formulas themselves are given below in the chapter on the relations of brothers to their wives) -- theses which each father and each mother consider their obligation to impart to their children with religious solicitude from very earliest childhood. Publicly, the group spouses not only behave with unconstrained familiarity, but address each other with none other than the tender words "my [764] dear little husband," "my dear little wife." But the publicity of group relations /170/ is manifested best of all in the case of the death of a man who is not joined in an individual marriage. In such cases, before the burning of the body, one of the group wives (usually the wife of an older brother) steps out on the funeral platform and in the hearing of all mourns for 835 him as for her beloved, as for her husband. It is curious to 832 note that during the negotiations between the pu and the 585
584

855 and deloused. They are never cuffed, it seems, or punished
524 with the rod. Nor can it be said that boys take priority in their parents' affections. The play and activity of the children consists of bathing (in summer), of scuffling and romping about in the sand and snow, and of imitating their elders, especially in archery. Occasionally their mother sews them a leather ball which they knock about with a stick on the flat ground or on the ice. The children also make themselves willow whistles.

● 674 [222] XI. Morality and Crime.

Crimes are rare and neither manifold nor refined. This negative side of morality is less developed among these natural people than the positive side, that is, moral traits of character. Some of these we touched on in previous chapters; we should now like to consider them in detail.

152 First of all, the Gilyak are a brave people. Not everyone, it is true, decides to attack the bear single-handed with his lance, but for two people to set out against the bear, armed with rifles- this is a very common thing. The seal hunt on Sakhalin is often linked with great danger because of the floating ice. Even traveling along the coast of the Amur in windy weather with the kind of vessels the Gilyak have is certainly not without danger, especially if one remembers what poor swimmers the Gilyak are.

It cannot be said that resignation and patience in the endurance of bodily pain falls entirely within the realm of morality, for it can also be a result of insensitivity of the nervous system; nevertheless, a certain self-effacement in such instances is not to be denied. And the Gilyak bear suffering extremely well. Not only hunger and physical pain, but the ailments connected with the latter, they endure steadfastly. Loss of eye-sight, paralysis of the limbs. etc., do not call forth lamentations or complaints. [223]

592 The quiet way in which several families live in one house, 578 or more accurately, in one room, already points to 888 peaceableness and forbearance. I repeatedly heard neighboring peasants praise the Gilyak for these characteristics; and they marveled particularly that the "women folk got along together". The house usually belongs to one owner, but the occupants do not pay him anything, they merely help him with repairs, wood cutting, etc. The old people of both sexes in the house are sometimes called the "masters of the house". In general, old people are respected. They are not permitted to work, they are given all they need, and their advice is followed.

675

675 CONTRACTS--conception of contractual relations; agreements, bargains, promises, and their enforceability; consideration; rights, privileges, and powers of contracting parties; procedure in the conclusion of contracts (e.g., presence of witnesses); terms and stipulations; types of contracts (e.g., legal forms, oral agreements, covenants); etc. See also:

Builders and contractors 331
Loans 426
Leases 427
Sales 432
Insurance contracts 456
Labor relations 466
Social relationships 571
Marriage contracts 584
Treaties and alliances 648
Penalties for breaches of contract 686
Religious vows 782

/261 cont./

584 the parents of the bride a male dog, not, however, a female.
585 It is not permitted to remove the fillet, since it is considered
[601] testimony of betrothal. From this moment on the children are considered husband and wife, and they address each other with these terms. Usually in such cases the young wife moves to the house of her young husband, sleeps with him in the same bed, passes her childhood years with him, and upon attainment of sexual maturity begins marital life.

58 This haste to conclude a marriage between children is 182 explained by many reasons, but the basic reason amounts to a timely strengthening of the right to marriage. In a few years another such lawful claimant may be born or grow up, the son of another sister or female first cousin. Furthermore, in the course of time the economic situation of both sides may change. The father of the bride may become needy and be seduced by a bride price from the outside. There are cases, of course, where the cousins becoming betrothed are of different ages; the bridegroom, the son of the sister, may be a grown lad, while the daughter of the brother /262/ is just an infant, but the procedure is exactly the same. A Gilyak
585 of my acquaintance, Pletun, a lad of about 20, married in
[582] this fashion his five-year-old cousin, the daughter of Iksus, took her into his house at once, commenced to sleep with her, and began actual cohabitation with her when she reported her first menstruation to him. But it also happens
• [675] that a child-wife remains in the home of her parents and moves to her husband's house at the first appearance of menstruation, but no formalities are required for this move; the initial agreement is considered a public act, known to all. "All Sakhalin knows of this," a Gilyak of my acquaintance, who had betrothed his little daughter to the son of his sister,
585 said to me with great pathos. In such marriages not only is 583 bride price not due, but there is not even any question of it. There is merely an exchange of gifts, but even this is not at [178] all obligatory. Such is the simple arrangement in cases of [184] betrothal of the children of male and female first cousins,

/272 cont./

584 The bride is not present during 184 the betrothal, the mother has the [171] absolute right of veto, and the kinsmen play no role.

last moment, when the bridegroom arrives to take her home 584 with him. The disregarding of wishes of the daughter is not
174 at all, I believe, the result of the newer stage of marriage accompanied by bride price, where the parents have motive of self-interest in the choosing of a bridegroom; it is rather a remnant of the orthodox marriage, where from her very childhood a girl was destined by obligation for one definite person or limited group of persons, and there could be no question of full freedom of choice, all the more because th marriages were actually concluded soon after birth.

584 The procedure of betrothal. In the procedure of betrothal among the Gilyak we find features which are repeated with remarkable similarity among the most diverse peoples. Th procedure of betrothal is a true diplomatic war surrounded b a whole series of military stratagems. In serious cases, wh the matter involves a very wealthy and renowned girl, the matchmakers try to catch the other side unawares and at fir conceal the object of their coming. Arriving at the house, say that they are passing by. Casually they bring out vodk from their travel provisions. The unsuspecting hosts readily accept the treat, and, when they are in a good mood, the matchmakers begin to recall that they are old friends of the host, that he has never refused their requests, and they hope that in the future they shall not meet with refusals. The host, suspecting nothing, promises zealously to assist them with everything at his disposal. And here they take him at his word and come to the point. /273/ He can no
• [675] longer decline, for he has given his word. In order that th host may not repudiate his promise, the matchmakers have taken timely, precautionary measures to invite witnesses.

/273 cont./

84 Even without invitations, however, there are always wit-75 nesses, for the arrival of countrymen immediately becomes known and the yurt is filled with outsiders. Repudiation of 86] one's word is a serious matter, for which one is summoned to court, and this results in a large fine.

84 But even if the matchmakers do not wish to or cannot con-76 ceal the purpose of their coming, etiquette does not permit them to come immediately to the point.

At first they speak about the most unrelated things, not giving any hint of the purpose of their coming. During the conversation, drinks are passed around. Having conversed enough concerning "news, events," they gradually come to the point, but they are obliged to approach it through circumlocutions and hints, attempting to discover how favorable the chances are. If the father of the bride disapproves from the start, he immediately cuts off the matchmakers with a categorical rejection. But this rarely happens, for no one goes to make a match without a chance for an agreement.
03] Usually they come, as the Gilyak say, as "equals to equals," for all the Gilyak, no matter how far they live from one another, know everything about one another, down to the minutest details, even who killed how many sables during the last season. The question is merely one of not assenting quickly, in order to bargain as much as possible. Etiquette requires the father to pretend for a long time that he does not know why the matchmakers have come, and, when it is no longer possible to pretend, he must think up all possible excuses and obstacles. Ordinarily he resorts to deprecatory opinions about his daughter, asserting that she is very ugly in appearance, understands nothing about the care of the house, that she is quarrelsome, etc. But the guests are quite prepared for these evasions and have answers prepared in advance. "We," they say, "are not chasing after loveliness; and as for the care of the house, she is still quite young, she will learn, and anyway we have enough women experts without her; as for her ill-temper, that is no misfortune, the years will teach her how to live with people." Or they interrupt

/379 cont./

556 with a feeling tha life. There is fea
That a rich man s understand, but th peculiar source, n standing. In prim personal talents to respect for him.
a gift from the go 556 their chosen one.
538 to attribute supern 171 diffused legend an living today, who and robbery, a leg had secured his we down upon him wh
rain was, of course

675 Since the 432 exist among them
437 etc., but most fre
427 the character of b
426 Two words

426 does not borrow m fulfillment of one
No interest is char
[184] only to the Amur [177] even among the A of money or sable
[614] popularity of debt [672] sists, first, in the regard to debts (co 30-40 years before the event of the in after the death of clansmen, answers made good, in the

E-5 (1890-1897, 1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

is strange for people with a primitive mode of and respect and even reverence in this feeling.
ould inspire fear and respect is a thing easy to e feeling of some sort of reverence has its own ot completely alien, however, to our under-itive society the rich man ordinarily had his thank for his material success -- hence the But since all human success is at the same time ls, the rich man also stands out as their favorite,
The degree to which the Gilyak are inclined atural origin to wealth can be seen from a widely ong them concerning a certain Tungus, still amassed his wealth by unscrupulous exploitation end which affirmed that this virtuous man /380/alth thanks to a golden rain which showered en he was hunting in the taiga. And this golden e, a favor from the god to his favorite.
Gilyak have notions of property, there naturally contracts of purchase and sale, barter, loans, quently of all, of course, these contracts have arter.
about debt obligations. The Sakhalin Gilyak oney; his debts arise principally from the non-side of the property obligations of a contract, ged for waiting for repayment. Interest is known Gilyak, who borrowed it from the Manchu, but mur Gilyak interest is extorted only for the loan skins, but never for loans of any other nature. The obligations among the Sakhalin Gilyak con-fact that there is no period of expiration with mplaints about the payment of debts incurred arose not infrequently), and secondly that in solvency of a debtor and his closest relatives or hese persons, the clan, in the person of the for the debts. The fund from which debts are event of nonfulfillment of the conditions of a 681

681 SANCTIONS--incidence and distribution of the major types of sanctions; punishment (e.g., hanging, decapitation, strangling, burning, dismembe corporal punishment (e.g., flogging, mutilation, torture); property sanc (e.g., damages, fines, confiscation); public humiliation (e.g., ridicule, deprivation of civil rights (e.g., enslavement, outlawry, imprisonment); theory of sanctions; systematization of sanctions (e.g., wergild, crimin codes); purpose of sanctions (e.g., compensation, punishment, preventi penology; recipient of fines, damages, confiscated property (e.g., state injured party); etc. See also:

Formal justice . . . . . 69 Informal justice . . . . . .
Social control . . . . . 626 Prisons and penal labor . . . . . .

usually concerns abductions of women or major transgressions and crimes. Women do not take part in them. The opinions of the older generation usually are decisive. In cases of particular importance the Gilyak council of surrounding villages are drawn in. The penalties for crimes consist of fines in money for the plaintiff, in banishment of the guilty one from the village, or in a sort of ostracism which results in a cessation of all intercourse with him. Occasionally, though rarely, the death penalty is pronounced, but this is of course kept a secret from the Russian administration. As for corporal punishment, the Gilyak are no adherents of it. It is sometimes applied, but there is evidence that formerly it was never used.

Quarrels between men sometimes lead to a duel. It is conducted in the presence of witnesses. The weapon used is the knife, but in this case they fight with the end which does not have the sharp point. The challenger deals the first blow, the blows are parried as much as possible with the knife. The fight usually continues until blood is drawn or one of the fighters is stunned and reels. This fight seldom ends in death. Sometimes when two Gilyak get very angry with which, however, seldom happens- they reach for their knives and begin stabbing each other in disregard of any kind of rules. [228]

A sad spectacle are the man-hunts, i.e., persecution of fleeing Russian criminals, which the Gilyak also sometimes carry on. Such refugees or so-called tayagdaki (i.e., hunters) are a common sight on all large highways in Siberia and the direction they take is always the same, that is, from east to west. Most of them are convicts who have escaped from forced labor. Since the island of Sakhalin was chosen as the chief destination for non-political criminals, these tayagdaki also pass through the Amur region. Very few of them escape in order to go back to their homes, i.e., European Russia. Even though the thought of home, of their parents-relatives and families may arouse warm, tender emotions in even the most hardened-criminals, nevertheless, these refugees know too well the possibility of arrest in entertain great hopes. The usual practical goal which they pursue is to reach the sea-coast in order to be recognized in case at rest and thus to be put in the general class of brodyagi in which they would also be condemned to hard labor. Not only for a few years, after which they could become Siberian citizens. Others, finally, escape without any particular

/48 cont./

This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-in-law; he may not be our father's brother, which also explains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not from the clan of his mother by the term ninh /Ncr see yehh on p. 78/, a term meaning a category possibly related to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price, the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin against the clan, because abducted, a sin which demands atonement, by force or by a material fine from the abductor. Thus the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third generation, namely, the bride price. Moreover, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin, as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood-money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tkhunal, among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps [illegible] comments. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of V then remain /Ncr without husbands/for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the conservative spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; the entire universe, nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/94 cont./

"As among all nearly primitive peoples, murder within the clan among the Gilyak goes unpunished (1). The clan

1. In clans that have combined with Aino, which retain polygamy, in cases of murder within the clan the brother of the mother of the slain man and the closest agnate of the latter (father, brother) obtain the ransom, which they divide in half.

cannot shed the blood of a kinsman, which is the blood of an ancestor. This is not only a religious principle, but a dictate of self-preservation, a categorical imperative of the existence of the clan itself. The strength of the latter is in its numbers and internal peace, while every incident of vengeance within the clan would inevitably be the cause of /185/ new vengeance by the clan-mates of the punished man and would thus lead to endless internal war, which would end in the physical and moral destruction of the clan.

Murder and any serious infraction of rights and laws by a clansman do not go completely unpunished, however. In fact, in other peoples, capital death, the ultimate penalty, is compelled to leave the clan and move to a distant village, thus being deprived not only of all the benefits of the clan union during his lifetime, but of still weightier ones after his death, since the privilege of cremation is extended only to clansmen. In general, however, slaying within the clan are extremely rare; the many speech prohibitions among clansmen discourage the causes for quarrels and litigations, while the extensive communal conjugal rights weaken the fire of jealousy and make superfluous the abduction of women, which is the most frequent cause of bloody disputes and vengeance. Thus, the very practice of the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel. he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/252 cont./

The importance of the role of love in the life of the Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of song material. Not only do the Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. At their assignations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed /or bor, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may be given by the attention given to the bride price, because their love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment are the existence of the clan itself. The strength of the latter is in its numbers and internal peace, while every incident of vengeance within the clan would inevitably be the cause of /185/ new vengeance by the clan-mates of the punished man and would thus lead to endless internal war, which would end in the physical and moral destruction of the clan.

Murder and any serious infraction of rights and laws by a clansman do not go completely unpunished, however. In fact, in other peoples, capital death, the ultimate penalty, is compelled to leave the clan and move to a distant village, thus being deprived not only of all the benefits of the clan union during his lifetime, but of still weightier ones after his death, since the privilege of cremation is extended only to clansmen. In general, however, slaying within the clan are extremely rare; the many speech prohibitions among clansmen discourage the causes for quarrels and litigations, while the extensive communal conjugal rights weaken the fire of jealousy and make superfluous the abduction of women, which is the most frequent cause of bloody disputes and vengeance. Thus, the very practice of the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel. he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/277 cont./

of safety from evil magical influences) and social, as a symbol of friendship, analogous to the exchange of gifts upon the conclusion of ceremonial brotherhood. We see from the rites which accompany the bride moves to the home of the groom that the Gilyak give a socio-religious significance to such symbolism of new relations.

And it is also possible that into the concept of bride price there was introduced an element not only magical, but also purely religious. Giving a woman in marriage to a clan not obviously prescribed was taboo, and every violation of a taboo, according to the logic of primitive man, should be atoned for in some way -- if not by blood, then by valuables. Bride price thus became but a payment for the right to attribute for appeasing the souls of the dead, which, in the violation of the clan taboo. By this alone can one explain why the Gilyak reject a dowry in favor of the compayment of the bride price for a woman as they do to the slayer of a clansman. Such a payment is a material reparation in this case, as in the case of a killing, extends to the third generation in the whole clan.

In the Gilyak idea of obtaining this, persons are ready to take the same risk and deprivation as in carrying out an act of blood revenge. The heroic exploits of such persons who have undertaken long and dangerous treks into the most remote places are one of the most common subjects in the epic works.

The objects used for bride price and the conditions of payment. Bride price among the Gilyak consists of compayment of a dowry of a different kind (valuable, in spiritual and Japanese by trade. Among these objects are: Chinese silk garments and pieces of material, Chinese fur-coats, several articles of nephrite, Manchurian knives, and, finally, Chinese and Japanese money. Moreover, in the Gilyak environment, has land which serves as a bride price. Within half a year the unfortunate woman banged herself. There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from her husband, hanged herself, has land which serves as a bride price. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action. Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with the aid of clansmen, but they will not stop at slaying the husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding

/284 cont./

From an Amur Gilyak named Tyr', 22 years old and from the settlement of Mibyl', another Gilyak, Urgayn from Vayda, fell the desire to marry the wife and were married. Mibyl' and the husband overtook them and began to beg the missionary not to marry them, but he carried out the request of the abductor for a cost-price of 1 Chan (the standard of the Amur). Urgayn and took back his wife by force. The original abductor presented his marriage certificate to the police, who, for a bribe, ordered the woman to be returned to her lawful owner. It ended with the husband's shooting his wife and himself. They return the bride price without litigation when the wife dies childless or does not bear anything, but when the woman has borne her husband is poor and is not in a position to feed a wife, and, finally, when a wife betrothed in childhood dies.

/285/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Amur Gilyak

(Extracts from Notebooks and Diaries)

I.

The Tribal and Clan Composition of the Population of the Lower Amur

A legend. Long, long ago the Gilyak, the Orochi, and the Goldi were one people. They were born on one branch of an older tree. The brother and sister did not know where to go. The sister said, "down to the earth." And the first fell down and became the Gilyak. Settlement of Bulava. Dus (Kugi /Amur/) -- 35 people; one finds them also in Patu, Tebakh, and Magar. When these people arrive, they found one house of an Ulcha khal'o. Mongol -- Shala -- Djakhul came down from the Goldi village of Chol'chi (1896).

/286 cont./

Settlement of Myakht'. Tgna (Lang) -- Kugi from Rui (now Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin).

Settlement of Lyvvo (third part). Dea to Koyma, pure Oroyr (Ulcha from Sakhalin), came "long, long ago."

Settlement of Ahkha. Atkhung Bugi (Alim). Came to the Goldi and formed one clan with them; they gave a Goldi the wife of a dead brother). They, however, live in Tebakh, from which they came to Ahkha five generations ago, as well as to Chil'mi.

Settlement of Tyl'mi. Khok-khal was taken into Kenyakhal on account of the war (before the arrival of Russians). Khokhal killed Kalimlg, an inhabitant of Kal'mo, over a woman. Khok-khal was small. Then the murderer said to his kinsmen: "Give me your daughter or you leave me alone." Then Kal'mo people came and surrounded the house. He got through a chumakha with kahga /Hono dourions/ oil. Then an old man spoke: "I know for him, and he jumped out. The brother killed him from behind with a spear, but he managed (before that) to kill another with an arrow, and again a canes bell. It was then agreed: Khok-khal adopted Khok-khal and gave him his wife; they broke the fire and bought a bear.

Settlement of Tvavo at the mouth of Pervotsky Bay. The Aleng clan -- Kugi (Ainu), which several generations ago migrated here from the south. This clan is also in Tebakh.

(1896).

In Tsura, Chil'ba, and Tyr -- the Goldi and the Nogda speak their own language. If the father is Goldi and the mother Gilyak, they have been better if you had killed a bear and treated it. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in fight of your wife." The women in particular are brave. Now at the present time, however, the descendants of the Kugi people are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Tebba.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase of Ainu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

/299 cont./

calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he replies quietly: "Pilavon khal pural hohkagin on" krygyn" (1).

1. krygyn -- an Ainu slave; ahh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your father, while there you have Chinese blood."

/300/ If a krygyn bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, as economy, and yet he wanted to be considered a krygyn, he was free. Every krygyn was considered a kibal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was avenged, and he participated in the sacrifice. A good krygyn is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khiaj-[illegible]ivaqh, elder women have the right to participate in a trial (they are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings.

A krygyn woman cannot demand a share in court, because she is married. Non can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, ahh, has the same rights as the krygyn. A free one is kinrylygr n'ivuhh ("pure"). The killing of a slave is considered a crime. Women say to their children: "If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila kon -- big mountain bear, mer ede -- tiger), fight with him: I would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated it. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in fight of your wife." The women in particular are brave. Now at the present time, however, the descendants of the krygyn people are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Tebba.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase of Ainu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

Sakhalin

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'ka's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

A representation of twins -- tongch; -- is placed in a little [832] storehouse or hut. If one of them dies, they place a tongch; while [978] of both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chuk-chugund [982] is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon. Kinsmen and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-n'gyvyn, who [976] gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.

766 A dead twin is not cremated, but is seated in Turkish fashion in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounded with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cremated after death, but is dressed in white and buried, also with inau placed around. According to B. Piludskii, the same is done with the father of twins.

[1098] The tongch; helps catch bears and in hunting in general.
[1224] The tongch; is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis [1232] (Slyavo).

Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or 847 even upon the order of the father of the underage husband of a woman.

682 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a boy, the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-n'gyvyn or by Tol-n'igyvyn, 753 but each of them takes a mik not from his kingdom.
776

/338/ A mik can be of different shapes and often is red as blood and hard as stone, but when he enters a person, he becomes lively, "as if he were walking."

732 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in 758 summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

Kikhmas'ind -- to be sick from not getting what one saw 753 and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets well.

/355 cont./ A touching custom among the Gilyak is 614 connected with this steel. When a clan is divided and part of it 682 emigrates to another place, the elder in the clan (khal'-geymar)
164 breaks off a piece of the steel and hands it over to the elder among the departing clansmen. With this steel the new settlers will light the fire on a new hearth at the bear festival, and it will be handed from clan to clan for the same purpose. Hence the expression "to break the fire" came to signify the separation of the clan. This custom reminds us of Greece, where those leaving their native land to found new colonies used to take with them the sacred fire of the home altar.

Another clan festival is held in the spring before the hunting [615] of the seal. On this occasion, too, the expenses of the refresh-[1025] ments are borne by the /356/ clan. With the approach of even-[502] ing, when the moon rises, the entire male population of the clan (again the women are excluded) goes to the seashore. Here, in long troughs, they bring all the choicest viands which, carefully prepared, had been left untouched for the moment of the sacrifice. Then all those present squat down and each throws into the sea a handful from each trough as a sacrifice to the deity, pronouncing the customary formula of prayer: "Kor ulongn-khlal" ("God, please!"), after which they gather in one yurt, where the refreshments begin, in which the women take part.

614 6. The khal' guarantees life and security to each of its 682 members from encroachment on him by the individuals of 628 another khal'. The means is clan vengeance.
[177]

The settling of Russians in the region, it is true, has weakened considerably the efficacy of this institution, but has not destroyed it. Every murder, intentional or unintentional, calls for clan vengeance. The closest clansman of the murdered man -- his father, son, or brother, and in their absence his other clansmen -- must, in the figurative expression of the Gilyak, "raise up the kindred bons" (nyn-vo yozynedzh), i.e., kill the murderer or at least some person of the male sex of his khal'. And the wrath of vengeance is so great that not even newborn children are spared. I have heard that the unhappy mothers of such children, out of fear of the avenger, have resorted to

614 /356 cont./
682 every means to mask the sex of the newborn child. Only women 628 are excluded from acts of vengeance. It is understandable that [1025] from the first moment of the murder there begins a painful, burdensome feud between the two clans. The clan of the murderer lives under a true sword of Damocles, awaiting a stroke from any comer, at any time, and in any place. The clan of the slain man feverishly tracks down its victim, who is on the lookout and in any case does not intend to give up his life cheaply. At the same time, in the first minutes immediately after the fateful murder, the clan of the murderer sends some person from a neutral khal' (necessarily neutral; a clansman would be killed) to the clan of the murdered man with apologies and an offer of ransom. But not always, and, in any case not speedily, is accord obtained; sometimes years pass until, weary of the unsuccessful hunt, the clan of the avenger consents to a reconciliation.

I shall describe one of the many variants of the procedure for 614 reconciliation and ransom. Each of the hostile clans selects from 682 among neutral khal'-s an able and eloquent /357/ man ("khlay-nivukh" -- 628 literally: orator -- from the verb "khlaynedzh" -- to speak, and 537 the noun "nivukh" -- man). These will be the intermediaries between the parties. Each clan provides its khlay-nivukh with a silk [892] gown, a cap of the same material, bow and arrows, a spear, and sometimes a Japanese saber. This is, so to speak, the official uniform of the intermediaries. One fine day, an armed deputation of khal'-nivukhi (clansmen), with the avenger and the khlay-nivukh at their head, appears near the hostile settlement. Then, somewhere in the nearby taiga or on the bank of some stream, the new arrivals light a fire and, so to speak, make their camp. From here the khlay-nivukh of the avengers sets out for the village of the murderer, where in one yurt his assembled clansmen khal'-nivukhi, with their orator at their head, await the emissary. The latter, having sat down and lighted his pipe (necessarily with his own flame), begins to set forth the demands for ransom. The role of the khlay-nivukh consists of stipulating as much as possible. The clansmen of the murderer reply with excuses and with a plea for a reduction of the conditions of the ransom. But the khlay-nivukh

614 /357 cont./
682 of the avengers, stubbornly insisting on his demands, departs in 628 anger. The khlay-nivukh of the murderer goes after him and [1025] tries to enter into negotiations with his comrade-in-arms. More than once the two diplomats seat themselves on the ground and light their pipes, each with his own steel, until they finally reach the camp of the avengers, where the negotiations continue. It sometimes happens that the khlay-nivukhi move back and forth in this fashion from one camp to another for two or three days. Finally an agreement is reached. Now the company of the avengers begins to draw near the settlement, and, after to meet them come the clansmen of the murderer, and both sides finally stop, facing each other within the distance of a bowshot. From one side, accompanied by his khlay-nivukh, the avenger steps forward, in gala attire, with a spear and a drawn bow; from the other steps the slayer, also with a drawn bow, side by side with his khlay-nivukh. The bow of each adversary is aimed directly at the heart of his enemy... A momentary flare-up -- and blood may flow. But the khlay-nivukhi strictly restrain the adversaries, speaking over and over again about peace and forgetting. And this is not merely a ritual, for there have been cases where in that minute the avenger has boiled over with wrath and slain his enemy on the spot. Then the adversaries simultaneously throw their arms, run toward each other, and embrace. The reconciliation has been achieved, and the clansmen of the avenger, together with the latter, peacefully enter the yurt of the slayer, where the stipulated objects of ransom are laid before the plank beds and where /358/ excellent refreshments have been prepared. In another variant, the avenger and the slayer stand close, facing each other, each with his spear resting against the breast of his enemy; when the khlay-nivukhi call upon them for reconciliation, each of the clansmen on each side leads a dog between them, and then these animals are killed with spears (blood for blood).

614 /357 cont./
682 It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the 628 condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the [1025] murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khal' of the murderer participates in the payment, each according to his means. A murder within the clan finds its avenger among the closest kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i.e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

The khlay-nivukhi obtain as a reward for their labors their 614 fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said 682 of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and [537] obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Revenge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven [1162] to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between 614 clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but 682 the recollection of them lives in the popular memory; they tell 172 of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the [177] most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/367 cont./
507 In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a 682 clear conception of sin ("umgyuh"). It goes without saying /368/[1025] that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure, there are, from your point of view, a great number of other, indifferent from the point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person; for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to
• [682] atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and fires, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other
[821] misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning
[821] have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

771 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses
775 his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life. There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor. After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight
766 with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars
[764] on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

9;Hawes--234-235 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak

116, 682, 692, 756

"The cham of the Gilyaks resembles, in many respects, the shaman of the Oroktis, the Golds, and the Tungus on the mainland. Both are addicted to superstitious practices; but the primary function of the cham would appear to be the judicial one for that purpose he is elected. He it is who pronounces sentence in the criminal 'court' of elders, and afterwards carries it out. Legally these were the limits of his function; but [235] actually his moral influence does not stop there, and the criminal's fate largely depends upon him. Probably he was chosen because the death of a murderer, though necessary in olden times, was much against the grain of the kindly, jolly Gilyaks; and the cham, with his powers of exorcism, could clear himself of any sin which they involuntarily felt must attach to the killing of a human being. The penalty of death now no longer obtains, but is commuted in practice to a fine."

681

TIONS--incidence and distribution of the major types of sanctions; capital hment (e.g., hanging, decapitation, strangling, burning, dismembering); oral punishment (e.g., flogging, mutilation, torture); property sanctions , damages, fines, confiscation); public humiliation (e.g., ridicule, pillory); vation of civil rights (e.g., enslavement, outlawry, imprisonment);
y of sanctions; systematization of sanctions (e.g., wergild, criminal ); purpose of sanctions (e.g., compensation, punishment, prevention); ogy; recipient of fines, damages, confiscated property (e.g., state, ed party); etc. See also:

nal justice 69
al control 626
Informal justice 627
Prisons and penal labor 697

548 On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such 837 a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him
684 a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be un-
839 known among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

514 As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred 834 to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers. Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

177 It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of 437 modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are 183 most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards.
576 Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

735 Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The 273 only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about. In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

623 XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution
681 of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they

/298 cont./

A bear festival is held also for other reasons, /299/ for instance, for reconciliation with one's son-in-law /ayat/, kinsman or alien. If a person offends his son-in-law, for example, in making a purchase, he keeps silent, and the kokhal keeps silent, but they will continue to talk until a bear festival is held by the offender for reconciliation (urla lymydek).

A bowl, hyl, for the head is necessary for each new bear festival. The head of the bear is always placed in a new bowl, while the old one is used for meat and the liver. Some can prepare a dish for the bear festival. The bowl for the meat is bound with the penis of the bear. A bowl from which the bear is fed for the last time in the yurt, and always on the side opposite the door, is called pokrov-n'ir.

When a brother gives his sister a bear as a gift, he himself is not permitted to bring it; he must come after it with pomp.
The bear is greeted with zaka-chadir music. When the master feeds his bear for the last time, he says to it: "U'rur humyjit!
Wingan drur humyjlive-!" (live well! When you go, live well."

The gift giver does not shoot the bear and departs as soon as the festival is over, without even tasting (a morsel), while he must bring with him mos' and all kinds of dishes.

When a bear falls sick, then they hold pying-cyvyk and prepare uig, mos', foam all sorts of delicacies and all sorts of berries.

Luk; -- a dog which has been born specially for the uig.

When a dog is sacrificed, its skin, head and bones are laid in a wooden frame near the lening where the bones of the bear are placed. Some claim hang bear heads on trees. This place is called kork ogangof.

V.

Slaves

The son of a slave remains free to the neck (i.e., his head is free), his grandson -- to the belt, his great grandson -- to the feet; in the fourth generation -- the descendants are "pure."
Then he is a kokhal, i.e., a kinsman of the master, and if anyone

/299 cont./

calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he replies quietly: "Pilavon kokhal purat kohhagin on' krygyn" (I,

1. Krygyn -- an Amu slave; ahh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your neck, while there you are impure."

/300/ If a krygyn bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, an economy, and part with him, he would still be considered a krygyn, impure. Every krygyn was considered a kokhal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was avenged, and he participated in the sacrifices. A good krygyn is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khlay-n'ivukh; older women have the right to participate in a trial (they are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings.

A krygyn woman cannot demand a share in court, because she is married. Nor can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, ahh, has the same rights as the krygyn.
A free one is kinyivgy n'ivuh ("pure"). The killing of a slave is punished by the clan. When drunk, they revile the murderer:
"If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila kotr -- big mountain bear, mer ede -- tiger), fight with him: it would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated us. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in front of your wife." The women in particular attack him.
Even at the present time, however, the descendants of the krygyn are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Takhta.

Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase of Amu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

/383 cont./

the women boiled the grandchildren, ate them, ran into the taiga, and disappeared.

Chnyr-chhnaj. If a loss has occurred, they make chnyr-chhinaj, a figure of grass, and beat it (thresh it); if the chhinaj is good, the lost thing will be found on the following day. If it is not known what milk caused the harm, chnyr-chhinaj is hung up over the plank bed and fed.

For stealing bear meat or a fishing rod, the face is maimed.

Kleptomania. There are thieves-kleptomaniacs, for example, Sentukh from Ady-Tymi. After his brothers threatened to kill him, he ran away to /344/ Lungvo. There he and his wife continued doing the same. He has one soul -- a rat sitting in his belly. The things that tempt him shine in the dark for him. The Gilyak confined themselves to depriving him of the things.

The shaman Koyuyt's father, from Tro, once noticed that his trousers had disappeared. He began to shamanize, found a rat in the belly of a woman, killed it, and on the following day the woman died.

● 683 Over an insult it is necessary to fight with sticks (chhhakirvand), or pay tihusind, or take something by force. Frequently they kill over an insult.

787 Fortunetelling with a stone parnkhaind, with a kettle.
The parnkhaind replies thanks to the chekhn. If the kettle swings straight, one has his face made; if to the side -- one has not his it.
If one has hit the mark, he must make a wooden chhinaj, hang it around his neck, and feed it.

/383 cont./

delicacies and edibles, and the Gilyak, like almost all barbarians, regard such transgressions indulgently. During my journeying to the north of Sakhalin, I had the opportunity to observe this characteristic of the Gilyak. They took without permission, or asked me for, dried crusts, sugar, or tobacco, but never once did they try to take objects of much greater value. Theft is a sin among the Gilyak, and he who commits it covers himself with disgrace.
And disgrace and shame are a great punishment to the Gilyak.
The Gilyak who is convicted of doing something shameful goes out into the taiga and lays hands on himself (hangs himself).
Never does a Gilyak commit suicide out of fear of poverty, which, in view of the custom of mutual assistance, is a cause of fear to no one. Not will any physical sufferings impel him to such an act, but he will yield to the feeling of shame or strong personal grief and take his life.

Murders among the Gilyak are very rare and never have a mercenary motivation. Murders are committed principally in the heat of passion and frequently under the most inconsequential circumstances. For example, the Gilyak have a habit of wrestling, and sometimes during the fighting the opponents grow so heated that they take to their knives. In general the Gilyak reaches for his knife at the first feeling of irritation, but he is by far not as prone to resort to weapons as the southerner. Fear of Russian justice has had a beneficent influence on him in this respect. The Gilyak youths, feasting being borne away by passion, have begun to throw down their knives before beginning to wrestle. But Russian vodka has caused frequent slayings among Amur Gilyak in an intoxicated condition. I shall not discuss the murders committed deliberately to satisfy the demands of clan vengeance or conjugal honor. Such murders are regarded by the Gilyak as lawful, although with the settlement of the Russians they have begun to disappear.

● 683 Insults by word or deed are also an infrequent phenomenon among the Gilyak and end in either a reconciliation or a duel. In the first case, the offending party, recognizing his guilt, atones for it, voluntarily presenting the injured party with dogs, a robe, and other objects. In the second case the adversaries fight it out with cudgels until one side admits defeat. The Gilyak are most proficient at wielding cudgels. The Gilyak study this art from childhood, and the children give themselves up with passion to this noble exercise, even by moonlight on frosty winter nights.

/383 cont./

In their civil relationships, as a general rule, the Gilyak display veracity, fidelity to their word, and conscientiousness. /384/Unfortunately, the destructive influence of the rascally population of the Amur region has begun to extend even to the most remote Gilyak settlements. A few individuals imbibe wisdom at Nikolayevsk, and it is enough to enmesh whole settlements in deceit and to breed imitators and a whole mass of interminable lawsuits. The court and mediation of the classmen, still exerting authority within the clan, are becoming powerless when the quarrel is between members of different clans. The Gilyak have the custom of turning to a mixed assembly of "khlay-n'ivukh" of different clans for the resolution of mutual disputes. But at the present time this institution is losing its strength, since the Russified Gilyak, who are simultaneously the chief culprits of dissension and lawsuits, deny to it respect and competence. The Russian administration is going to impart authority to this court of "wise" and honorable men by sanctioning the "khlay-n'ivukh" by election, regulating the time of their meetings, the area of their authority, etc. And a first condition is that the "khlay-n'ivukh" be of various clans. Observation has shown that the Gilyak are able to elect men intelligently and to appreciate the importance of the elected court sanctioned by the Russian administration.

V

Statistical Data

In conclusion, in order to provide some idea of the number of Sakhalin Gilyak and to present their economic status more

684

/31 cont./

periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they actually belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agna-tion, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests.
Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses.
When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal.
Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (yik), and these call the former their children.

/33 cont./

who are affirmed to have the right to this by the great council of the tribe. With regard to this group, she is pirnari and vice versa.
Thus we find identical institutions of marriage in tribes which are so different from one another! The famous punulua family of the Hawaiian islands finds full rapprochement with the institution of Gilyak marriage.

The legitimacy of group sexual intercourse is clearly expressed in the fact that, while the violation of marital fidelity with a person not included in the group "pu" leads to blood vengeance and is regarded as a crime against the Kiranate delicto, or, at best, to a cruel duel and ransom, for the persons of the permitted categories it leads to no retribution whatsoever, causing only some irritation, and in rare cases the moving of the seducer to another yurt. On the other hand, sexual intercourse between persons of forbidden categories is encountered as an extremely rare exception.

More than once I observed even cases of the regular cohabitation of brothers with a common wife, and full harmony prevailed between the brothers. My first teacher of the Gilyak language, a Gilyak from the village of Tangivo, Gibel'ka, the richest and most respected /34/ Gilyak on all Sakhalin, always lived in the same yurt with his younger brother, Pleun, and the relations between the latter and the wife of his elder brother were so secret to anybody. Her children regarded both fathers with identical tenderness and enjoyed equal tenderness from the latter, and, when Pleun died, all his property went to these children, publicly regarded as Gibel'ka's children. Pleun was very rich and could buy himself more than one wife, but he loved the wife of his elder brother, who in no way protested against the reciprocity on the part of his wife, who had cost him a good deal. When anyone hinted about these relations to Gibel'ka, a momentary cloud of melancholy would pass across his intelligent, handsome face, but I never saw even a trace of bad relations between the brothers.

/83 cont./

*614 by virtue of that same proposition concerning the unity of the 602 "adoption." All those women who enter the clan are agnate kinswomen to one another, either sisters or aunts and nieces, so that both elements -- male and female -- each separately and both together, are cemented together by the firm intimate bonds of kinship, which, of course, are profoundly reflected in all the social relations of the members of the clan among themselves.

*614 No influence has been exerted upon these relations by these circumstances that we mentioned, at the time, by reason of which it became necessary for individual members of the clan to take their wives outside the confines of one original kinship clan; the general spirit and the general norm have remained.

But the element which strengthens the union of kinsmen in the indestructible organization of the clan does not rest only on the formal consciousness of a common origin and kinship, and not only on the formal norms of marriage, for by themselves these are not so strong as to hold people from generation to generation in a closed hereditary union. The reasons go far deeper. First of all, there is the religious sanction, which plays what is a decisive role in the eyes of primitive man, originally not the sanction of the clan union itself, but of those [582] marriage norms which created the clan. The principle that which must take wives from the clan of the mother, that the wife must be a blood relative of the husband, is a religious principle, intimately bound up with the cult of the ancestors, in particular with the cult of the mother. The seizure of a *614 married woman is a religious offense against the clan of the abducted woman equal to the slaying of a clansman; the struggle for her sake, or at least the demand for a ransom, is obligatory, as in matters of vengeance, to the third generation

/83 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

/126 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

/149 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

/170 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

/178 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

/184 cont./

[58] [59] [60] [61] [62] [63] [64] [65] [66] [67] [68] [69] [70] [71] [72] [73] [74] [75] [76] [77] [78] [79] [80] [81] [82] [83] [84] [85] [86] [87] [88] [89] [90] [91] [92] [93] [94] [95] [96] [97] [98] [99] [100] [101] [102] [103] [104] [105] [106] [107] [108] [109] [110] [111] [112] [113] [114] [115] [116] [117] [118] [119] [120] [121] [122] [123] [124] [125] [126] [127] [128] [129] [130] [131] [132] [133] [134] [135] [136] [137] [138] [139] [140] [141] [142] [143] [144] [145] [146] [147] [148] [149] [150] [151] [152] [153] [154] [155] [156] [157] [158] [159] [160] [161] [162] [163] [164] [165] [166] [167] [168] [169] [170] [171] [172] [173] [174] [175] [176] [177] [178] [179] [180] [181] [182] [183] [184] [185] [186] [187] [188] [189] [190] [191] [192] [193] [194] [195] [196] [197] [198] [199] [200] [201] [202] [203] [204] [205] [206] [207] [208] [209] [210] [211] [212] [213] [214] [215] [216] [217] [218] [219] [220] [221] [222] [223] [224] [225] [226] [227] [228] [229] [230] [231] [232] [233] [234] [235] [236] [237] [238] [239] [240] [241] [242] [243] [244] [245] [246] [247] [248] [249] [250] [251] [252] [253] [254] [255] [256] [257] [258] [259] [260] [261] [262] [263] [264] [265] [266] [267] [268] [269] [270] [271] [272] [273] [274] [275] [276] [277] [278] [279] [280] [281] [282] [283] [284] [285] [286] [287] [288] [289] [290] [291] [292] [293] [294] [295] [296] [297] [298] [299] [300] [301] [302] [303] [304] [305] [306] [307] [308] [309] [310] [311] [312] [313] [314] [315] [316] [317] [318] [319] [320] [321] [322] [323] [324] [325] [326] [327] [328] [329] [330] [331] [332] [333] [334] [335] [336] [337] [338] [339] [340] [341] [342] [343] [344] [345] [346] [347] [348] [349] [350] [351] [352] [353] [354] [355] [356] [357] [358] [359] [360] [361] [362] [363] [364] [365] [366] [367] [368] [369] [370] [371] [372] [373] [374] [375] [376] [377] [378] [379] [380] [381] [382] [383] [384] [385] [386] [387] [388] [389] [390] [391] [392] [393] [394] [395] [396] [397] [398] [399] [400] [401] [402] [403] [404] [405] [406] [407] [408] [409] [410] [411] [412] [413] [414] [415] [416] [417] [418] [419] [420] [421] [422] [423] [424] [425] [426] [427] [428] [429] [430] [431] [432] [433] [434] [435] [436] [437] [438] [439] [440] [441] [442] [443] [444] [445] [446] [447] [448] [449] [450] [451] [452] [453] [454] [455] [456] [457] [458] [459] [460] [461] [462] [463] [464] [465] [466] [467] [468] [469] [470] [471] [472] [473] [474] [475] [476] [477] [478] [479] [480] [481] [482] [483] [484] [485] [486] [487] [488] [489] [490] [491] [492] [493] [494] [495] [496] [497] [498] [499] [500] [501] [502] [503] [504] [505] [506] [507] [508] [509] [510] [511] [512] [513] [514] [515] [516] [517] [518] [519] [520] [521] [522] [523] [524] [525] [526] [527] [528] [529] [530] [531] [532] [533] [534] [535] [536] [537] [538] [539] [540] [541] [542] [543] [544] [545] [546] [547] [548] [549] [550] [551] [552] [553] [554] [555] [556] [557] [558] [559] [560] [561] [562] [563] [564] [565] [566] [567] [568] [569] [570] [571] [572] [573] [574] [575] [576] [577] [578] [579] [580] [581] [582] [583] [584] [585] [586] [587] [588] [589] [590] [591] [592] [593] [594] [595] [596] [597] [598] [599] [600] [601] [602]

makes the comparison even more valuable. Unfortunately, there have been cases where Gilyak have been wronged by decent people, for example by soldiers who had before that behaved properly. The causes for that may be found in the peculiar manner in which the uncultivated individual regards strange peoples. He is to a certain extent inclined to regard foreigners as outlaws. However, this fact has in recent times been badly misused and misinterpreted by some philosophers. We have pointed out how the Gilyak themselves were able to put themselves in the place of strangers as well as fellow-tribesmen, and to sympathize with them. But one must remember that, where strangers are concerned, moral impulses such as compassion, the sharing of pleasures, the sense of justice, etc., more than ever make room for the egoistic impulses. Everything that tends to repress understanding and sympathy-greed, vindictiveness, etc. - breaks out more easily if one is face to face with strangers. The Gilyak unfortunately put their worst foot forward in their first acquaintance with the civilized world. The French missionary, Le Brunière, who in the year 1848 came from China by way of the Amur and the Ussuri to the Gilyak was robbed and murdered out of pure lust for booty. But this case was and has remained an exception. The village of Vaida (32 versts from the present city of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) still has about 200 inhabitants; at that time it was larger by a third, and seven or eight men took part in the crime, of which none is living.

Actually murder seldom occurs. Most cases are caused by quarrels over the fair sex. The relatives of the murdered one formerly resorted to revenge; now, however, they usually file complaints with the Russian administration. [226]

Prostitution in its real sense does not exist; however passing amours are not too much forbidden. A Gilyak woman whose husband is away probably lets herself be persuaded by a passer-by, and the husband himself is not too much offended, provided only that there are no consequences. In general, virginity and chastity have a certain value, but minor transgressions are not taken very seriously. However if a woman gives herself completely to a stranger she is persecuted.

"Murder is not an upon the slightest pr dictated by superstiti punished by the frien death, generally by c
notion of justice."

uncommon occurrence among these people, being often committed ovocation. They are governed by no established laws except those ion, which differ in different localities. A murderer is usually ds of the deceased, who are bound in some manner to avenge his counter-murder. An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth is their

6

83

/185 cont./

35 marriage, and without the instinct of sexual repulsion or indifference for persons of the forbidden categories, the majority of the prohibitive norms would lose their strength.

How were these powerful instincts, or at least semi-instincts, able to develop?

35 367 In the development of these instincts a powerful influence was exerted by the classificatory system of kinship. From earliest childhood the little boys and girls know exactly whom they should designate by what term, and what sexual rights-obligations are bound up with those terms; thus from childhood they begin to regard certain relationships with certain individuals as something established by nature itself and as immutable. Just as our training develops sexual indifference toward parents, children, and own brothers and sisters, in the same way among the Gilyak, owing to the class terminology and the prohibitions mastered at an early age, there is developed a similar feeling with respect not only to own father and mother, but also toward all "fathers" and "mothers," toward all the brothers of the father, toward all "sisters" and "brothers," sisters of the mother, agnate cousins, etc. And in just the same way a baby knows from childhood the rights of the pu category to its an'g:ej; once he knows from childhood that every tuvn has the right to his individual an'g:ej, then when he is an adult he will be able to look indifferently enough on the sexual relations of his own wife with his tuvn and her pu. But at the same time 35 64 he is far from indifferent when such relations take place with outsiders. Then his wrath knows no bounds: /186/ he kills an adulterer in flagrante delicto, and in other cases he furiously fights a duel with his rival. And moreover, if even his own tuvn allows himself to break the established etiquette -- non-publicity -- in his relations with his wife, he does not remain indifferent, but forces the offender to withdraw from the settlement.

/251 cont./

831 [192] words signifying "my man, my woman," - n'an'kh. The Gilyak themselves consider l of life which everyone must experience in view is very well conveyed in a song which on the Amur, in which a girl, complaining nagging about her passion, sings:

[539] Mother, mother, dear mother,
Has thou forgotten thine own y

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine ow let me be!")

831 882 593 Parents, however, never reproach thei amorous passions. When the youth do hear their elders, it is most often due to purely tions, since during the period of passion the neglect their work and become careless an general it is not even permissible to react sexual passion of the children, maidens inc [684] father or brother finds out about the fornica or sister, he not only may not use force aga but it is even forbidden to summon him to may not even be angry with the daughter. amorous passions of the children as a perfe phenomenon. The mother in particular is confidante of the amorous secrets of her ch [533] songs which I noted down on the Amur, son address their mother, sharing with her their ings, seeking advice as to where and how t Serious remonstrances by the parents, activ [835] [762] going to the point of pitilessness, are encou the case of love for a person of a forbidden such cases, the parents themselves urge the 584 593 commit suicide. Often the pitilessness of t of the father, becomes manifest when love advantageous marriage, one which has bee

/335 cont./

832 In Tenga a girl firmly refused to marry her bridegroom who had been engaged to her in her childhood, but when okht was made, she married him.

684 If one sleeps with another's wife by force, he is beaten for it and his dogs are taken away.

843 /336/ When a woman is pregnant, firewood must not be 846 cut on her footprints; she must not be struck in the face, even [782] in jest. Chukh-chugynd (a sacrifice) must not be made in the langraf (a shed for childbirth), and as soon as the child is born, the woman returns to yer yurt. From the seventh month of pregnancy, the husband of a pregnant woman is not allowed to go hunting or to travel far to set up nooses, but he can go into the 846 langraf. Broth may not be brought from the yurt to the female parent, and when she returns from the langraf, she cannot eat food prepared on the common fire until the umbilical cord (kyr) of the baby falls away, and they make her a fire in the corner.
[782] When (the umbilical cord) falls away, then they feed the fire, chukhchugn-tugur, and have a feast. After that she stops being unclean -- akilaf pach:kyt -- and becomes sik urland pornyng -- clean, and her husband can cut firewood on her footprints. From the day of the birth of the child until the falling away of the umbilical cord -- kyr vakhind -- none of the people living in the yurt or even the guests spending the night may leave the house.

843 For a month before childbirth one must not bind anything 845 tightly or mend anything for another. With difficult births, one 789 must open up boxes, rip open patches, and unscrew the rifle.

A woman must not shriek during childbirth; otherwise she 844 will not deliver for a long time. If the stomach is pointed, pro-843 truding, a boy will be born, if flat -- a girl. After four girls, a boy will unfailingly be born (1).

[846]
[171]

1. Among the Orok a woman is in the balagan only during childbirth; then for ten days they cook for her on a separate fire; men do not eat (with her), fearing to lose their strength.

577 makes the comparison even more valuable. Unfortunately,
509 there have been cases where Gilyak have been wronged 77 by decent people, for example by soldiers who had before that behaved properly. The causes for that may be found in the peculiar manner in which the uncultivated individual regards strange peoples. He is to a certain extent inclined to regard foreigners as outlaws. However, this fact has in recent times been badly misused and misinterpreted by some philosophers. We have pointed out how the Gilyak themselves were able to put themselves in the place of strangers as well as fellow-tribesmen, and to sympathize with them. But one must remember that, where strangers are concerned, moral impulses such as compassion, the sharing of pleasures, the sense of justice, etc., more than ever make room for the egoistic impulses. Everything that tends to repress understanding and sympathy-greed, 77 vindictiveness, etc. - breaks out more easily if one is face to face with strangers. The Gilyak unfortunately 82 put their worst foot forward in their first acquaintance
27 with the civilized world. The French missionary, Le Brunière, who in the year 1848 came from China by way of the Amur and the Ussuri to the Gilyak was robbed and murdered out of pure lust for booty. But this case was and has remained an exception. The village of Vaida (32 versts from the present city of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure) still has about 200 inhabitants; at that time it was larger by a third, and seven or eight men took part in the crime, of which none is living.

Actually murder seldom occurs. Most cases are caused by quarrels over the fair sex. The relatives of the murdered one formerly resorted to revenge;
now, however, they usually file complaints with the Russian administration. [226]

48 Prostitution in its real sense does not exist; however
37 passing amours are not too much forbidden. A Gilyak
84 woman whose husband is away probably lets herself be persuaded by a passer-by, and the husband himself is not too much offended, provided only that there are no consequences. In general, virginity and chastity have a certain value, but minor transgressions are not taken very seriously. However if a woman gives herself completely to a stranger she is persecuted.

548 On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such 837 a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him
684 a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be un-839 known among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

514 As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred 834 to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers.
Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

177 It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of 437 modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are 183 most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards.
576 Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

735 Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The 273 only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about.
In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

623 XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution
681 of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they 685

685 PROPERTY OFFENSES--definitions of and penalties for stealing (e.g., theft, poaching, robbery, burglary, fraud, embezzlement); definitions of and punishment for property damage (e.g., trespass, arson, malicious mischief); etc.
See also:
Property . . . . . 42 Sandluy 879

/302 cont./

578 Quarrels and methods of reconciliation. If a son-in-law /zyat'/ 627 has beaten his brother-in-law /shurin, wife's brother/, he must (present) a pack of racing dogs (three to five; they are sold only in packs) -- kylyn k:an. The first dog is kyly-k:an, the second -- k:akh, the third -- jerkhpe-k:akh, the fourth -- tyly-k:akh.
If the first is sold separately, all of them will be useless. They are placed at a certain distance (10-15 paces) from one another and in reverse order, namely, the first -- kyly-k:an -- last, farthest away, and she must catch up with all of them and the object is that all should come together at the same time, and, [435] if the kyly-k:an arrives first, then it is not suitable. The cost of a pack is up to 100 rubles. The son-in-law /zyat'/, in case of [437] a fight with a brother-in-law /shurin/, gives him such a pack of dogs as a present, and, furthermore, he brings them himself or, if he is ashamed, through another, and they cannot be returned, [435] except if the dogs are poor. On the other hand, if a brother-in-law /shurin/ offends a son-in-law /zyat'/, he gives for reconciliation a silk robe (35-60 rubles) or a bear as a present.

578 /303/ Quarrels within the clan. N left his wife, received back
614 his bride price, and began to carry on with Russians and so forth.
627 The old men assembled and decided to take the woman back, but the father-in-law did not agree: "A woman is not a dog, to try and throw away." Nevertheless, she was purchased for a certain young man. Then N, in Khez', began to storm and threaten because they took his abandoned wife. But they replied to him:
"You did not buy her yourself but with your father's money" (clan money). The matter ended by their giving a racing dog, fur, and two bottles of vodka.

695 The oath. Oath -- simbi chakhci lambe -- in Goldi, chkhyz'u 685 nyydz:rá -- in Gilyak.
825

One must kill a wolf (lygyz') and saw, in order, the tendons on both hind legs from the heel to the knee, and ask: "Where is the tendon for the thief? (ennikhrongz'? ennikh -- heel, tongz -- tendon), where is the stolen tendon? -- jeng:az' tongz' shamdzhna?" The tendon that twitches is taken out secretly and

/303 cont./

685 dried and preserved until there is an argument about a theft.
695 They seek a man who understands the oath -- chkhyz´u n´ivukh, 825 and this gift is passed on by inheritance (now the best clan is the 424 Chkhyzyl clan; Il'ya Tobonka from Chil'bi belongs to it). If 614 outsiders try, then it is a great sin.

A thief frightened by the threat of the oath arrives in the village of the plaintiff with his khal'gu -- clansmen; they make a large fire on the bank.

The plaintiff and his people also come out to the campfire; he shouts: "Pryja´, mygja´, n´i heg:at pkhalgun polagun prydz:rá chigry´ tuur pugutá enan´ivukh, jugut prydókh kaukrá, par:k prydz:rá. Ni sidzymral´ó, sidz:jejmraló cherakh jot´in (prydz:rá) helá eg:ur pkhog:e jakhgujá," i.e., "Come, come down, I and my kinsmen are frightened, I came here with my children; a fire is lighted on your bank; no strangers came with me, we came alone (I do not know anything). I came to you to ask what is the matter (what is the guilt). Well, hurry up and tell me what is on your mind." That one sends an envoy -- khimu n´ivukh'a (a leader during war) with a spear, on which he leans instead of a crutch, and he begins to speak. The thief sends a khimu-n´ivukh'a. Nothing results, and it is necessary to take an oath. The visitors and the local people then arrange themselves on both sides of the fire. The "juror" is also present at this point. They argue: "Ni valchg:aj n´erakh elvg:az´ó -- if I lie, let it go badly for me."

The juror slowly begins to warm the tendon in the fire, the thief begins to twitch, and then he confesses (pyimdz). "Yrk pyimdz: vurará. Navat taktó jakhojló. Ching vark kymlyvé" -- "I confess, /304/ for what else can I do. Think about it yourselves." If it is a false accusation, then the real, absent thief would begin to twitch.

The victim is paid whatever he demands, and, if the thief is poor, the victim is given a woman. The juror is provided for at their discretion. The juror, when they take out the tendon, says to the crow and cat: "I do not know whether it is true or not, do not harm me, for you, too, do not know. If this

● 685 /304 cont./

695 actually is the perpetrator, let the harm be to him." "Ni tajorá mykyslu jag:yd-lu ta-n´erokh tokh elyvgujá. Chi narl´ar: chan majg:okhanā. Mykyz" mra lytyng ivg:aj huktókh elyvg:az´o."
685 While they argue, a crow (ves´) and a cat are thrown into the fire 695 alive. If the crow caws, the man also caws and gets into the 825 fire. If the cat mews, so does the man.

An oath is performed for an inveterate criminal, wishing him death; the thief will twitch in any case. The crow and cat, while they are burning and still struggling in the fire, are told: "Chi tajrodz: furará n´ivykh lerý mra chi unakhana uikhyndor hy nivukhdokh elyvgujá." "You do not know, you will suffer for a petty offense (i.e., you will serve as an example to the Gilyak), following the law of sin, let it go badly for that man."

614 Only a certain khal knows the oath with each particular 825 animal. There is a clan whose k:khal is a wolf -- kekhr: ping chnarpung. They caught a wolf. They went hunting seals. The wolf was sitting on the ice, and it had been carried into the estuary. As soon as the hunters saw it, they approached the bank, bow first. That wolf came and sat on the bow of the boat. They wanted to kill it, but took pity on it. They let it off and let it go. Sometime later these same (people) were hunting, and a bear attacked them. Then that wolf appeared, began to circle round, attacked the bear and saved them. Thus (it happened) many times. This wolf multiplied and was frequently encountered (as a rule there were few wolves there). Chnar-pung do not kill a wolf, but whenever they see one they feed it. When the hunters, having killed many seals, leave the whole carcasses, the wolf spoils them, but if a Chnarpung is left, then he does not spoil them. They journey into the taiga, and the wolf goes along close by; they leave yukola, mos', and so forth there. The Chnarpung may call him atk. Wolves, like tigers, are of two kinds: docile and not docile.

685 This same wolf tendon is used in another way. When some-754 thing is lost, they fashion a stuffed doll, like a man, out of a rotten piece of wood and place a seal bladder on its head. They bind its neck with a wolf tendon, and at night they walk around and knock in the corner of the first yurt, saying: "Pyz´ nyngjá -- look

Amur

/304 cont./

● 685 for your master!" And thus /305/ they go around the entire vil-
754 lage, meanwhile pulling on the tendon. Then the thief begins to suffocate from fright and confesses. A shout goes up; it happens that the thief dies from it.

629 An oath is taken also in controversial matters. Before the 695 court, in a balagan where the khlaj-nivukh sits, nothing is allowed to be boiled; they eat raw yukola.

A stick (kys') -- about an arshin in length with a human chkhnaj.

If the matter reaches the point of breaking the stick, then they pay more -- double. Both big and little assemble in the balagan of the khlaj-n´ivukh'a (the settlement of Karga, 1896).

Women, Childbirth, and Children. A maiden who has reached 881 sexual maturity makes two braids. Women pierce both ears in 30 order to put in earrings (mes'kh); formerly men also pierced their 1178 ears. A wife who is a minor can be slept with only after she be-881 gins to menstruate. During menstruation the woman puts on her 585 oldest clothes and does not sleep with her husband. Women wash
841 themselves, but not with hot water, for otherwise the tûgurmam [302] (the mistress of the fire) takes offense.

191 Among the Kekhal (Orochi) a man who has two wives ac-
834 commodates a guest under one blanket.

843 A pregnant woman must not look at the Amur when it be-
823 gins to break up, in order not to slow up the opening of the river.

844 They give birth in the balagan (midwife -- langyv-mam). In winter the mother spends one and a half days in it, in summer -- three days.

84 One must not cry out during delivery -- a sin. The husband at this time does not go anywhere. If a child has died during birth, the woman must not travel on the river or sea for a whole year -- there would not be any fish. For a month before childbirth, it is not permissible to bind anything tightly or to drive in stakes; it is not permissible to repair anything for an alien.

[789] During difficult deliveries they open up boxes, tear off patches, and unscrew their rifles. The newborn baby is washed with cold water. The midwife is not paid. Until the umbilicus heals, the

/343 cont./

773 the women boiled the grandchildren, ate them, ran into the taiga, and disappeared.

778 Chnyr-chkhnaj. If a loss has occurred, they make chnyr-
776 chkhnaj, a figure of grass, and beat it (thresh it); if the chkhnaj 789 is good, the lost thing will be found on the following day. If it is not known what milk caused the harm, chnyr-chkhnaj is hung up over the plank bed and fed.

● 685 For stealing bear meat or a fishing rod, the face is maimed.

158 Kleptomania. There are thieves-kleptomaniacs, for example, Sentukh from Ady-Tymi. After his brothers threatened to kill him, he ran away to /344/ Lungvo. There he and his [774] wife continued doing the same. He has one soul -- a rat sitting in his belly. The things that tempt him shine in the dark for him. The Gilyak confined themselves to depriving him of the things.

756 The shaman Koynyt's father, from Tro, once noticed that 774 his trousers had disappeared. He began to shamanize, found a rat in the belly of a woman, killed it, and on the following day the woman died.

683 Over an insult it is necessary to fight with sticks (chkharkirvand), or pay tkhusind, or take something by force. Frequently they kill over an insult.

787 Fortunetelling with a stone parnkhasind, with a kettle. The parnkhasind replies thanks to the chekhn. If the kettle swings straight, one has hit the mark; if to the side -- one has not hit it. If one has hit the mark, he must make a wooden chkhnaj, hang it around his neck, and feed it.

/359 cont./

614 family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered i 597 the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had be adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appear from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must b fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ tim this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

614 8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the 422 debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

614 9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of 428 a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, th clan is the heir).

614 10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. W
736 have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a 768 Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased man's "ruvn" his widow and children should go. Before the gath [763] ing of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

614 In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the 627 participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settle not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals o different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the baptism exclusively for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of legal marriage to such and such a Gilyak woman, certificates which give the right and opportunity to secure governmental assistance for the return of the wife in case of her abduction. I have, moreover, met a great number of baptized Gilyak from the mainland, and from my conversations with them I have been convinced that they do not have the slightest idea of even the ritual side of Christianity, let alone its substance. Nevertheless, the Gilyak is capable of grasping the idea of the one God with His attributes as taught by the Christian religion. I could say a great many things about the methods used on the Amur to convert the natives to Christianity, but this /370/ is not the appropriate place for it. As for the Sakhalin Gilyak, an especially talented missionary could perhaps make some progress; many generations will have to pass, however, before the Gilyak breaks his ties with the gods which provide him with fish, seals, and sable. The baptized Goldi and the Amur Gilyak are now pronounced skeptics in their attitude toward religion in general, but they continue to make sacrificial offerings as before. It must further be added that the Sakhalin Gilyak have no idols.
● [685] affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled

/369 cont./

IV.

Juridical Life

Marriage. Despite all the remains and remnants of the old order of life of which I have spoken, the modern marriage of the Gilyak, from a juridical point of view, has a completely individualistic form. One cannot call it, in the strict sense of the word, either monogamy or polygamy, but one cannot call it communal, either.

In the eyes of the world every married woman is the wife of a given individual, and her children are the children of that individual. Violations of fidelity on the part of the wife bring bloody retribution from the husband. The Gilyak who catches his wife in flagrante delicto with a stranger kills the seducer and beats

/370 cont./
684 his wife half to death. Even his ruvn, in such cases, does not [184] escape without a severe lecture, while among the Amur Gilyak
[614] even the ruvn finds no mercy. But such bloody vengeance is absolutely required only when the seducer is caught in flagrante [197] delicto. Fear of Russian justice has weakened the force of this bloody custom, and frequently in such cases the matter ends with 128 a sound thrashing. The modern method of securing a wife grad-
583 ually worked itself out from the old clan arrangements, from the collective and individual abduction of women from another clan and the subsequent reconciliation by means of a ransom, transformed in the course of time into the modern bride price. But even today the custom of the abduction of women exists among the Gilyak of both Sakhalin and the mainland. In part it is a corrective against the coercion of womanly sensibilities in the contemporary form of marriage, in part a reaction against the purchase of wives, not possible for every Gilyak. When a Gilyak comes to like a woman, either a maiden or a married woman, and for one reason or another it appears impossible to obtain her in a peaceful manner, /371/ he arranges things with a group of his clansmen, and one fine day (usually in the summer) when the men are out of the yurt, the boat of the abductor draws near the settlement, and, profiting by the absence of the men, they bear away the desired woman. Abductions sometimes take place by preliminary agreement with the woman, or sometimes without her assent and even against her will. Abductions, of course, produce counter-abductions, even with an armed hand (I know of one instance where a group of 14 men armed with spears and guns broke into the yurt of the elder of a settlement at night and bore away a woman), but in the event of failure the matter ends with reconciliation and the payment of bride price. Not infrequently the abduction is performed by the father of the woman himself, or at his instigation, in those instances where the son-in-law does not fulfill all the conditions of the bride price and at the same time does not voluntarily return the woman he has purchased. To this day the Gilyak regard the custom of abduction as a normal phenomenon; it astonishes no one and is censured by

/634 cont./

583 of the parents of the desired girl, calmly makes use of the customary hospitality, and seizes the proper moment, when the host and hostess are very busy or have gone off, to flee with the girl on a waiting sled or boat. He follows the same procedure in abducting a woman who is unfaithful to her husband. As soon as the wronged father or husband notices the theft, he pursues the fugitives with a few relatives or villagers. If they are overtaken, the abducted woman can be brought back, but not without a bloody fight with the abductor and his helpers, in case he has provided for some, since both parties resort to knives and spears. In most cases, however, the abductor was clever enough to provide for an escape with his willing booty. Then the feud continues and may be prolonged for years, since, as a result of the blood vengeance practiced among the Gilyak, which will be discussed later, revenge is demanded and an opportunity to carry it out is sought both by those who have suffered directly by the abduction and by those who have been injured in the fighting. Whole villages may thus become involved, so that the inhabitants of them, in order to avoid the danger of a surprise attack, carefully avoid each other and /635/ intercourse between the villages ceases entirely (1). In the face of such complications and dangers, the

1. In my time, for example, the villages of Tammla-wo and Talwantigr-wo, along the Liman coast of Sakhalin, were engaged in such a feud, and the inhabitants of the latter, as much the smaller, had to be on their guard against those of the former.

Gilyak rarely undertake the abduction of a woman in a neighboring village, but, as a rule, select a more distant field of operations. It most frequently happens that Gilyak from the Sea of Okhotsk and from the Liman coast of Sakhalin abduct the daughters or wives of their countrymen on the Amur, either because, in view of their distant habitation sites, they need have less fear of their revenge, or, as a result of their being less well off, are unwilling 583 628 684 or unable to pay the high bride price of the Amur Gilyak. And among the latter the Tammla-wo Gilyak are especially notorious and feared on account of their predatory disposition.

/635 cont./

As much harm as the abduction of women causes for many Gilyak, and as bloody as the consequences are as a rule because of their emotional and irascible temperament, a lighter and nobler aspect appears in the motives occasioning it. Since, as has been said, it almost always takes place with the consent of the female party, inducements other than crude male rapacity, in particular a revolt of female pride against the treatment of the wife as a mere object of purchase, and in certain cases even deeper affection defying all obstacles and dangers, may also not infrequently contribute to it in decisive fashion. Thus, in abducting a wife there is a romantic-poetic element which the conclusion of marriage by purchase lacks, and it is certainly no mere accident that among the few Gilyak songs which I obtained, and which, unfortunately, are unintelligible to me except for individual words, there are two which allegedly were sung by Gilyak men (Orkin and Largun) to their wives (Rschywguk and Nymguk) obtained by abduction.

[533] [126]

583 114 Another point with regard to the abduction of women must be touched upon here. Dr. Awgustinowitsch, who spent a year (1871/72) as a physician in the Gilyak part of Sakhalin, maintains that, in order to get married, the Gilyak are absolutely obliged to steal the girl of their choice, which is almost always done with her and her parents' consent: among them the abduction of the bride constitutes the whole ceremonial of concluding the marriage; later the man brings to his parents-in-law a gift which usually consists of a weapon that can be used for fishing or hunting (2). If this statement is supposed to imply actual obligatory

[113]

2. F. Avgustinovich", Zhizn' Russkikh" i inorodtsev" na ostr. Sakhalinie /Life of the Russians and the Aborigines on Sakhalin Island/, St. Petersb., 1874, p. 38.

/360 cont./

among the Amur Gilyak, among whom such a mixed assembly imposes a larger or smaller fine. The elder of the clan (khal'-geymar), even comparatively recently (one, two generations ago), was the social leader, the starosta of the clan. His successor was the khal'-geymar next to him in years. The intervention of the Manchu and the appearance of the Russians on the island brought about the disappearance of this institution. But the khal'-geymary never played the role of patriarchs with unlimited and hereditary power. Such power is not exercised among the Gilyak, even by fathers over their sons. At the present time the role of the elders of the clan amounts only to leadership in religious ceremonies, to the deciding voice in questions concerning seniority in the line of kinship, and similar questions where years play a special role in the competence of the judgment.

11. Clans are often dispersed in places very distant from one another. But after division the clansmen continue /361/ to remember one another, to visit one another, and to lend one another assistance and protection. The Gilyak who hides from the persecution of the avenger will find security and armed protection in a remote settlement of his clansmen. Let a Gilyak become poor or an unlucky year befall him, and he will go to spend some time with clansmen until matters improve. On the western coast of Sakhalin one rarely finds a settlement in which the whole population belongs to one clan; there are no more than five or six such settlements (Pyanovo, Tangi, Tyki, and two or three more insignificant settlements). In the majority of cases there are two or three clans in a settlement. This partly arises from the fact that the Gilyak is often compelled to abandon his clan and emigrate, seeking a more advantageous site for fishing, and emigration does not present any difficulties, for the Gilyak joyfully accept an emigrant from another clan. Moreover, the custom of many sons-in-law to emigrate to the clan of their wife has greatly aided the mixing of the clans. This latter custom, possibly a survival of the archaic clan mode of life, is based on a female principle, according to which husbands entered the clan of the wife, and not conversely, as is done at

/669/

Finally, they also embrace the communistic principle in that they have no limitations or restrictions on fishing and hunting, except for the places on the river where they have their salmon weirs and those spots in the forest where their traps and self-shooters are set up. Thus they tolerate it, wholly without limitation, when the Liman Gilyak go to the Amur River to fish, and the Tschomi Gilyak go far downstream on the Tymy River for salmon fishing, and the latter, in turn, move to the seacoast to catch kangi. It is true, the Tschomi and the Tymy Gilyak have ties of hospitality with each other. Also, in the vast forest the Gilyak permit even Olcha and Samagir to penetrate into their territory without molesting them.

Like the communism, the inviolability of property is also based upon the national principle. I have seen even old and dignified Gilyak men who could not resist a small theft, for example, a piece of butter or the like, quite apart from the young people, who go so far as to cut open and pillage travel bags, etc., as happened to me in the village of My in the Amur-Liman. I was repeatedly warned by the Amur Gilyak about the inhabitants of the village of Langr, located at the entrance to the latter. The opposite, however, that the Russians steal from the Gilyak, happens much more frequently, and the temptation to remove a makeshift door or a fish net hanging in front in order to enter a storehouse and to pillage it is indeed much greater. Even the small burial houses were not safe for their contents, though they did not contain anything but a few articles of symbolic significance. Thus it came about that I became acquainted with the principal international relationship between the two peoples from the Gilyakized Russian term for "to steal" (ukradntsch, Russ. ukrastj), and the Gilyak word (enngarsitsch) did not become known to me until much later. But it hardly ever happens that one Gilyak will steal anything from another. Indeed, I met persons, such as Judin in Tebach, Mradamn in Ssabach, etc., whom I could fully trust even from an international standpoint. The former, for instance, after a few days, returned to me a cigar case which I had left in his yurt, and there was not one igar missing. I had even greater confidence in the latter. ince I had to face the danger that a mechanical workshop ected in the immediate neighborhood of my house prepared r me, in that it almost constantly threw sparks from its chim- y over my house, which was covered only with tree bark and nce might easily go up in flames, I decided, since I had anned a trip, to take my manuscripts and collections to the llage of Ssabach for the summer and entrust them to the Gilyak radamn. The boxes were provided with a cover, tied cross- se by means of a rope, and put in the summer dwelling of the lyak. My trust was completely confirmed.

Finally, hospitality, too, is based on the national princi- e. At first it seemed that the Gilyak were inhospitable to me. ey are too suspicious, too avaricious, /670/ too concerned out their own advantage to be easygoing. On Sakhalin, on occasion of my first visit to the islands, they wanted to pre- nt me from using the fire in their yurt and even threatened with a knife, so that I had to resort to grave threats with my tol in order to have my way. I must say, however, that prior my first journey to Sakhalin the rumor had spread among the yak that the Russians wanted the island for themselves and refore intended to kill all the Gilyak. After I had spent a ter in the Amur region, however, and had formed numerous nections, from which they could see that I meant well and always friendly toward them, they became friendly and pitable toward me, so that a very good relationship developed, I even enjoyed their confidence to some extent. But there always a great difference according to whether it was a ian (lotscha) or a nibach (Gilyak) who was to be given lodgings: on as the cry "nibach pritsch" rang out, the fire, stirred up he women, crackled more vigorously, a saber-shaped piece ood (Gilyak warwars) was used to scrape and beat the snow the person entering, a bowl of fish oil and ma was offered welcome, and, no matter how late it was, a meal was pre- d. Then the host and the guest sat down by the blazing fire, events of the day were discussed, in which the women also 343 These buildings were the receptacles of dried fish for the winter use of dogs and their owners. The elevation of the floor serves to protect the contents from dogs and wild ani-

685 mals. I was told that no locks were used and that theft was a crime unknown.

342 The dwellings were generally divided into two apartments; one a sort of ante room and receptacle of house-keeping 415 goods, and the other the place of residence. Pots, kettles, 777 knives, and wooden pans were the principal articles of household use I discovered. At the storehouses there were several fish-baskets of birch or willow twigs. A Gilyak gentleman does not permit fire carried into or out of his house, not even in a pipe. This is not owing to his fear of conflagrations, but to a superstition that such an occurrence may bring him ill luck in hunting or fishing.

257 It was in the season of curing fish, and the stench that greeted my nostrils was by no means delightful. Visits to dwellings or magazines would have been much easier had I possessed a sponge saturated with cologne water. Fish were in various stages of preparation, some just hung upon poles, while others were nearly ready for the magazine. The manner of preparation is much the same as in Kamchatka, save that the largest fish are skinned before being cut into strips. The poorest qualities go to the dogs, and the best are reserved for bipeds.

226 Though the natives do the most of the fishing on the Amoor, they do not have a monopoly of it, as some of the Russians indulge in the sport. One old fellow that I saw had a boat so full of salmon that there was no room for more. Now and then a fish went overboard, causing an expression on the boatman's face as if he were suffering from a dose of astonishment and toothache drops in equal proportions.

231 There were dogs everywhere, some lying around loose, and others tied to posts under the storehouses. Some walked about and manifested an unpleasant desire to taste the calves of my legs. All barked, growled, and whined in a chorus

686

686 NONFULFILLMENT OF OBLIGATIONS--penalties for breach of contract and nonpayment of debts; definition of and sanctions for criminal negligence; etc.
See also:

Borrowing and lending	426	Enforcement of contracts and debts	696
Contracts	675

/88 cont./

Externally the clan unity of the fire finds expression in the following ways. Only a clansman has the right to light a fire in the hearth of a clansman. Only a clansman - has the right to take fire out of the yurt. A member of another clan may be killed for this. The fire at the clan hearth may not leave the yurt until he has finished his pipe. Any infraction of these rules of the inviolability of the clan fire by a member of another clan inevitably incurs dangerous consequences for the clansmen and the obligation for the member of another clan to pay blood money.

Each clan has its clan steel, guarded by the oldest member, and only with this steel can the fire be lighted when bear meat is cooked at the bear festival, which plays such an important religious and clan life of the Gilyak. When it becomes necessary for the clan to divide, i.e., when a part of the clan is compelled to emigrate to a new district place, the oldest member of the clan breaks the clan steel and entrusts one half to the oldest of the emigrants, and only after this is the clan formally divided.

The bear festival, the chief religious festival of the ashmak's clan, plays quite an important role in interclan relations, binding, through her cult and protection, the clan in whose territory she lives and to which she gave birth with the clan from which she came; from generation to generation she brings into the daughters of her brother and their descendants.

3. One mountain, mao, sea man, etc. -- the common benevolent clan masters of the mountain, sea, earth, etc.

In the section on religious beliefs we have already explained the nature and significance of this type of deity. There are not the fantastic heroes of the classical clans, not the vague, impalpable whose clan celebrations were a simple traditional ritualism, but clansmen close to each living generation, who either died some kind of unnatural death (in the water, slain by a forest bear), and so forth or, very great sin; one might die.' It is a sin not to be hospitable, not to share edibles. And the reason is clear; the gods, as we have seen, are the ones that "feed" man, and principally the clan gods, who provide for not one man, but the whole clan, which brings them sacrifices and which is bound to them by clan ties; to eat, therefore, without sharing with the clansman who is present and, in general, not to feed him, is a "sin" and a direct risk of losing the benevolence of the gods-ancestors. It is not by chance that in all this the "sin" plays a great role. In the fire of the hearth lives the "master and mistress of the fire," a clansman or even an ancestor, who does not miss a single thing that takes place in the hearth; they, as it were, serve as the intermediaries between the clan and its clan gods, and there is nothing more natural than that the gods of the hearth should above all be the guardians of the principle of hospitality.

1; Shternberg--144 E-5 (1890-1897,1910)1933 RX2 Gilyak RX2

/91 cont./

But the ties of the clansmen, living by the favors of their gods-clansmen, are not delimited by reciprocal

/106 cont./

7. One sin. Although the norms and customs of religion and conduct are almost the same for the whole tribe, nevertheless each clan has its own complex of obligations and prohibitions, obligatory only for its own members. The first extensive category of prohibitions relates to sexual norms. For the members of each clan certain categories of women are prohibited for marriage and sexual relations, for example, all the women, without exception, born in the clan. Further, the wives of one's younger brothers, all women who are called ayo and ama, all women who come from the clan of the "nom-in-law"/ nyat ya/, etc. /107/ so that to know what women are prohibited for one or another person is enough for infallibly paying to which clan he belongs. In this category the prohibitions of speech may also apply. For the members of each clan there are certain classes of persons with whom it is prohibited to speak; such classes are the tuvn (brothers and sisters of all degrees of kinship), the achk (mother and aunts of the wife), and others. A third category of prohibitions deals with religious norms in the narrow sense. Each clan, as we have seen, has its own clan gods and sacrifices, its own sacred objects, its beliefs, and, consequently, its own ritual of the clan cult, common to all the clansmen but having no religious significance whatever for members of other clans. These numerous rites and objects of the cult demand the greatest care. The slightest sin, with which is vented the wrath of the offended deities, answers and therefore each member of the clan is not only obliged himself to avoid infractions of his taboos, but to defend them against infraction by outsiders. For such such infraction it is necessary to exact tbhunin. Hence the customary difficulties with members of other clans over an accidental defiling of the enclosure of the hearth, over the taking of fire from the yurt, a bear bone dropped during the festival banquet, the infraction of the sexual taboos, the accidental trampling of the bear festival -- the pots to which the bears are tied, the poles with their heads, the storehouses for festival utensils and bear bones, etc.

/186 cont./

Psychic prohibitions. But side by side with training and, I would say, the hypnotic influence of the kinship terminology, a still mightier force acts on the development of the above-mentioned instincts -- prohibitions of a special kind, prohibitions on psychic intercourse, prohibitions on speech, glances, and familiar address (joking). Corresponding to the two different instincts necessary for the realization of the sexual norms, these prohibitions are of a dual character. Some are created for persons between whom it is necessary to weaken the instinct of jealousy to the last degree, others -- for those who must would having sexual relations with each other. Both forms, both the prohibitions of sexual intercourse and the prohibitions of psychic intercourse, act not only as factors of hypnosis and habit, but it is probably also as an instinct of aversion. To violate one or another of these norms, in the eyes of primitive man, is a dangerous as the most dangerous blasphemy. The strength of the taboo on psychic intercourse in particular and what instincts they can develop in the soul of primitive man can be seen even from Ishhel'sen's /Ischelson/ tale about a Yukagir who by mistake allowed himself familiarities with respect to his own brother, but when he realized his error, he passed away on the spot out of horror.

This is the way Ishhel'sen tells this amazing story, entirely in keeping with Gilyak psychics.

"There were two brothers. With them lived the husband of an older sister, with whom it is permitted to talk. Therefore, both brothers frequently joked with him and played pranks... The brothers, as usual, had a non-speaking relationship. One time the older brother, upon returning from hunting, found the young people in the settlement playing games and dancing. His younger brother, who happened to be dressed in the fur clothing of his brother-in-law /ryat/, was in the

/186 cont./

The younger brother quickly turned around. The older brother realized his error and fell dead then and there "from shame." As usual, they performed an autopsy to /187/ learn the cause of his death, and his heart, according to the legend, was found to be broken in two" (1).

1. Ishhel'son, Materialy /Materials/, XIII.

Let us proceed now to the prohibitions themselves. The prohibitions of the first kind, i.e., prohibitions established between individuals of the same sex in order to weaken the instinct of jealousy, usually cover those persons who are joined in one class by group marriage; among the men, the pu classes, i.e., the classes of persons who have the right to sexual relations with a certain class (women), and, among women, the ar'gwi classes, i.e., women having common husbands. All these individuals, all these group husbands or group wives, among whom outbursts of jealousy might so easily flare up every day and every hour, are fenced off from one another by the impassable wall of the strictest prohibition on psychic intercourse, a prohibition beginning at the threshold of life and ending only with the grave, and creating an instinct of restraint which does not yield first place to the strongest instincts of nature.

The prohibitions of the second category, as we have said, have as their aim the hindrance of sexual relations between persons of different sexes of the forbidden categories. For this reason prohibitions between persons who are mutually in the classes of "husbands" and "wives" (pu and ar'gwi), even if not in a state of individual marriage, are superfluous; any man freely converses not only with his individual wives, but with his group wives, for example, with the wives of his brothers without distinction (in some classes or only with the wives of his older "brothers" (in others), in a word, with those women whom he calls ar'gwi and with whom he has the right

/297 cont./

but we have daughters and in-laws, and it is necessary that everybody know, and therefore necessary that we should celebrate a common bear festival." Each kihlal should buy one, or better, two-three-four bears. They agree. They buy a bear and prepare tmgt. The bear is fattened as fat as possible; they feed it about two years; they prepare meat and kvas for the festival. The time for the festival finally arrives: they play games, wrestle, then kill the bear. Before the killing of the bear, an old man is selected -- he does not have to be the bear's master; he is the nga tkmd' - ni'vuhk; he cannot decline. He says the word to the bear: "Chi pilf pal' urgu p'ach ado; kuhuf pshylava:r chapidogul!" -- then, big mountain (mountain man), make off well our Gilyak dust. Turn around so that I can see you."

They killed it, cut up its meat (the bones must not be broken), brought it home, and prepare kvas and meat. Men compete in a "race" -- vandzy. They call together both clans, men and women, and distribute the bear meat to all. As a rule, the elder consults with the master on how to divide the bear. The main bones are the two tibial bones -- terenq, and the two pelvic ones -- pyjhh. The tibial and the pelvic bones are given to the most honored persons. It is a sin to give the tibial and the sidneys to the young people, the kidneys are very important. The ishla n'vuhh then says: "Kihlal ni'ahkr; dlgro kihkfigo to about: "Ytk-ik?" -- Is it enough?" -- "Ytkr?! -- It is enough!" Everyone approaches by houses and feeds it, and each says his own: "Send the dolphin! Send the little fish!" After this everybody must return together at the same time, for otherwise it would be a heavy sin if they were to meet each other.

/313 cont./

The customary tabu of a hunter is the individual sig. Anybody who touches it gives a dog. If a member of another clan has insulted a lezing (the place for the festival), the vopund kymlyate assemblies, and they judge him; they demand a bear or a lar -- a shaggy dog. Pyl-yr' -- the master of the master is fed each month. If they have caught a tasty fish, /314/ they cut themselves a piece and him a piece, and when his pieces have made two piece, he takes his piece and eats it.

When they build a pila nigryf (house in which the bear festival is celebrated), it is imperative to celebrate a bear festival. If there is no sidneys to buy a bear, they must kill a lak -- a shaggy black dog ("it is just like molk," i.e., like a bear). If the house is simple, they kill only dogs, two to four in number, without regard to kind. If a pot falls on a lezing, they kill two black dogs. It is not at all necessary that a man be killed by a bear for a pila nigryf. After a bear festival, when the members of other clans are leaving for their clan, they take the bear bones and tie together with a thong and their dogs are killed at a special chdzigo.

It is not permissible for a single clan in a single village to make two lezing, but there can be several nigryf. Any house where a bear festival takes place is an nigryf.

/335 cont./
Improvisation of a storyteller-shaman. To compose, ty'ŋund, is not allowed; it is a sin. This is a legend, truth.
N'a'ŋund may (be told) by a ŋ'a'ŋun'-u'lvukh (storyteller) or a shaman, who is helped by a special kind of ketkn (mif-'lvukh-ketkn, who sits on the tongue of the speaker. When inquiring about the possibility of improvisation, Kolmyt (a shaman) said, "I can," and began to improvise.

With my own eyes I saw that this was inspiration by the richness and elastic quickness of the flow of words and the force of the speech. Tyum listened with ecstasy and with interest asked for explanations.

Even before that he sang songs. The melody of the song was far from that which accompanies ŋ'a'-ŋund; there is a great deal of grace and tenderness in it.

In places a quiet tenor vibrates beautifully with the sounds of a cello and in placer flows into the thinnest pianissimo, while thricks and artificial throat vibrations sound with tremendous dissonance. The entire song is sung without stopping for a breath, and at the end of a stanza the shaman comes to the end by abruptly cutting off with the words "hand fan" -- "that it is said." Frequently, he finishes his song covered with perspiration.

Declamation and singing in narration. 1. In a nar'-ŋund, a) first humming, b) then -- monotonous, vibrating, doleful singing with all one's might, ending in c) fortitude with exhaling.

2. In descriptions -- a single-tone recitative.

3. Dramatism: the artistic communication of conversations in a rhythmic recitative is especially good. If one becomes accustomed to it, it is very melodious.

4. Those present support him with yells: "Ola' epo), epo)" etc.

The kenchkh is a bird which comes on the wind. They pull on a thong with the kenchkh during the song. Two men (one a shaman) cast a rope, and the kenchkh seizes it and pulls over the people.

/335 cont./
of the fire, the tugurmam, lives there). Then they feed the four nan. Furthermore, a hole is dug at the left front corner of the hearth, and they put sacrifices there, saying, "Ungur s'ŋd, pehkinŋ kan k'khalaf khavyt hunivayoh" -- "after eating well, make your children live without sickness," and after these words the hole is filled up. Finally, they feed the kaftong ashk -- "the bitch looking into a behind." At night, when everybody has gone to bed, it is necessary to burn a fir and say a prayer.

When the hearth is renewed in the winter quarters, small nan are set with sacrifices. In the evening they place three firs, tie them up with yaranka and puchka, and then, when everyone has gone to sleep, they throw sacrifices up through the pipe one is thrown by the women, another by the men. Before the beginning of the festival, the hearth is cleaned, covered with fresh earth, and lighted with the clan steel.

The spirits living in the house. Tav yzin -- the master of the house -- four chihnai, two male, two female, all nila hejmar -- old men.

Tavyzing tugur ysing. This ysing was a tribesman in the past. His soul lives in the yurt in the tugur (flint box).

When the yurt heads, the tugur must not be touched.

If one breaks the tugur (box), he pays a fine.

Lymyrh-mam -- mistress of the threshold. She is in fish skin, hunchbacked, gray, hails crying children. When the ceremony of stamping the threshold is held, when a woman leaves for another clan, she sits in the corner at the entrance, near the cups which are placed on both sides of the threshold.

IV.

Women, Childbirth, and Children

Means for love. There is medicine to make another person fall in love with one. The brain of a cuckoo is mixed into tobacco (then a man soon dies); or a cuckoo feather is sewed in a dress. The girl then goes around like a mad person.

/363 cont./
deception and exploitation everywhere, but by degrees they will end up by making use of the same weapon. The Sakhalin Gilyak have a good chance of maintaining themselves longest of all since they are farthest from the center of settlements. But Russian influence makes itself felt even on them. From all the settlements they go out to work for wages and go to make their purchases at Nikolayevsk, and every Gilyak who returns from work to his native settlement brings back the same atmosphere as the youth who returns to a Russian village from work in the big cities. Moreover, work in the tower, with its varying fortunes, ever more /364/ ever more destroys that primitive equality which constitutes the dominant feature of the simple economic life of such peoples as the Gilyak. Together with the wealth that they have amassed in the new environment, people bring back the economic customs of that environment. But for the present, let us not look into the new phenomena in the life of the Gilyak; let us turn now to their still unshaken foundations.

III.

Religious Views

Though the dominant feature of the polytheism of the Gilyak is its anthropomorphism, the worship of the powers of nature lies at its foundation. Thus, among them, fire is a deity, "a small-small deity," it is true, but one nevertheless. To the question "why?" a Gilyak replies: "But without fire how can one live?" It is considered a sin to put out a fire in the hearth; even damaging the fence of a hearth is a sin. During the season of seal hunting, or when a newborn child is in the yurt, and in many other cases, it is considered a sin to carry the fire out of the yurt. It is to fire, as to a divine element, that the Gilyak entrusts the bodies of his dead. In the hierarchy of deities, however, fire is far from occupying first place. The fact that obtaining fire is within the power of man greatly diminishes its majesty in the eyes of the

/367 cont./
In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a clear conception of sin ("omgyn"). It goes without saying /368/ that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure, there are a great number of acts, indifferent from our point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person, for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt, otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other misfortunes. The Gilyak think that hailstorms and lightning have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life. There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor. After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

10: Coxwell--128 B-3 (no date) 1925 Gilyak
116, 224, 539, 688

"THE GILYAK WHO MATED WITH A TIGRESS

[LSS: For the text of this tale, see category 539, pp.120-121.]

Sternberg says that after every successful bear hunt, a religious ceremony must be performed; part of the meat being eaten and part carried to the relatives on the mother's side. In our story, the hero carries away meat to the forest; such an act being a great crime punishable by the gods. The Gilyak was induced to behave thus by something extraordinary, namely his love for the tigress, a creature more powerful than any bear; and he married her. The largeness of the sacrifice in the story corresponds to the importance of the tigress."

689 SOCIAL OFFENSES--definitions of and punishments for quarrelsomeness, disorderly conduct, and commission of nuisances; practices for drunkenness and abnormal behavior; patterned punishments for lying and other breaches of ethics; punishments for indolence and noncooperation; etc. See also:

Lying contests, red rackets	311	Breaches of etiquette	678
Meanness and quarrelsomeness	320	Breaches of ethics	677
Mischief and pranks	321	Ingroup antagonisms	676
Laziness and loafing	323	Social control	838
Mental self	678

/48 cont./
This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also explains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not from the clan of his mother by the term nihk /ŋiet see yoŋh on p. /6/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wifer and other such phenomena.

Finally, this explains the unusual custom of the bride price, the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin against the clan of the one abducted. a sin which demands atonement, by force or by a material fine from the abductor. Among the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third generation inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same "blood-money" that same material form of atonement for a sin, as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tlhinind, among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of Clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands.For the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the supernatural spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods. arranging the comedies. sometimes cruel. of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

In his world view the Gilyak. like every primitive man. is an animist. A dead. unmoving nature does not exist for him on the contrary. all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel. he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/48 cont./

691 LITIGATION--incidence of civil actions; statistics of civil cases; causes; types of litigation; abuse thereof; arbitrator, ambiguous charging; etc. See also:

Ingroup aggression	676	The business of criminal actions and criminal
Informal justice	677	Informal
Torts	872

/273 cont./

584 675 Even without invitations, however, there are always witnesses, for the arrival of countrymen immediately becomes known and the yurt is filled with outsiders. Repudiation of [686] one's word is a serious matter, for which one is summoned to court, and this results in a large fine.

584 576 But even if the matchmakers do not wish to or cannot conceal the purpose of their coming, etiquette does not permit them to come immediately to the point.

At first they speak about the most unrelated things, not giving any hint of the purpose of their coming. During the conversation, drinks are passed around. Having conversed enough concerning "news, events," they gradually come to the point, but they are obliged to approach it through circumlocutions and hints, attempting to discover how favorable the chances are. If the father of the bride disapproves from the start, he immediately cuts off the matchmakers with a categorical rejection. But this rarely happens, for no one goes to make a match without a chance for an agreement. [203] Usually they come, as the Gilyak say, as "equals to equals," for all the Gilyak, no matter how far they live from one another, know everything about one another, down to the minutest details, even who killed how many sables during the last season. The question is merely one of not assenting quickly, in order to bargain as much as possible. Etiquette requires the father to pretend for a long time that he does not know why the matchmakers have come, and, when it is no longer possible to pretend, he must think up all possible excuses and obstacles. Ordinarily he resorts to deprecatory opinions about his daughter, asserting that she is very ugly in appearance, understands nothing about the care of the house, that she is quarrelsome, etc. But the guests are quite prepared for these evasions and have answers prepared in advance. "We," they say, "are not chasing after loveliness; and as for the care of the house, she is still quite young, she will learn, and anyway we have enough women experts without her; as for her ill-temper, that is no misfortune, the years will teach her how to live with people." Or they interrupt

/277 cont./

583 182 of safety from evil magical influences) and social, as a symbol of friendship, analogous to the exchange of gifts upon the conclusion of ceremonial brotherhood. We see from the rites which are observed when the bride moves to the home of the groom that the Gilyak give a socio-religious significance to such symbolism of new relations.

And it is also possible that into the concept of bride price there was introduced an element not only magical, but also purely religious. Giving a woman in marriage to a clan not orthodoxly prescribed was taboo, and every violation of a taboo, according to the logic of primitive man, should be atoned for in some way -- if not by blood, then by valuables. Bride price from this point of view appears to be tribute for appeasing the souls of the ancestors offended by the violation of the clan taboo. By this alone can one explain why the Gilyak react just as strongly to the [686] [682] nonpayment of the bride price for a woman as they do to the slaying of a clansman. The obligation to receive satisfaction in this case, as in the case of a killing, extends to the third generation in the whole clan.

583 686 538 For the sake of obtaining this, persons are ready to take the same risk and deprivation as in carrying out an act of blood revenge. The heroic exploits of such persons who have undertaken long and dangerous treks into the most remote places are one of the most common subjects in the epic works.

583 422 The objects used for bride price and the conditions of payment. An object that is part of the bride price is usually a particular kind of valuable, an object sui generis, the so-called shagynd [439] (E.D.), shygynd (W.D.). These are valuables which are predominantly obtained from the Chinese and Japanese by trade. Among these objects are: Chinese silk garments and pieces of material, Chinese fur-coats, several articles of nephrite, Manchurian spears inlaid with silver, Japanese sabers, and also big, cast-iron kettles. Besides this, objects of this class include fox and sable fur-coats and feminine articles of adornment. In [104] ancient times, evidently, axes, too, /278/ at first stone, later

/281 cont./

583 The wedding may be delayed also on account of the dowry.
584 Although they begin to prepare the dowry in childhood, nevertheless, depending on the bride price which is brought, it may become necessary to prepare a new one. The last item in the negotiations is the date of the wedding. This is considered very important, for on the day of the groom's arrival the dowry must be ready, and likewise the numerous viands, not only for the wedding feast, but also those viands of all kinds which the bride will take away with her as a present to the groom's family.

584 /282/ The agreement which has been concluded between the 614 two families is considered an agreement between two clans, and the bride herself from this moment on is regarded as belonging [686] to the clan. In case of refusal on her part or on the part of her parents, the clan will demand her by force.

584 The agreement is also binding for the other side, but 686 here no sanction is demanded, for in case of refusal it loses the part of the bride price which has been brought (usually half). It happens, however, but quite rarely, that the groom will ask for, instead of one sister, another sister. But this is absolutely forbidden. In such cases they answer him:

"If you do not like her, then you do not like both (both the one and the other). When the matter concerns dogs, you want a good one, and I give you (a good one); if one does not suit you, then both will not suit you. When we give you something to eat, if you eat up the first dish, then I shall give you the second."

[595] In other words, one may ask for two daughters, but to ask for one instead of the other is not permitted.

585 When, finally, the day agreed upon arrives, the groom, together with his parents, comes in boats in the summertime, on sleds in the winter, bringing with them the part of the bride price
[596] agreed upon and refreshments. Etiquette forbids that they come on foot, although the bride may live very close by. At this time the family of the bride hangs out the objects of the bride price for the public inspection of the clansmen, and refreshments are spread for the elder representatives of both clans. The women look after the bride in all kinds of ways; they comfort her, give

688

688 RELIGIOUS OFFENSES--definitions of and punishments for blasphemy and impiety; penalties for specific sins of omission and commission (e.g., ritual offenses, violation of taboos); etc. See also:

Fear of supernatural sanctions 626
General definition of sin 673
Expiation 783
Taboos 784

695

695 TRIAL PROCEDURE--types of court procedure (e.g., summary, criminal, civil, appellate); arraignment; testimony (e.g., witnesses, rules of evidence); arguments and summations; special tests (e.g., oaths, ordeals, torture, judicial duels); judicial decisions (e.g., by judge, jury, arbitration); judgments and sentences; appeals; etc. See also:

Court records	817	Judicial abuses and dead punishment	687
Crossbows	344	Martial law	720
Deicity	620

Informal judicial procedure at the community level 827

/302 cont./

578 Quarrels and methods of reconciliation. If a son-in-law /syat'/ 629 has beaten his brother-in-law /shurin, wife's brother/, he must (present) a pack of racing dogs (three to five; they are sold only in packs) -- kylyn-k:an. The first dog is kyly-k:an, the second -- k:akh, the third -- jerkhpe-k:akh, the fourth -- tyly-k:akh. If the first is sold separately, all of them will be useless. They are placed at a certain distance (10-15 paces) from one another and in reverse order, namely, the first -- kyly-k:an -- last, farthest away, and she must catch up with all of them and the object is that all should come together at the same time, and,
[435] if the kyly-k:an arrives first, then it is not suitable. The cost
[437] of a pack is up to 100 rubles. The son-in-law /syat'/, in case of a fight with a brother-in-law /shurin/, gives him such a pack of dogs as a present, and, furthermore, he brings them himself or, if he is ashamed, through another, and they cannot be returned, [435] except if the dogs are poor. On the other hand, if a brother-in-law /shurin/ offends a son-in-law /syat'/, he gives for reconciliation a silk robe (35-60 rubles) or a bear as a present.

578 /303/ Quarrels within the clan. N left his wife, received back
614 his bride price, and began to carry on with Russians and so forth.
620 The old men assembled and decided to take the woman back, but the father-in-law did not agree: "A woman is not a dog, to try and throw away." Nevertheless, she was purchased for a certain young man. Then N, in Khez', began to storm and threaten because they took his abandoned wife. But they replied to him: "You did not buy her yourself but with your father's money" (clan money). The matter ended by their giving a racing dog, fur, and two bottles of vodka.

● 695 The oath. Oath -- simbi chakhci lambe -- in Goldi, chihyz'u
685 nyydz:rá -- in Gilyak.
825 One must kill a wolf (lygyz') and saw, in order, the tendons on both hind legs from the heel to the knee, and ask: "Where is the tendon for the thief? (emnikhongz'"n emnikh -- heel, tongz -- tendon), where is the stolen tendon? -- jengaz' tongz' shamdzhna?" The tendon that twitches is taken out secretly and

/303 cont./

● 695 dried and preserved until there is an argument about a theft.
685 They seek a man who understands the oath -- chihyz'u n'ivukh, 825 and this gift is passed on by inheritance (now the best clan is the [474] Chhiyzyl clan; it'ya Tobonka from Chil'bi belongs to it). If [614] outsiders try, then it is a great sin.

A third frightened by the threat of the oath arrives in the village of the plaintiff with his khal'yu -- clammen; they make a large fire on the bank.

The plaintiff and his people also come out to the campfire; he shouts: "Pryia', mygia', n'i heg:at phlalgun polagun [825] pryd:rá chigry' tuur pogutá enan'ivukh, jogut prydókh kaukrá,
[825] par:á pryd:rá. Ni sidzymral'ó, sidz:ejmralá cherakh jor'in
[825] (pryd:rá) helá egur pkhogo jakhgujá." i.e., "Come, come down, I and my kinsmen are frightened, I came here with my children; a fire is lighted on your bank; no strangers came with me, we came alone (I do not know anything). I came to you to ask what is the matter (what is the guilt). Well, hurry up and tell me what is on your mind." That one sends an envoy -- khimu n'ivukh'a (a leader during war) with a spear, on which he leans instead of a crutch, and he begins to speak. The chief sends a khimu-n'ivukh'a. Nothing results, and it is necessary to take an oath. The visitors and the local people then arrange themselves on both sides of the fire. The "juror" is also present at this point. They argue: "Ni valchg:aj n'erakh elygvaz'ó -- if I lie, let it go badly for me."

The juror slowly begins to warm the tendon in the fire, the thief begins to twitch, and then he confesses (pyimdz). "Yrk pyimdz: yurará. Navat takó jakhojló. Ching vark kymlyvé" -- "I confess, /304/ for what else can I do. Think about it yourselves." If it is a false accusation, then the real, absent thief would begin to twitch.

The victim is paid whatever he demands, and, if the thief is poor, the victim is given a woman. The juror is provided for at their discretion. The juror, when they take out the tendon, says to the crow and cat: "I do not know whether it is true or not, do not harm me, for you, too, do not know. If this

/304 cont./

● 685 actually is the perpetrator, let the harm be to him." "Ni tajor'á 695 mykyslu jagjyd-lu ta-n"erokh tokh elyygujá. Chi nar'"ár chan [825] majgokhanó. Mykyz' mra lytyng iyg:aj huktókh elyygaz'ó."

685 While they argue, a crow (ver') and a cat are thrown into the fire 695 alive. If the crow caws, the man also caws and gets into the 825 fire. If the cat mews, so does the man.

An oath is performed for an inveterate criminal, wishing him death; the thief will twitch in any case. The crow and cat, while they are burning and still struggling in the fire, are told: "Chi ta:godz: furará n'ivykh lerj mra chi unakhana uikhyndor by nivukhdokh elyygujá." "You do not know, you will suffer for a petty offense (i.e., you will serve as an example to the Gilyak), following the law of sin, let it go badly for that man."

614 Only a certain khal knows the oath with each particular
825 animal. There is a clan whose kikhal is a wolf -- kekhr: ping chnarpung. They caught a wolf. They went hunting seals. The wolf was sitting on the ice, and it had been carried into the estuary. As soon as the hunters saw it, they approached the bank, bow first. That wolf came and sat on the bow of the boat. They wanted to kill it, but took pity on it. They let it off and let it go. Sometime later these same (people) were hunting, and a bear attacked them. Then that wolf appeared, began to circle round, attacked the bear and saved them. Thus (it happened) many times. This wolf multiplied and was frequently encountered (as a rule there were few wolves there). Chnar-pung do not kill a wolf, but whenever they see one they feed it. When the hunters, having killed many seals, leave the whole carcasses, the wolf spoils them, but if a whole one is left, then it does not spoil them. They journey into the taiga, and the wolf goes along close by; they leave yukola, mos', and so forth there. The Chnarpung may call him atk. Wolves, like tigers, are of two kinds: docile and not docile.

685 This same wolf tendon is used in another way. When some-[154] thing is lost, they fashion a stuffed doll, like a man, out of a rotten piece of wood and place a seal bladder on its head. They bind its neck with a wolf tendon, and at night they walk around and knock in the corner of the first yurt, saying: "Pyz' nyngá -- look

701

701 MILITARY ORGANIZATION--purpose of military organization (e.g., defense, internal police, prestige); composition of the armed forces in peace and war; standing army and navy (e.g., size, disposition, state of preparedness); eligibility and liability for military service (e.g., age and sex qualifications); status of warriors (e.g., prerogatives, disabilities); military leaders (e.g., qualifications, mode of selection, authority, functions); extent of differentiation of military from political organization; coordination of armed forces (e.g., of a war party, an army, a complete military establishment); hierarchical organization (e.g., gradations in rank, chain of command); system of payment, promotion, and retirement; furloughs and leave; special organizations (e.g., military societies); etc. See also:

Prestige and nobility	56	Military technology and equipment	71
Political organization	62, 63, 64	Leadership traits	157

/117 cont./

But the worst of calamities -- a clansman has been slain!
● 614 War is inevitable! ... The whole population take up arms.
628 There is no regular leader, no elder, and no elections. The
● 701 natural leader has long been known and acknowledged by all; it 182 is the bravest and luckiest of the clansmen, it is the so-called "master," "vr" -- all eyes are turned toward him!

And in a moment the equal among equals suddenly becomes a military leader, gives orders, distributes weapons, fixes the time of the march, etc.; they obey him as they would a dictator. If this natural leader has died or been killed, everyone knows the one most worthy to replace him.

Suppose a civil dispute has arisen between clansmen or be-
● 614 tween /118/ representatives of different clans. There are no 628 established persons who ex officio resolve disputes and difficulties.
182 Very often the accuser is himself judge and executor of the sentence. Once the defendant has refused to carry out his obligation of his own free will, the accuser, not stopping to meditate, unhitches a dog from the team of the debtor or climbs into the storehouse in order to take for himself something equal in value to his claim. And the accuser considers this in the order of things. Of course, such a method is not always possible. But even then the affair works out perfectly well without the powers that be. It is enough for the offended party merely to address himself directly or through a khlaj-nivukh (see above) to one or two authoritative individuals "masters" from the clansmen of the offender, and the matter is very quickly settled. They summon the offender, who is usually escorted by his closest kinsmen, and sometimes by a khlaj-nivukh. Even outsiders gather. From the hearing of both sides and the opinions of those present, an opinion which is accepted by the majority assumes the strength of a verdict. Usually the offender submits voluntarily; otherwise, the managers of the affair proceed to the offender's storehouse and remove an adjudged amount.

714

14 UNIFORM AND ACCOUTERMENT--ordinary garb (e.g., hair style, body armor, body painting, amulets and charms, uniform); description of personal equipment (e.g., canteen, haversack, helmet, gas mask, first-aid kit, shields); distinctions (e.g., according to rank; between different corps and services, between parade and field uniforms and equipment); etc. See also:

Clothing and accessories . . . . . 29 Military medals and badges 703 Adornment. 30

/147 cont./

I found it already in use among the few Russians at the Nikolayev and Mariinski posts. Nevertheless, it is certainly not of Russian origin, as Maack (5) and Ryllkin (6) seem to believe. At any rate, I have no idea how the Russians would have arrived at such a name, whose etymology is wholly unknown to us. /148/ What argues quite decisively against the Russian origin of this name is the circumstance that we find it, though in a form which at first glance is hard to recognize, outside and earlier than any connection with the Russians, from a wholly different party, the Japanese. On Sakhalin, Mamia Rinsô (1809) heard of a people on the mainland named "Kordekke", in the following year he met a few individuals from it, and, to be sure, as foreigners on the Amur (Manko) above Kidzi and in Deren, that is to say, in Olcha territory, to which they had come downstream to trade. He found them dressed exactly like the Santan (Olcha). They are the ones, according to him, who manufacture the armor consisting of iron disks fastened together, which is so highly prized by the Smerenkur (Gilyak) and which will be discussed later, they build vessels for the Smerenkur, etc. (1). Siebold is of the opinion that the

5. Putesh. po dol. r. Usuri, Vol. 1, p. 9.

6. Zap. Sib. Otd. Geogr. Obshch., Bk. VII, 1864, Misc., p. 1.

1. "Tô-tats ki ko" (Siebold, Nippon, VII, pp. 169, 172, 174, 194, 198).

Kordekke are "undoubtedly Koryak" (2), but he evidently decided

2. Op. cit., p. 199.

on this only because of a fortuitous similarity of sounds, for how did the distant Koryak, living on the northern coast of the Sea of Okhotsk and on Kamchatka, get to the Amur River? And what

/403 cont./

3. (cont.)
der Gross-brit. Gesandtsch. in den J. 1793 und 1794, transl. from the English by Hüttner, Vienna, 1805, Vol. I, p. 88. Bazin, Chine moderne, ou descr. hist., geogr. et littér. de ce vaste Emp., Part II, Paris, 1843 (L'Univers), p. 610. Huc, L'Emp. Chinois, Paris, 1854, Vol. I, p. 317. Itier, journ. d'un voyage en Chine en 1843-1846, Paris, 1848, Vol. III, p. 389. The latter tried to acclimate Urtica nivea along with other, similar plants in France and stated that it has the advantage over all of them in that it needed the least care. According to Richthofen (Zeitschr. der Berl. Gesellsch. für Erdkunde, Vol. V, p. 321), the Koreans also have clothing materials which, judging by their lustre, seem to have been woven out of the fiber of a nettle-like plant.

I therefore conjecture that formerly the Gilyak, like the Ainu, knew how to weave crude clothing fabric out of the fibers of the nettle, and an old specimen plaited out of cords and interlaced whalebone fibers, a sort of mail shirt (Pl. XLIV, Fig. 1), which I acquired from them in the village of Sabach and which will be discussed later, corroborates me in this conjecture. But whereas the Ainu, generally held back and hurt by pressure and exploitation on the part of the Japanese, persisted, often out of poverty and necessity, in wearing their locally made, crude garments, the independent Gilyak, in contact with the Chinese, very soon learned how to obtain their finer clothing material through barter, and since /404/ there was no lack of material for such trade, in view of the wealth of their region in precious furs, they naturally gave up entirely the manufacture of their own, more laboriously made and nevertheless cruder and poorer weaving.

/572 cont./

of the continent (2), as may be presumed for various reasons.

2. See p. 247 above /untranslated/.

they still had no knowledge of iron and obtained this only after they had become peripheral peoples, that is, after they had been pushed to the extreme eastern coast of the mainland and to the islands and peninsulas lying in front of it and had thus arrived in the vicinity of Japan (3).

3. The question as to the origin and development of ironworking in Japan lies, of course, outside the scope of this work.

If we now return to the Gilyak after this digression, this is the place, in concluding the above discussion of their weapons used for hunting on land and on the water, to mention a few other pieces of their armament. First to be mentioned here are two types of armor (Gilyak petsch) which are completely different in form, material, and origin, /573/ and which, to be sure, are no longer in use at present, but are of no little historical-ethnographic interest.

One of them is iron armor (Gilyak wytsch-petsch). This consists of thin, longish, iron lamellas provided with holes, by means of which they are fastened close to one another on animal or fish skins with straps. The headpiece of this armor (Plate XLIV /see p.1024/, Fig. 2) has the shape of a helmet. The upper, rounded ends of its iron lamellas are bent back somewhat and wound with a strap, a piece designed for the protection of the neck from injury from its lower edge. The breast or body piece (ibid., Fig. 3), of which I saw only individual parts (in the village of Tebach) consists of several rows of iron lamellas overlapping from top to bottom, which are wider and longer than those of the headpiece. In speaking of the Smerenkur (Gilyak) of Sakhalin, Mamia Rinsô (1) mentions this iron armor and says that it is known under the name of "betni," in which can be recognized without difficulty the above-mentioned Gilyak designation "petsch" distorted in Japanese fashion. He says of it that, although little used, it was greatly esteemed and in war was the chief decoration of the one chosen as the leader. In the case of the latter statement the imagination of the traveler may have put in a word, but the former one is perfectly correct; in my time these pieces of armor were not used at all, but, though most of them were in a damaged condition and, indeed, were often to be found only in fragmentary parts, they were regarded as such valuable objects that they gave their owners an aura of extraordinary wealth and respect, and a few of them sufficed for the purchase of a wife. Today, therefore, they are only rare antiques of fabulously high value. They owe this to their foreign origin, for, according to unanimous statements by the Gilyak, they came from the Manchu, and, as Mamia Rinsô also states, are highly prized by the latter themselves.

1. Op. cit., p. 194.

/573 cont./

It is known from the oldest European reports on the subject (2)

2. Cf. Neuhof. Die Gesandtschaft der Ost-Indisch. Gesellsch. in den vereinigt. Niederländern an den Tartarisch. Cham u. nunmehr auch Sinisch. Keiser /The Embassy of the East Indies Company in the Territories of the Netherlands to the Tatarian Khan and Now Also to the Chinese Emperor/, Amsterdam, 1666, p. 394. Also Witsen, Noord en Oost Tartarye, second edition, Amsterdam, 1705, pp. 3, 6, 13.

that even the ancient Manchu (Nutsch) had pieces of armor and helmets, which, like the ones described above, consisted of iron lamellas placed over one another like scales and connected with one another by pins or fastened to a leather foundation. After the conquest of China by the Manchu such armor and helmets were also worn by the Chinese soldiers, officers, and by the emperor himself (3). Also of interest for our purpose is the

/573 cont./

3. Gerbillon in Du Halde, Descript. de l'Empire de la Chine et de la Tartarie Chinoise, Paris, 1735, Vol. IV, p. 273.

statement by Iakinf, the well-known member of the Russian mission in Peking in the years 1807-1820, according to which, among the gifts prescribed by law which the Chinese emperor /574/ had to give to the father of his bride and young wife upon his engagement and marriage was to be found a certain number of pieces of armor and helmets (1). Under these circumstances it is quite understandable that these objects would also appear as most valuable and honorable possessions in the eyes of the peoples of the lower Amur region standing under the rule or at least under the influence of the Manchu-Chinese, down to the Gilyak, and, accordingly, would be used by them in their most important social transaction, the purchase of a wife.

1. Iakinf", Kitai, ego zhiteli, nravy, obychai, proxviesch. /China, Its Inhabitants, Morals, Customs, Enlightenment/, St. Petersburg, 1840, p. 164.

The art of making iron armor was also passed from the Manchu-Chinese to the Goldi immediately neighboring them in the Sungari and lower Amur region, and Mamia Rinsô specifically mentions the latter, distorting their national name in Japanese fashion as "Kordekke" (2), as makers of the iron armor. Needless to say, these were not the first and only objects that the Goldi learned how to make from their southern neighbors. Here, therefore, we see the art of forging iron advancing along another route from the Manchu-Chinese, down the Sungari and Amur, to the peoples of the lower Amur region, but it does not seem to have gone beyond the Goldi on this route, while the peoples living farther downstream along the Amur and on Sakhalin, the Ainu, Gilyak, and Olcha, had already received it earlier, as discussed above, from the Japanese. During the past decades, finally, the peoples of the lower Amur region have had the opportunity to become acquainted with the Russian manner of forging iron.

2. See p. 315 above.

/574 cont./

The net armor (Gilyak kâ-petsch) is entirely different in nature from the iron armor. It consists of a sleeveless camisole or short shirt (Pl. XLIV /see p.1024/, Fig. 1), which is plaited with multiple strands of nettle-yarn cord, such as is also used for knotting fish nets, and with individual strips of whalebone added here and there. The neck opening is trimmed with long-haired dog fur and has a button and a loop for buttoning it; otherwise the armor, pulled on over the ordinary dog-fur coat, remains open in the front. The net armor is very heavy on account of the coarse plaiting containing a great quantity of material; the specimen illustrated, which I bought from the Gilyak Nikolaev in Sabach, is 2' 4" long, 1' 10" wide, and weighs 28 pounds (Russian). Whereas the iron armor is of Manchu-Chinese origin, the net armor is genuinely Gilyak. According to the Gilyak, the net armor was formerly used by them during major feuds when, as the result of a murder, wife-stealing, or the like a village took to the field against another one. In my time, however, it was no longer used and, it was said, was to be found in only a few specimens. In fact, the piece acquired by me shows the signs of great age, and in its aged former owner was of the opinion that neither his father nor his grandfather had seen it new. Nevertheless, the Gilyak attribute little value to this armor because it was made of worthless material and by them /575/ themselves and is not to be compared with the former, often fragmentary and rusted Manchurian armor (1).

1. The armor of two other peripheral peoples of East Asia living to the south and to the north of the Gilyak is also made in part

/283 cont./

585 It is noteworthy that such a ceremony of "stamping the kettle"
788 takes place among the Tungus tribe of the "Negda," who since 181 olden times have concluded marriages with the Gilyak, from 177 whom they have undoubtedly borrowed the custom.

585 A year after the wedding the newlyweds, usually already 574 with a child, come to stay a little while with the wife's family, 788 and when they again depart they once more go through the ceremony of "stamping the kettle," only this time, instead of kettles, they use cups.

593 The vicissitudes of marriage. Just as in our society, marriages 586 are not always happy. Since the consent of the woman to the [584] marriage is not asked, and rarely does any girl resolve to disobey the will of her parents, and very rarely do the parents yield to the protests of their daughters, not backing down from their decision even in the face of a threat of suicide, life after the 593 wedding is fraught with tragedies. Either a woman runs away 586 with her lover, or she runs away to her parents, especially in 837 the case of ill-treatment by her husband. In such cases the husband often tries to take back the fugitive by force, and otherwise he demands the return of the bride price. Since no [691] one has a desire to part with something once it has become his own property, litigations to recover the bride price are endless.
[123] During my wanderings among the Gilyak, who at first took me to be one who had power, I had to listen to complaints concerning 593 the return of bride price in every settlement. They preferred, 586 however, to ask for the forcible return of the wife, which was 837 often done by the Sakhalin administrators with the favorable 171 assistance /284/ of the priests. The fact was that persons who 797 had lured away or abducted another man's wife appeared before a missionary with the request to be baptized and married, in order to guarantee themselves against the wife's being forcibly taken back by her former husband. The missionary willingly fulfilled such requests and gave them a marriage certificate, which gave to her owner the right to a police order demanding her return in case she was forcibly taken away. And this led to tragedies. One such case deserves to be immortalized.

69

I

692 JUDICIAL AUTHORITY--extent to which the settlem injuries, and application of sanctions is withdrawn fr and vested in some constituted authority; degree of i of judicial and executive authority; specialized judge tem (e.g., courts of original and appellate jurisdicti equity, civil and criminal courts); jurisdiction of eac powers and prerogatives; etc. See also:

Judicial authority of executive and administrative officials 63, 64
Concept of justice 677
Informal justice within the community 627 Constitution . . .
Legal norms . . .
Special courts . .

2

ent of disputes, redress of om the parties concerned dentification or separation
s and courts; judicial syson, courts of law and h type of court; judicial

. 642
. 671
. 698

/299 cont./

567 calls him a slave, he can bring suit against them, and therefore 683 when you ask the descendant of a slave what clan he is from, he 614 replies quietly: "Pilavon k:khal purará hokhagirn os´ krygrys" (1).

1. Krygrys -- an Ainu slave; akh -- a Chinese one.

i.e., that he is from the Pilavo clan, by origin a slave ("root 195 slave"). When people swear, they say: "You are pure only to your neck, while there you are impure."

/300/ If a krygrys bought himself free and his master had to give him a wife, an economy, and part with him, he would still be considered a krygrys, impure. Every krygrys was considered a k:khal, and, until he passed to a free state, he was avenged, and he participated in the sacrifices. A good krygrys
• 692 is given a share of his earnings -- he has the right to half of the income and can claim it through the courts -- of the khlaj-n´ivukh; older women have the right to participate in a trial (they are invited and have the right to come themselves if they feel sympathy for the slave). It is permitted to complain about beatings.

A krygrys woman cannot demand a share in court, because she is married. Nor can a share be demanded for her by her husband.

A Chinese slave, akh, has the same rights as the krygrys.
682 A free one is kistylygy n´ivukh ("pure"). The killing of a slave 614 is punished by the clan. When drunk, they revile the murderer: "If you are a brave man, we have an elder beast (pal pila k:otr -- big mountain bear, mer edr: -- tiger), fight with him: it would have been better if you had killed a bear and treated us. We do not need brave men like you. You can only exhibit your courage in front of your wife." The women in particular attack him. Even at the present time, however, the descendants of the 162 krygrys are treated with condescension. In 1909 two yurts of former slaves still stood in Takhta.

582 Slaves were most frequently acquired through the purchase of Ainu women, who received a male and a female slave as a

682, 692, 756

The cham of the Gilyaks resembles, in many respec Golds, and the Tungus on the mainland. Both are ac the primary function of the cham would appear to be purpose he is elected. He it is who pronounces sen rs, and afterwards carries it out. Legally these we [235] actually his moral influence does not stop ther ends upon him. Probably he was chosen because the essary in olden times, was much against the grai cham, with his powers of exorcism, could clear hir ntarily felt must attach to the killing of a human be er obtains, but is commuted in practice to a fine."

cts, the shaman of the Oroktis, ddicted to superstitious practices;
e the judicial executive, and for tence in the criminal 'court' of ere the limits of his function;
re, and the criminal's fate largely death of a murderer, though of the kindly, jolly Gilyaks; and nself of any sin which they in-
ing. The penalty of death now no

177, 578, 692, 756

Iis [LSS: The cham or medicine man] moral influen ng ground, as the Gilyaks come more into contact wi to a Russian, 'A cham tells very many lies.'
hen why do you call him in?'
e is needed. If he got angry it would be bad for us,' is true that it may result badly for the Gilyak, not b ne anger to fall upon his head; but when the Gilyak h sed of crime, the cham may remember his [240] on ast word, he can make the punishment very severe.

ce among his tribe is certainly ith the Russians. One of them was the answer.

ecause the cham can cause the
as a misunderstanding, or is nission or insult, and as he has
"

/575 cont./

1. (cont.)
out of the same material as the Gilyak käpetsch or a similar one. During the bloody fights which the North Americans had with the Koreans in 1871, they saw them clad in armor which consisted of forty layers of stout cotton material and was almost impenetrable for saber or bayonet (Nordische Presse, 1871, No. 214, according to a report sent to the Times by its reporter in Shanghai). On the other hand, Ditmar ("Ueber die Koräken und Tschuktschen /The Koryak and Chukchee/." -- Bull. de la cl. hist.-phil. de l'Acad. Imp. des sc. de St. Pétersb., Vol. XIII, p. 131; Mél. russes, Vol. III, p. 41) relates that the Chukchee use armor made out of whalebone and thick animal-skins.

To conclude the remarks concerning the weapons of the Gilyak, I must consider a piece which, to be sure, is harmless in nature, but is nevertheless interesting and characteristic. It is their so-called mungtsche (Pl. XLVI /see p.1026/, Fig. 3), a roundish or slightly angular stick of hard wood about five feet long, which from top to bottom bears the characteristic, barely indented spiral design which is found on all the shafts of their lances, spears, and harpoons, and which, despite the smoothness of the latter, nevertheless offers a certain resistance against the palm of the hand pressed on it. The upper end of the mungtsche is rounded off to the shape of a knob, or, more correctly, an acorn, in the lower third it is either merely tapered gradually or flattened somewhat like a saber and is always provided with a deep groove on the back. From the Gilyak this strange weapon has also advanced to the Negda along the Amgunj, among whom it is called muketschi, evidently a distortion of the Gilyak designation for it, and is generally widespread. Middendorff became acquainted with it among them. In his travel account

Historical Manchuria AG-2

- Old armor-shirt of the Gilyak; 2 -- old Manchurian helmet;
- piéce of an old Manchurian armor-shirt; 4 -- Gilyak bow;
- the same on the inside.

/100 cont./

614 628 ● 72 of other obstacles in the path of the attackers. In hostile territory all hunting is dangerous (in many clans it is even prohibited, while some also forbid the use of water from the rivers and springs); the supplies brought from home do not last long, while an open, sudden attack -- bearing in mind ambushes and the impunity of the women's sentry duty -- is not always possible. With long patience and severe deprivations they must await the favorable moment or else in desperation resolve to take any risk.

Most frequently the defenders prefer to await the [562] attack in their own settlement. Then, abandoning the female population, which enjoys inviolability, the men gather in a separate yurt, from which, at the guards' first signal of the approach of the foe, they steal through secret passages and gather together beyond the yurts, ready to meet the foe. In accordance with interclan customs, the battle continues through one night or at most twenty-four hours, until, finally, fatalities occur, after which the enemy departs, and the survivors count the number of fallen men on each side. If the defenders have lost a greater number than the opposite side, a new casus belli arises. The attackers must in any case consider themselves satisfied. But the affair does not always end with a few victims. Instances are known where a whole clan perished, and only women remained alive.

There have been cases, on the other hand, where, to avoid the destruction of a small clan incapable of a strong rebuff, the self-sacrifice of one man has expiated the general guilt. I know of one case where, at the very moment that news came of the approach of the foe, a youth responsible for the conflict prayed his clansmen who were gathered about him in the yurt to save themselves by flight, offering to save the clan from destruction by his own death. And when the clansmen, with downcast eyes, began to leave the yurt, he, quaffing a cup of seal fat at one draught for courage, flung himself headlong, brandishing his spear, to meet the maddened /101/ throng of avengers.

/166 cont./

602 606 by their touching tenderness, their devotion and selflessness. Toward an ymg:i, though only potential, the "fathers-in-law" sometimes behave better than toward their own children. "One must feed a son-in-law," runs the religious formula of relations between "fathers-in-law" and "sons-in-law." In this dry formulation is hidden a rich content. Not only in times of poverty does a "son-in-law," sometimes with his huge family, move in to live with his father-in-law, getting a living from him without any payment for a period of months and even several years, but even in normal times the "son-in-law" (although such merely by designation) is the favorite guest in the house of his father-in-law.

[574] For months at a time the Gilyak youth loudly and happily [224] pass their time in the settlements of their "fathers-in-law," [431] finding in every yurt the most hearty welcome and the greatest delicacies; and when the hunting begins, the "son-in-law" is invariably a participant in the undertakings of his "father-in-law," and when he returns to his own home, he carries with him, in addition to /167/ the usual gifts, also his share of the [796] catch. At solemn moments of life, for example, at the bear festival, the "sons-in-law" are in the foreground among those who have been invited, and it is to them that the honor of killing the bear is presented. In an arduous moment in war-● [72] time, the "fathers-in-law" and the "sons-in-law" are obliged to come to each other's aid in case of necessity.

In order to evaluate fully the religious background of these peculiar relations between "fathers-in-law" and "sons-in-law," it is necessary to keep in mind the wide meaning that the Gilyak, with a purely primitive passion for the broadening of their original taboos, have given to the term "father-in-law."

602 614 606 From the kinship terminology we know that the clan of the "fathers-in-law" is considered to be not only that clan from which a man's kinsmen usually take wives, but also all the other clans from which even one kinsman has chanced to take his wife. Thus, each man can have several clans

/201 cont./

161 199 614 931 * 194 Still more destructive is the process of depopulation. We are speaking not of the gradual dying out of separate families, but mainly of the process of catastrophic depopulation. This process is of comparatively recent origin, for it is an immediate consequence of clashes with cultured peoples, first Eastern and later European peoples as well. These peoples, together with their alcohol and exploitations, have brought the Gilyak a whole set of communicable diseases with an especially destructive effect in their non-immunized primitive surroundings. We have already discussed the ravaging effects of this process. It is sufficient to say here that whole clans died out before my eyes, and one not infrequently meets clans in which only one or two individuals are left. It must be borne in mind that the process of depopulation does not by any means strike clans equally, so that at any given time one clan may remain untouched, while another may lose a considerable number of its members.

161 614 ● 72 * 194 War also has an effect similar to that of diseases and various other causes. Although according to the interclan rules the women are spared and the number of men who are killed is limited, nevertheless /202/ in the heat of battle the rules are not always observed, and thus a military epopee can also lead to the destruction of a clan.

* 194 199 Contact with other peoples, both primitive and more highly cultured, must have acted in an indirectly destructive manner. As a general rule, the contact of outlooks broadens intellectual horizons and weakens the strength of religious imperatives. A representative of a higher culture looks down on the institutions of a lower race, and the representatives of the latter gradually begin to observe their own institutions less rigorously themselves. At first separate individuals begin to violate the law a little, and they gradually begin to draw after them many others. The [582] Gilyak themselves assert that with the coming of the Russians their marriage regulations were considerably weakened. But even before the appearance of the Russians the Gilyak had contact with various other peoples.

/247 cont./

000 152 224 152 ● 72 [614] [578] [463] weakly developed. Among the Gilyak there are very few such outstanding, passionately devoted hunters as are to be found among the Tungus. Nor do the Gilyak, especially during the past half-century, possess the heroic emotions of war. Indeed, what the Gilyak called wars in ancient times were in fact nothing more than sporadic clan skirmishes motivated by vengeance or, even more frequently, were over women. The Gilyak have never known war as a profession, as the favorite occupation of youth. It is natural that their 831 [152] emotional energy should be principally directed toward sexuality. The Gilyak begin their sexual life with the onset of puberty and devote all their leisure, all their thoughts, to women, the more so since by far not every Gilyak, as we 836 shall see, finds it possible to marry. The bachelor youth is not content with the women to whom they have rights in their own settlement; they do not stop with the circle of women to whom they have rights by law. The only category of women before which the Gilyak halts is the class of women prohibited 481 836 to him. Neither length of time nor immensity of distance will deter the Gilyak from his romantic adventures, if he can but find his fill of feminine society. The young man sets off most eagerly of all, of course, for the village of his "fathers-in-law" --akimalk'i but he is not averse to undertaking a journey even to completely alien villages. During the time of my [122] travels, young men frequently voluntarily joined me, offering me their assistance without compensation for many weeks, and this was done in the hope of finding occasion for romantic adventures, since this was not so very difficult. Owing to 836 574 the Gilyak's traditional hospitality and eagerness for any news, the doors of every home are wide open to each new arrival. Thus, the Gilyak feels at home everywhere. A few hours [203] after his arrival in some settlement, he has already managed to spend some time in every home, everywhere relate his news, to which the men and women listen with equal avidity, and has already managed to let his glance fall on some woman who has caught his fancy. The rest is a matter of his amatory experience and art.

/358 cont./

614 628 682 It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khal' of the murderer

614 628 682 participates in the payment, each according to his means. A murder within the clan finds its avengers among the closest kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i. e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

614 628 628 [537] The khlav-nivukhi obtain as a reward for their labors their fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Re-

[762] venge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

614 628 72 [100] One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but the recollection of them lives in the popular memory; they tell of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/358 cont./

614 628 72 in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack was ordinarily made at night. In expectation of it, the whole adult male population, armed, /359/ gathered in one yurt. The women and children remained alone in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the women, children, and also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each

[342] yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurts. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. If a smaller number had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attack-

[501] ing side, in any case, had to consider itself satisfied. For the eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

411 Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the eloquent testimony of the heavy spears with silver fretwork, guarded today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than mere decoration.

614 597 7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopts persons from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came

[929] to their assistance with the right of adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted en masse. The adopted individual is accepted into some

721

721 INSTIGATION OF WAR--frequency of war (e.g., common, rare, unknown); military preparedness, scale, severity, and duration of wars; small-scale military operations (e.g., raids for slaves or cattle, headhunting, privateering); conception of war (e.g., as glorious, as holy, as wrong but inevitable, as less debilitating than peace); prevalent motives for waging war (e.g., vengeance, self-defense, aggrandizement, prestige); predominance of offensive or defensive warfare; material gains through war (e.g., booty, trophies, slaves, women, mercantile advantages, territory); decision as to war (e.g., deliberations, negotiations); methods of initiating hostilities (e.g., challenges, declarations of war, attacks without warning); etc. See also:

Ethnocentrism	186	Feuds	628
Cannibalism	268	International relations	648
Prestige	554	Revolution	669
Raids, piracy and banditry	579

/100 cont./

000 to meet the maddened /101/ throng of avengers. Chivalry

*614 manifests itself in many other forms. Although ordinarily

628 the raid of the avengers is too impulsive for people to be

721 able to think about any kind of formalities of attack,

538 epics and legends have preserved many formulas for the declaration of "war" through special intermediaries, about whom we shall speak in more detail later.

The conventional formula laconically declares: "He (the avenger) has irrevocably said that he prepares to come to do battle with thee; if thou art stronger, thou wilt slay him, if he is stronger, he will slay thee -- thus he spoke."

Military expeditions are undertaken for purposes other than avenging the slaying of a clansman. Extremely frequently they are on account of women. "Lovely Helens" are the tragic causes of war among the Gilyak much more frequently even than slayings. The latter are extremely rare and never bear a mercenary character, being exclusively a case of a momentary flare-up on the part of an easily aroused "barbarian" because of a slight offense to his vanity. But conflicts over women are much more frequent. Either a group of clansmen undertakes a purely romantic raid to abduct the beloved of their comrade. Or expeditions are undertaken with the forcible recovery of the abducted wife of a clansman as their objective -- a more serious incident, because this action is as obligatory for the clan (up to the third generation exclusively) as revenge and blood money for the slaying of a clansman. Customarily they strive to avoid bloodshed, choosing a time for the attack when the men are absent, but the matter rarely ends -- either at the time of the abduction or during the pursuit -- without bloody conflicts, which inevitably bring on the necessity of "raising the kindred bones," i. e., war with all its consequences.

/371 cont./

583 [98] no one, and this demonstrates how widespread, even universal,

721 it was in quite recent times. The wars of which Gilyak tradition tells were fought principally on account of the abduction of women, and they developed the practice of reconciliation by 177 583 way of payment of a ransom. The entrance of the Russians into the Amur region has led to a considerable diminution in the number of abductions. No matter what efforts accompany the abduction of a woman, the display of a paper from a Russian office will incontrovertibly result in the return of the abducted woman. Thus, the prevailing mode of obtaining wives has become that of purchase. The price paid for a woman is known to the Russian under the term kalym. The bride price is ordinarily paid in articles, money, and labor. As bride price they give boats, kettles, guns, spears, fur coats, pieces of silk material, dogs, and, finally, money. The size of the bride price is in proportion to the wealth of both sides, the age of the bride, and her domestic talents. A woman who is an "accomplished woman" in the full sense of the phrase among the Gilyak is one who understands the culinary arts well, sews garments and footwear well, is industrious and meek. In general the purchase of a wife is a rather expensive affair. Here is an example of a not very considerable bride price. One Gilyak from Kitnidvo paid for his wife with two Japanese kettles (one large one, costing 60 rubles) one spear with silver fretwork, a fox-fur coat, ten dogs, and, in addition, took down his father-in-law's summer yurt, after 583 which the wife was irretrievably abducted. An extremely characteristic method of acquiring a wife, one which recalls /372/ the Biblical story of the service of Jacob for Laban, is that of labor. Some clanless Gilyak will work in a family for several years, and as his reward he will receive the sister or daughter of the master. When the head of a family is a middle-aged man and has no sons, he takes to himself a son-in-law who agrees, instead of a bride price, to share with him all the economic labor for a certain period or for the entire life of the father-in-law. The son-in-law, customarily a complete pauper fishes and kills seals, and all this constitutes the common

116, 423, 578, 627, 721

"Of the possession of land in our sense nearest approach to it was a prescripti place snares along certain creeks. The freely recognized; but they would have and backwaters by the Tungus and Oroc they would have simply gone elsewhere and tracks for snaring had been made i sanctioned by time are seldom transgre prowess of the pioneers, yielded little according to the number of snares whic a dispute arose, and was settled by ref duels. In the latter case the disputants straight blade; but as they were always batants were parted when either becam
a fatal ending."

of the word the Gilyaks have no conception. The ve right, sanctioned by immemorial custom, to right of all to roam over the land in hunting was resented the placing of snares in chosen creeks hons, although, rather than provoke hostilities,
. As among themselves, the division of the creeks n olden [301] times; and the customary boundaries essed. The abundance of game, coupled with the cause for quarrel, and spots were simply annexed h the owner of the hut possessed. Here and there erence to the klenu, the elders in council, or by fought with a weapon like a hedge-bill, with a surrounded by a goodly concourse, the come exhausted, and the duel was not allowed to have 72

neral statements dealing with several aspects of the conduct and re-ontests between independent political units involving the use of or-ilitary force. For ingroup violence see 578; for revolution and civil 69.

/99 cont./

*614 628 ● 72

If the clans live in different settlements, however, there arises a state of war with all its consequences. Moreover, if the villages are located near each other, they place themselves in a full state of siege. There can be no question of routine activities outside the house; there can be no hunting or fishing, for an ambuscade may lie in wait at every corner. In extreme cases the men dare not leave their homes other than with women in front, ferreting in every bush, tramping down the grass, everywhere fearing an ambush. But these can only be palliatives; one fine night it will be necessary to meet the foe face to face in one's own settlement. Finally, where the warring clans live far from each other, it becomes necessary to undertake long expeditions on foot or in boats. This must be an imposing spectacle, when the multitude of warriors, dressed in their finest garments, with glittering spears in their hands and quivers on their backs, with knives and Japanese daggers in their belts, wrathfully brandishing their arms, make the primeval taiga resound with their wailing for revenge and appeal to the gods of all the elements for assistance:

Pal'- khurn myyá ! Tly - khurn myyá!

Tol' - khurn myyá! Mif - khurn myyá!

"God of the mountain, hearken; god of the sea, hearken; god of the heavens, hearken; god of the earth, hearken!" -- brandishing their spears and thrusting them at /100/ every tree on their path with the cry: "Chkhar, myyá! -- O tree, hearken!"... But this exuberant mood soon gives way to a more subdued temper; as they draw closer to the enemy settlement, their enthusiasm is transformed into a concentrated seriousness.

The foe has taken his precautions; in his native territory he is more familiar with all the best places for an ambush, and at strategic points he lies in wait in artificial trenches ("little pits"), from which he pours a hail of arrows on the unwary enemy. There is also no lack

177 baptism a means of guarding against abduction of their 797 women. Those who are baptized live just like the unbaptized ones, their children are usually not baptized, and their corpses are cremated. Their fellow-tribesmen by no means persecute them. A baptized Gilyak is regarded by the others somewhat as though he had shared in some special acquaintance.

802 XVI. Intellectual Development, Time-Computation, 805 Legends.

The Gilyak count to quite a high number: 2000, 5000 and more, but of course they almost never use such high figures The Gilyak year is half as long as the real one: winter which probably lasts half a year, is regarded as a whole year, the [245] remaining year being regarded as another one. Moreover, there are special names for the four seasons.

821 The Gilyak know how to find their way by the stars, and the Big Dipper and pole-star are their guides. They seem to have no particular assumptions with regard to the characteristics of the heavenly bodies. From some I heard that the sun and moon were inhabited by people. I could not learn anything definite about whether they might not be "the beyond". It can only be said that the other world is somewhere up above, not under the earth, as with the ancient Greeks.

805 The Gilyak do not count their years. Only of quite young 561 people one can hear it said approximately how old they are. Older people cannot remember their age and immediately say: "the Gilyak does not count his years". This means his own age, for with them there is no question of chronology or history.

173 The majority know nothing about their past. But from 181 several intelligent Gilyak I heard that once "a long time
721 ago", there was a war between the Amur-Gilyak and those of Sakhalin; that the latter came with a great many boats, but were defeated. There is also a tradition on Sakhalin which has it that three or four generations ago a long war raged, whose cause was the abduction of a woman. It is difficult to say whether this war is the same as the one of which the Amur-Gilyak tell. In any case, the long intervals between such wars testify to the peaceableness of this tribe. The Gilyak knew nothing of fighting with the first Russians who arrived.

In answer to the question whether they had always occupied their present settlements, most of them answered simply: "I do not know". However, I heard from one of

173 them that the old people had told him that one part of the 181 Gilyak came across the ocean, the other, from above, that 721 is, from approximately there where the city of Blagoveshchensk lies. May we not understand this to mean that they crossed over from Sakhalin and that the first immigrants mingled with the Goldi who were already to be found on the Amur?

153 If one asks how intelligent the Gilyak are, it may be said that for savages they are rather intelligent. In the arts, however, they are very backward. They know how to draw or carve various animals. The figures are coarse, but nevertheless [246] recognizable. Music and poetry are absolutely embryonic, but at least they like to hear music. Their memory for places and persons is astonishing. If a Gilyak meets a stranger somewhere, he recognizes him instantly after many years, and at the same time recalls all kinds of minor circumstances accompanying the original meeting. In languages, too, their memory is not bad, at least many of them speak Russian, but the reverse is not true. It is, however, doubtful whether the Gilyak's memory would be adequate for systematic instruction. In instruction the different facts cannot be directly understood but must be interpreted from the words of another, and thus a certain
212 imagination and judgment are needed. For a time there was 872 a school in the village of Mikhaylovskoye where Gilyak children were taught to read and write. This they learned very well, but nothing else was taught. The Gilyak, of course, do not have their own writing.

153 Curiosity and a desire for knowledge are average. The 609 former I judge in comparison with other uncultivated peoples whom I had the opportunity of observing, especially the Bashkir. The latter are so intrusive in their curiosity that they give the traveler no peace. Of course, the Gilyak also gather around a stranger who stops at their yurts, but not in great numbers; they keep at a certain distance and soon disperse. If they come into the house of a Russian, they look about them with curiosity but they do not immediately reach for everything that strikes them and do not ask for presents. In this, as in many other respects, they are decorous people.

153 If I must praise them in this connection, I must also say
821 that their desire for knowledge is not sufficiently matured
177 that they would be interested in the main springs of culture. It seldom occurs to them to ask a Russian about a machine, about economic questions, nature, institutions, religion,

/116 cont./

* 614 Or: one or another family is temporarily impoverished.
476 There is no special /117/ organ that must take care of them; it 182 is unnecessary, because the family will find hospitality and assistance in any house they choose, even of the most distant [574] kinsman, until the hard times change. And this is not offensive to anyone, for it is a rate thing for someone neither to enjoy hospitality nor to offer it to someone else from time to time.

* 614 Suppose it is necessary to arrange a troublesome and ex-476 pensive clan festival. There are neither collections nor coercions, 796 no organization for the reception of guests, and so on. Each 182 person prepares as much as he can according to his conscience, each bears his share of the labor, and only the man who is a little richer than the others takes upon himself the trouble of the arrangements. Everyone takes to his house the prepared viands and purchases; they meet at his house to share in the prefestival work.

During the bear festival, dozens of additional persons assemble from all sides. For several days it is necessary to feed not only the people, but also their many dogs. How much trouble, how much expense! Nevertheless, everything is arranged simply and to the general satisfaction of all. Each guest prefers, of course, to stay with the one who is closest to him in kinship or sympathy, where they take him in, not as a duty, but because they want him;
but in any home at all every arriving guest finds a sincere, cordial reception, because during the days of festive enthusiasm everyone wants to display his sympathy and to have broad intercourse with new people.

● 731 Hunger has appeared, the specter of terrible misfortune, 574 which can carry off the whole population of a village! All the 476 hungry ones who have not succeeded in dispersing to more fortunate 182 areas gather at the home of the man who still has some supplies, and the laws of hospitality are just as strong on this black day as in days of plenty.

476 /122 cont./
615 blood flows equally /123/ in the veins of both of the newlyweds, 585 the children of brother and sister. Standing in close connection
591 with this rite is the previously described moment in the bear 796 festival, when, before the shooting at the mark, the master of 615 the bear (the akhmal'k') and his ymgi each sets beside himself 476 an ax and a kettle, which are also called nich and which are also mutually exchanged. If the first rite symbolizes mutual sustenance, the second symbolizes reciprocal co-operation in hunting, which, as we shall soon see, has a quite real basis.

615 The principle of "sustenance" is not limited to periodic
* 614 visits to the relatives of the wife, although they have some 476 economic significance, since the akhmal'k'i each time, in 574 addition to the hospitality shown, give a valuable present
[606] to their ymgi, especially on the first visit after the marriage, [431] when the son-in-law /zyat'/ is customarily given, depending on the resources, one or several pairs of smart garments for
men. Cases of actual need are much more important. There
* 614 are times when one's own clan is powerless to aid its clansman, 476 because misfortune, having overtaken one, has overtaken all.
574 Let something happen during the season of the fish run to turn 606 them from their accustomed path, and general disaster is at 615 hand. At such a time there is a simple way out. A man gathers up his family, his dogs, and all his movable goods and chattels
in general and emigrates for the whole season to the settlement of his father-in-law.

Here he is met with outstretched arms, and from the first minute he feels himself at home, where they give him food and drink and share everything with him. The son-in-law /zyat'/, of course, is not a do-nothing; he helps in one way or another, but this is far from making up for the expenses involved in the long and unexpected visit of a whole family, often at a time when the supplies of fish have already been prepared and it is impossible to increase them.

615 Similar fraternal relations between akhmal'k'i and ymgi
204 are manifested in sea hunting and land undertakings.
225 The most important of these require the participation of 476 several persons: hunting bear in summer and winter (taking it
* 614

During

* 835 /184/ my residence of many years among the Gilyak, despite careful questioning, I heard of only two or three instances of clear violation of the prohibitive norms. The most outstanding of these instances took place in the settlement of Tamlevo, where a young Gilyak, after the death of his father, lived for some time with his young stepmother, purchased by his father shortly before his death. This incident shocked all Sakhalin, and he was spoken of as some kind of monster. Another commonly known incident involved the young Gilyak, Pavlinka, who married a woman from the clan of his ymgi, i.e., from the clan that took its wives from Pavlinka's clan. But Pavlinka [177] was a considerably Russified Gilyak who had served in the police service and regarded the customs of his people super-ciliously. Another Russified Gilyak, Allykh, from the settlement 177 of Tamlevo, after the death of one of his younger tuvn,
* 835 compelled the gathering of clansmen which was deciding, 587 as was customary, to whom the widow of the deceased should 768 pass, to award her to him, although he, as an aki (elder brother), had no rights whatever to this. But these cases are the exception and evoked an energetic reaction from the community.

684 In the first two cases the violators had to go into voluntary exile, i.e., settle outside the settlement and lead a lonely existence, with all the deprivations of clan blessings associated with ostracism. But, we repeat, these were quite [177] exceptional cases bound up with psychics changed under the influence of an alien culture (1).

* 835
183 587
768
● [731]

1. There are exceptional cases of another kind when the marriage norms are disrupted for the sake of upholding other norms which are considered even more important by society; this occurs during an epidemic, when a husband is not found for this or that widow according to the principles of the levirate.

/201 cont./

161 Still more destructive is the process of depopulation. We 177 are speaking not of the gradual dying out of separate families, 614 but mainly of the process of catastrophic depopulation. This
● 731 process is of comparatively recent origin, for it is an im-
* 194 mediate consequence of clashes with cultured peoples, first Eastern and later European peoples as well. These peoples, together with their alcohol and exploitations, have brought the Gilyak a whole set of communicable diseases with an especially destructive effect in their non-immunized primitive surroundings. We have already discussed the ravaging effects of this process. It is sufficient to say here that whole clans died out before my eyes, and one not infrequently meets clans in which only one or two individuals are left. It must be borne in mind that the process of depopulation does not by any means strike clans equally, so that at any given time one clan may remain untouched, while another may lose a considerable number of its members.

161 War also has an effect similar to that of diseases and 614 various other causes. Although according to the interclan
rules the women are spared and the number of men who are 77 killed is limited, nevertheless /202/ in the heat of battle
* 194 the rules are not always observed, and thus a military epopee can also lead to the destruction of a clan.

* 194 Contact with other peoples, both primitive and more 177 highly cultured, must have acted in an indirectly destructive manner. As a general rule, the contact of outlooks broadens intellectual horizons and weakens the strength of religious imperatives. A representative of a higher culture looks down on the institutions of a lower race, and the representatives of the latter gradually begin to observe their own institutions less rigorously themselves. At first separate individuals begin to violate the law a little, and they gradually begin to draw after them many others. The [582] Gilyak themselves assert that with the coming of the Russians their marriage regulations were considerably weakened. But even before the appearance of the Russians the Gilyak had contact with various other peoples.

/289 cont./

117 by two brothers. The Kegn -- came from southern Pilavo. Re-
103 cently arrived Olcha are here also; the starosta arrived here 12 614 years ago. The Kegn arose from the Goldi from Sofisk and the Ainu from Kryus-pal', their ancient settlement (1896). The Shafping are Amgun from Dal'dzhi; many many generations ago their fathers spoke Amgun. The Hirlung are the old inhabitants.
Their clan is in Chil'bi and Keshrvo (the Orochi). The Chilbifing are the Ornyr from Keshrvo -- the Lumr-ping came from Udyl' (Hurulong in Gilyak). There is no more of this clan in any other place (1910).

They came to be one clan in the following fashion: An Olcha married a Kegn widow, and then he bought a bear for a dead man. Without taking a woman, it is impossible to become a (common) clan. When the clans united, they had one Lezing and one Uigryf ("sinning" house, i.e., forbidden).

[361] Settlement of Yali (Egi:li), four kilometers below the settlement of Mokraya; seven yurts. Clans: /290/ 1) Lezing-ran (one house); 2) Chling-fing (Kedu'-Orel' -- lake), probably Negidal; 3) one family from N'anivo (1910).

Amng-khal, Narmlang, Jarli-fing (Goldi from the Khungarli, Jegni and Njenkhafing. With regard to the origin of the last clan, there is the following legend. One Goldi brother wanted to take off the or (see below, the settlement of Kol') from a girl, and another suggested killing her. The killer left for N'enkha (near Nikolayevsk).

117 Settlement of Kaki (13 kilometers from Vaydy). Before 103 the epidemic there were 20 houses here; 5 yurts. Three ● 731 Russians, one Uigryf. Clans: 1) Tvabifing -- 14 persons. 2)
173 Amng from the Amgun: only three persons were left, the rest [361] died. Three houses died out during the last epidemic (1910).
3) Kegnang from Choma. 4) The Tvan-fing. One old man says that he is down from the Goldi, another from the Ul' River near Avra. 5) Amn-khal -- Goldi; they came from above; the first master of this village; this is the oldest khal. In the past this was a large khal but then all of its inhabitants died out (1896).
117 Settlement of Chikharbakh. Torkhung-khal (1896).
103

/308 cont./

765 has cuckooed for a long time, drinks water from a cup. Go well, 775 live well, (observe) the law of your fathers, the law of your mothers, the law of your elder brothers. Go." These words are said at the ordinary funeral repasts.

After a while they buy a bear, feed it for two years, and then 769 hold a bear festival. If a kinsman of the deceased does not buy a bear, 796 he is treated with contempt and reviled -- "inain khardz:. " "What 624 sort of a person are you? Your mother brought you up, cleaned up your excrement. A good man does not even abandon his pryski like that." One cannot be tried for such a vilification. One's clansmen always help one to hold a bear festival.

587 The woman cannot marry until the major funeral repast
768 is over.

766 They inter a baby up to a week old on a tree, up to half a year old -- in the ground. If a child who died before he was [842] three days old were cremated, his mother would not have children for a long time.

[184] On the Amur four little firs with roots are placed over the grave.

● [731] During pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) the dead are not cremated, but must be buried in a grave.

Drowned persons. Uiglyf -- the place where a drowned man has been pulled out. When a man has drowned, he is cremated, and on the third day they make a toln'ir, i.e., a cup for sacrifices to the master of the water, a trough, and a kinys -- a cup for the drowned man; mos' is placed in the trough, in the cup -- red currants. They pity the man; they select two or three /309/ brave men, put the deceased in a boat on the bank there by the water, and place a kinys nich, a Chinese kettle, and one rose-willow branch standing to the height of a man. At this point one man says: "Kettle, boil, steam, rise, move upwards, you, rose-willow branch, widen, make a good covering so that the devil does not see the Gilyak."

/313 cont./

796 morning it is necessary to take back the ski and so forth quietly
782 and stealthily. These things are placed so that the Tly-n'ivukh descend the tree, and by these objects they find out the nature of the Tly-n'ivukh and "if he has a good heart," if he will give a "risk" /fart/ or not. "After all, five of us go, one caught something while another goes on and on pursuing but gets nothing. What is the reason for this?"

● 731 During a takh -- smallpox epidemic -- in Tyr all the 782 Gilyak assemble, make a sacrifice -- bow, present rice, roots, [165] and berries. First the 120-year-old man Zyavkayu from the village of Dyl'myu sacrifices. They pray before the tree chédzigr. This old man remembers four big takh.

796 Pal likes a tree with different peculiarities, and on solemn 788 occasions such objects are selected. A sacrifice is always made to one's clan Pal-yz' (the master of the mountains), but they are not made to Pila-yz' (the great master). He is most frequently seen on a knoll. One must not shout to him. There is a conversation going on on the other side -- that is Pal-yz'. Pal -- mountain master -- likes a black dog. Tol -- sea master -- a [372] white one. Each large house has two fires, Pal-tuur and Tol-tuur.
[354] If a person has one stove, it is only Tol-tuur, and if he must boil bear meat, he goes to a clansman of that khala who has two stoves.

798 Tol-takhej -- a takhej of larch; a hammer, chong-chtâs', 782 is hung on it. Near it is a halynyr (bench /labaz/)on which are 324 placed the carcasses of dolphins, kaluga, and reindeer. And here 225 they invariably boil the dolphins, here the bones are left to lie, except the skulls and heads, which are carried away to k:khork n'angof, i.e., a place where they put skulls. During the fynyndz: only two dishes are placed on the halynyr -- mos' and muvi (kissel/ a jelly-like dish/). It is also from here, in the presence of the entire khala, that they throw a little of everything into the Amur, but say nothing -- otherwise another misfortune will occur. -- Then on the takhej they hang tobacco, agi:a (akhydz') -- a bunch, yukola -- pys' and announce that everyone should come out and feed it. This is the main office of Tol. People are sent

/ 319/

XI.

Miscellanea

823 The cliff Uj-pame, in the form of an isolated stone pillar, is between Khez' and Chil'mi. Formerly one could hear how the [782] master of the cliff beat on a tambourine. Three times (a year)
[796] they made sacrifices to him and addressed to him the request: "Pkhys'kyr ururungja'! -- do good for us with your risk!"

731 During a pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) they bring fire-958 wood and water to the sick, but do not themselves enter the house.

● 731 When they learn that it is all over in all the settlements
953 (i.e., the epidemic is over), then the dead are taken out of their 766 graves and burned; they are afraid of burning them earlier for they believe that smoke spreads infection. The only thing that is allowed is the smoking with marsh tea in the yurt.

538 The Female Character. Proverbs. 1) The female character is 562 like a whirlwind, similar to the wind. 2) With just a tug you will change the female character. 3) A woman is like a fire started in a clear field; the wind blows and it is out.

158 Meryachen'e. In Charbakh two people suffer from the disease
[143] meryachen'e -- two women; this sickness is inherited in the female line. Those who suffer from meryachen'e repeat literally everything, even in a foreign language; they repeat even actions. The attacks come during a fright. The sick woman is then unconscious, but later she comes to. If attempts are made to compel her to repeat something many times, she is ready to attack with a knife. In their youth they did not suffer from meryachen'e.

There are other such sick people in Tymvo and Pronga.

Gi
H-M. /314 cont./

105 2. (cont.)
731 (Goldi) on the Ussuri. Smallpox is said to cause 113 heavy devastation there at times, even attacking old people 70-80 years of age and recurring among some persons four and five times (De la Brunière, "Excurs. en Mandchourie, en 1845." -- Nouv. Ann. des Voyages, fifth series, Vol. XVI, 1848 [Vol. IV], p. 113).

SS. course in the opposite direction, from the Sungari down the Amur, 175 but found extremely fertile soil in the lower river area and on 648 Sakhalin, where the natives in many instances had already 731 emerged from their natural condition as a result of the Russian colonization. Toward the end of December 1856, the epidemic, SS proceeding down the Sungari, was at its mouth (3). In June, 175
731

3. Just at the time when the merchant Pargatschefskij /Pargachevskii/, traveling up the Amur, passed this place.

1857, following the lower Amur, it reached Kidsi, in July Uchtr, in September Nikolayevsk, and during the winter months of 1857/58 it raged at the Amur mouth, along the Liman, on the Sea of Okhotsk to beyond Kulj, and on Sakhalin. According to the description, which I owe to Dr. Pfeiffer, an eyewitness of these events, the disease throughout bore the character of a devastating epidemic appearing on new ground. Whereas individual Gilyak
G villages, such as Tebach and Allof, remained completely un-
● [731] touched in a curious fashion, others, such as Kulj and Langr, [165] lost half of their inhabitants, and many yurts died out completely. The number of victims was all the larger, because the sick, still completely unfamiliar with their uncanny visitor, often sought cooling, half-naked, in the snow and wind, in order to escape G the heat of the fever. Dr. Pfeiffer thinks, on the basis of the [731] statistics collected by him, that this epidemic killed about 20 [165] per cent of the Gilyak population. A few years later, in the

SS /317 cont./ A more numerous Gilyak 162 population on the island in former times is indicated, among G other things, by the fact that on the west coast there are two 174 villages which bear the name "Pilja-wo," that is, great village, 161 the one on the Sea of Okhotsk, the other on the northern part of 361 the Sea of Japan, and both are highly insignificant today (3).

G 3. According to Glehn ("Reiseber. von der Insel SS Sachalin /Travel Report from the Island of [113] Sakhalin/." -- Beitr. zur Kenntn. des Russ. Reiches, Vol. XXV, p. 233), the first of these villages has only one yurt today; concerning the other one, which has three of them, see above, p. 29, note 1. Incidentally, when Glehn, while discussing these traces of a formerly larger population on the Gilyak part of G Sakhalin, also mentions the smallpox which [114] broke out devastatingly in the fifties, this has ● [731] nothing to do with the depopulation under discussion here. This is the above-mentioned epidemic of the winter of 1857/58, which at that time was still fresh in the memory, whereas that village had been deserted long before. But the smallpox left other marks of devastation behind, which will be discussed later.

SS
162 Nevertheless, this west coast of Sakhalin, turned toward the [132] continent and the mouth of the Amur, is now, next to the Tymy /Tym'/ Valley, the most populous part of the island; the east coast with its much harsher climate is understandably much more deserted.

SS /318/ I must content myself with these general remarks con-161 cerning the more or less large population of the various parts of 114 the Amur region and forgo numerical values because of the lack of adequate data. To be sure, one does occasionally find state-SS ments concerning the total number of individuals for particular [175] Amur peoples, but these figures have little value. That the data

361 /330 cont./
342 3. Specifically they were the Gilyak Jaftun and 184 Pryngan from the village of Dshongi, and 115 Tanskin from the village of Nganj-wo on the 114 Liman.

A few years later
114 (1861) Glehn traveled through a section of this coast and made 342 a list of all the villages there, as well as the number and nature 184 of their yurts (4). In comparing my data with his, though they 361
161

4. Op. cit., pp. 232 ff.

essentially agree, they nevertheless show some differences which are almost entirely of such a kind as to lead one to conclude that there has been a decrease in the population in this part of Sakhalin during this interval of time. For instance, the number of villages in my list, especially the small ones with only one earth yurt, is larger than in Glehn's, in which the names also occur, but combined with other designations as referring to one and the same, no smaller settlement. Likewise, for the larger villages, my list almost throughout gives a larger number of yurts than Glehn's.

342 This depopulation which took place after my time is fully 36 explained by the above-mentioned severe smallpox epidemic
184 which ravaged precisely this part of the Amur region in the winter 114 of 1857/58. As has been noted, many a yurt died out completely, 16 and in the case of many small settlements which numbered no
● 731 more than one, only the name survived, which could easily have been taken by later travelers as a synonymous designation for one of the adjacent villages. Where /331/ our reports differ with regard to the nature of the yurts -- whether earth yurts or Chinese yurts -- they always deal with villages which Glehn had not visited and concerning which he therefore could report only on the basis of statements by the natives. For this reason and because in the preceding and following observations I always view the Amur region as of the time of my stay there, I must describe the distribution of the earth yurts and the Chinese winter-yurts on Sakhalin in accordance with the data that I myself collected.

/331 cont./

114 description one learns that the Gilyak ("Tataren") at the time
361 it was August 15/27 -- lived in their summer yurts. Somewha 342 apart, however, lay other, apparently better built houses, pro vided with fireplaces and chimneys, which, however, stood empty at the time (3) -- evidently the above-described winter

3. Krusenstern, Reise um die Welt, Vol. II, pp. 178, 182.

houses of the Gilyak. Here, therefore, is other proof of the presence of tschadryf villages in this part of Sakhalin, too (4).

114 4. In order to supplement and verify my above
361 data and at the same time to make it possible
103 to compare them more precisely with Glehn's, I am adding here the whole list of the villages explored by me north of Poghobi on Sakhalin, with a statement of the number and nature of their yurts. To be sure, we did not always hear the names of the villages exactly the same, but it is not difficult to recognize them. I am also
● [731] adding in parentheses the number of yurts given by Glehn, for from this one can judge the extent of the depopulation caused by the smallpox epidemic of 1857-1858, especially for the part of the coast extending south of Pomyr-wo, where Glehn himself visited most of the points and counted their yurts. The following villages 114 lie north of Poghobi:
361
103
342

Wismeryf . . .	with	1	earth yurt
Warsj	"	1 (1)	"
Ngyith	"	1 (4)	"
Dshongi	"	1	Chinese yurt
Loktschi	"	1 (1)	earth yurt
Jûgdama	"	1 (1)	"
Pyrki	"	1 (1)	"

/85 cont./

*614 597 [927] This took place in various ways. It might happen that an epidemic depopulated the clan and put a handful of people face to face with all the vicissitudes to which unions weak in numbers were subject. The clan might be depopulated after a severe war, leaving a small number of men and a mass of widows spared by the victorious foe by virtue of the international law of the Gilyak. And if under these conditions there existed remnants of some other clan that found itself in a similarly helpless position and not standing in the relation of akhmal'k and ymgi with respect to the first clan, then a fusion was effected to their mutual satisfaction. The adopted individuals ordinarily married the widows of clansmen and thereby united themselves with the clan fire and the clan union. But these are more or less extraordinary cases. The most common case of adoption is that where the person adopted by the clan is a member of another clan, fleeing for some reason from his own clan and settling down in the midst of an alien clan. Long residence, habit, sympathy, assistance given at clan festivals, and, finally, marriage to a local widow lead to the final adoption. An extremely curious case of adoption is that where two persons of different clans are married to two sisters, which, according to the law, can only take place with members of one clan. The influence of the clan principle of a "common father-in-law" is so strong /86/ that the children of such persons are considered brothers and sisters, call their aunts mothers, and cannot marry each other. A fiction of clan relationships results. Under favorable conditions, when, for example, such persons live together in one village and one of them is completely severed from his clan, the result is that they help each other at clan festivals, or even arrange them together, lay the bones of the bear in one place, and, finally, in the second or third generation the union of the clans is completed.

/358 cont./

614 628 72 in boats or sleds, according to the time of the year. The attack was ordinarily made at night. In expectation of it, the whole adult male population, armed, /359/ gathered in one yurt. The women and children remained alone in other yurts, since, by the international law of the Gilyak, the women, children, and also the property of the foe was inviolate in time of war. In each [342] yurt there was a secret exit in case of an unexpected attack. At the first alarm of war they went out by the secret passage and organized an ambuscade somewhere beyond the yurts. The struggle continued for the night in one variant, longer according to others, but there is no doubt that there was a customary period of time for slaughter. Upon the expiration of the allotted period of time, the foe departed, while those attacked began to count the dead. If a smaller number had fallen on their side than on the side of the assailants, the affair had no sequel; otherwise they were obliged to reply to the attack with war. The attacking side, in any case, had to consider itself satisfied. For the [501] eventuality of meeting at sea an enemy boat which might wish to exchange arrows, boats had a movable parapet in the forward part for defense against the foe's arrows.

411 Concerning the former warlike propensities of the Gilyak, we have the eloquent testimony of the heavy spears with silver fretwork, guarded today as a treasure, which even quite recently served for more than mere decoration.

614 597 7. In certain instances, but quite rarely, the clan adopts persons from another clan. It was always profitable for a clan to have as many members as possible. On the other hand, the existence of an individual outside of the clan or hostile toward his own clan was a terribly burdensome thing. During the census some of the persons encountered declared that their entire clan had died out. In such cases and similar ones an alien clan came [729] to their assistance with the right of adoption. Undoubtedly in time of war, when the whole male adult population might fall in battle, the women entered the clan of the conquerors in the capacity of wives, while the children of the male sex were adopted en masse. The adopted individual is accepted into some

73

/354 cont./

614 2. Marriage within the clan is absolutely forbidden. This is a basic and inviolable principle of the clan. However broad the marital rights of the Gilyak are with regard to women of the categories mentioned, however broad the views of the Gilyak ar on the relationship of men and women in general ("love forgives everything"), within the clan neither marriage nor adultery is encountered, even as an exception.

614 580 3. The wife of a deceased Gilyak is transferred, following the decision of the clan, to one of the ruvn of the deceased, generally to a younger one; even though she be assigned to a ruvn who is older than the deceased, he is obliged to support he although he cannot live with her as with a wife. But under no circumstances can the wife of the deceased pass to the persons i the ascending or descending line of kinship from the deceased, i.e., to his khal'-ytk, atk, ola. Generally speaking, as a rule a woman living as a wife (de facto), with someone may under n circumstances belong to anyone in the ascending or descending line of kinship with her first husband. This rule is observed as strictly as the prohibition against internal marriage. Therefore 614 it is easy to understand why a Gilyak looks on many marriages [829] concluded among us between near relatives as incest. From thi it follows that it is of the utmost necessity for a Gilyak to know all his clansmen, who are often very numerous and, in addition scattered over the most distant parts of Gilyak territory. This knowledge of his own clan constitutes one of the elements of th [867] mental upbringing of a Gilyak. This knowledge passes from father to son, it is renewed with life, and is the possession of th [623] whole clan. In doubtful cases of kinship, the questions are decided by the elders in the clan.

614 73 4. The khal' supports all the old people, the sick, the in capacitated, and other helpless persons. Generally this is done by the nearest kinsmen, but, in the absence of such, the perso is supported by that yurt of the khal' where he wants to live. " do not have any beggars," one Gilyak told me, "if someone is poor, he is fed by the khal'."

731

731 DISASTERS--prevalence and major types of disasters (e.g., earthquakes, demics, conflagrations, typhoons, tornadoes, floods, droughts, famines, plagues); explanations and rationalizations; incidence of disastrous accid (e.g., train wrecks); reactions to disasters; organization of relief (e.g. public); role of special relief agencies (e.g., Red Cross); emergency m reconstruction, preventive measures (e.g., flood control); etc. See also:

Relief agencies	74	Adjustments to famine
Cyclonic storms	132	Water supply
Areas of volcanic and seismic activity	133	Municipal fire-fighting services
Occurrence of epidemics	164	Reconstruction of war damage

724

724

S--wartime procurement of military supplies; logistic planning; or-of land, sea, and air transport; expediting of supplies; depots, dumps, y trains; etc. See also:

port . . . . . 49 Military vehicles, naval vessels, and air transport . . . . . 50 military aircraft 71 Organized commissariat and supply services . 705

/102 cont./

*614 only one of its kind, must have worn out th
628 spirit more than the most active resistance 562 corpus, day and night they go about the en looking into every bush, every blade of gra enemy in ambush. And if the attackers do whelming number that makes it possible to expectant enemy, they will never succeed of the inviolable chain of sentries, and the tackers, worn out by boredom, the march, of necessity breaks on the passive resistanc
the basis for peace has been established.

In order to appreciate fully the import [784] participation of the women in the struggle
● [724] be kept in mind that in many clans it is fo on alien territory, /103/ use the water of i etc., so that, like the Biblical dwellers of find it necessary to set off on an expedition filled with water and as much food supplie Under such conditions every extra day of w by famine, and thus the vigilance of the w conquers.

175 Here is one of the examples known to
*614 of the settlement of Tebakh set off overlan
628 one of the clans of the settlement of Kol' 562 clansman. After a long march, and a still 724 period of waiting as a result of the vigilan poles in their hands, ceaselessly searching in their skin-carriers finally gave out, and depart with nothing and terminate the mat small causes often lead to important conse

*614 Tylor was right when he asse that [97] relations between clans and introduced pea [114] ceeded from the mistaken conjecture that brought to life the very institution of exog primitive man is not so sentimental, he is that he would sacrifice with a light heart h ment for a breach of his blood duty to the ie foe and weakened his

. Utilizing their habeas virons in perfect safety ass, in search of the not possess an over-fall openly upon the in eluding the vigilance patience of the at-the torment of waiting,
e of the weaker sex, and

tance of the passive of the clans, it must rbidden to light a fire
ts rivers and springs, hunt, Gibeon, the Gilyak
n loaded down with skins
s as a man can carry.
aiting threatens death omen necessarily

me. In 1851, 30 men d to take vengeance on for the slaying of a longer and more fruitless ce of the women, with the locality, the water the avengers had to ter peacefully ... Thus quences.
exogamy weakened the ce, although he pro-
the aspiration for peace
my. It is true that mainly too "god-fearing," is own fears of punish-voice of feeling, or

727

727 AFTERMATH OF COMBAT--number and nature of casualties; treatment of own casualties (e.g., retrieving and disposal of dead, care of wounded); treatment of enemy casualties (e.g., despoiling, mutilation, killing); taking of trophies; treatment of captives and prisoners (e.g., slaughter, torture, mutilation, release, exchange, holding for ransom, adoption, enslavement, sacrifice); punishment of enemy leaders; military occupation and military government; homecoming after war (e.g., return trip, reception of returning warriors); home reactions to victory and defeat; victory celebrations (e.g., dances, feasts, memorials); demobilization; resumption of normal life; reconstruction of war damage; etc. See also:

Commemorative statues and monuments 211
Cannibalism 266
Mutilation 304
War dances 535
Slavery 567
Colonial administration 636
Prisons 697
Mortuary practices 764

/314 cont./

IX.

Ideas about Animals

825 Choramladz: (chkhoramland) -- like a cat or a polecat, even smaller than a cat; black lip. They move in herds; their footprints have been seen. They are considered most dangerous animals. If you come upon them, you must climb a tree; they surround the tree, but cannot climb it. The man ties his hat to a twig and lowers it down, the animals jump up; the man back, they fall, chew the hat, etc. Finally he saves himself: he waves a long pole around, and they run from the noise.

825 The oldest of all the land animals are pal-miv-kmyg:
703 myg:nga igagù syktymu yz´mudz:gu. They are of the human race. Once the lion, the tiger, and the bear were human beings. They "did it through the rear" with their wives. Kur, by accident, saw this. He said to them: "Since you have intercourse like beasts, so remain beasts in the future." Then they became beasts. Therefore they are considered to be of the human race. The bear was also a human being, but he used to walk on all fours. Kur saw this: "Since you walk like a beast, so walk like a beast." But he does not have intercourse through the rear.

839 There is no bestiality. -- On Sakhalin there was once
● 732 born a boy with a tail.

825 The lark makes thunder, and therefore one must not kill it.
821 It is a sin to approach its nest with baby birds -- there will be thunder.

The thunder bird -- tet lyj zevrk: -- makes thunder and, opening its mouth -- lightning.

825 /315/ The loon is the principal water bird. The oldest loon, ugn, with a tail, cries in a thin, humanlike voice, "o-o-o!" The second -- k:akhtr, ag:nî, is smaller, cries "ka, ka, ka," or "vakh, vakh!" The third loon -- arn´ is the smallest and cries in an almost human voice "a-a-a!"

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'ka's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

[532] A representation of twins -- tongch: -- is placed in a litt
[778] storehouse. If one of the twins dies, they place one tongch:, w [782] if both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chukh-chug is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon. Kinsm and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

[775] When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-n´gyvyn, wh
[787] gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.

766 A dead twin is not cremated, but is seated in Turkish fash in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounde with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cre- mated after death, but is dressed in white and buried, also with inau placed around. According to B. Pilsudski, the same is don with the father of twins.

778 The tongch: helps catch bears and in hunting in general.
224 The tongch: is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis 764
782 (Slyavo).

Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or 847 even upon the order of the father of the underage husband of a woman.

682 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a b the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

753 Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-n´igyvyn or by Tol-n´igyvy 776 but each of them takes a milk not from his kingdom.

/338/ A milk can be of different shapes and often is red blood and hard as stone, but when he enters a person, he becor lively, "as if he were walking."

● 732 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in 758 summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

753 Kkhmas´ind -- to be sick from not getting what one saw and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets we

9: Hawes--250-251 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 732, 828

"Yungkin announced Gilyaks. A party were returning to Chaivo, and seeing our fire had stopped for a warm, a pipe, and some tea. They joined us around the cheerful blaze, talking volubly, and taking some pleasure in pointing out to us one of their number, who, they said, had a devil in him. He was an idiot, one glance at his face was sufficient to determine that, and without showing any violence continued to make the strangest contortions. His presence completed the weirdness of the scene, this group of uncouth figures of a primitive people crouched round a fire on a desolate island on a wild night. The madman, who was known as 'Oto,' lived in one of two huts which are on the opposite side of the Strait of Chaivo. He was not [251] allowed to work, but his comrades supplied all his wants, for they regarded him as a kind of sacred person singled out or set apart by the unseen powers. He was not, however, permitted to have a wife."

: Hawes--254 T-3 (1901) 19
6, 225, 731, 776, 782

oung seals, which will be equally divided a est wind drives away the ice-floes and the among them. This continues until a south-ir passengers."

9: Hawes--256-257 T-3 (1901)
116, 226, 251, 262, 731

"Fish being the staple article of foo is necessarily of great importance to generally consumed by December, and arrival of the seals in April there is o aeglefinus, or Vachnya), or in the Gil shore and gazes seaward, he will see the figures of men wrapped from head
In their [257] hands are sticks with big coming to the hole made in the ice, an a man has been known to catch as man

d, the 'bread' of the Gilyaks, the summer supply them. The winter stores of sun-dried kita are l then comes the hard time for them. Until the nly one other visitant. This is the haddock (Gadus yak tongue, kan-hi. If one is sledging along the black specks among the gleaming ice. They are to foot in skins, and they are hooking haddock.
g hooks attached, and the hungry and stupid fish d grabbing at the hook, is caught. By this means y as 300 in a day."

cent., or scarcely 1/4 per cent., per annum.

Lung and throat diseases and scurvy account people, but four died from accident, of whom o already mentioned hanged herself, and another

ed for most of the deaths among the older ne was frozen, another drowned, one was beaten to death by her husband."

164 conjunctivitis, corneal obscuration, and sty. Some cannot 293 stand a strong light and this is particularly noticeable in February and March because at that time, in the mid-day sun [249] the snow which is already partly melting on the surface, is intolerably blinding. These people, if they must go out during the day, wear spectacles of braided horsehair, which they make themselves. Among Gilyak women who do a great deal of fine needle work, nearsightedness occurs.

164 The infrequency of eye diseases seems to be partly connected with the non-prevalence of miasmatic and infectious diseases. (1) Soldiers also suffer little with their eyes, in spite of the blinding snow. The abundant summer rain fall, the long, severe winter, and, finally, the sparse population account for the scarcity of miasmatic and infectious diseases, in spite of the widespread swamps.

1. Disguised ague and scurvy are to a certain extent exceptions.

But as for the febrile skin diseases, which among the Russians occur more seldom than in Europe, they are a veritable scourge among the natives. Whether they were known before the advent of the Russians is difficult to say, but one may assume that they were less frequent and permitted the population to recover. Now, however, they suffer more.

After several murderous epidemics of smallpox and measles, there remained gaps which will not be so easily filled. This seems to be the chief reason for the decrease in the native population.

164 The nervous and mental diseases which occur among the 158 European inhabitants more frequently than in Europe,
732 chiefly from causes of a social nature (nostalgia, alcoholism etc.) are not wide-spread among the Gilyak. I heard of epilepsy, but nothing of neuralgias, paralyses, and idiocy. I know of one case of chronic intermittent mania. However, diseases in this category will increase if whiskey-drinking should become prevalent.

752 External illnesses such as: burns, frost-bite, sprains, breaks, etc., of course occur, but I saw no case which resulted in permanent injury. From this one may conclude that the primitive methods of healing combined with the power of nature usually conquer such illnesses. [250]

164 Chronic skin diseases occur rather frequently. The chief cause of these is, of course, the lack of cleanliness, but it

735

35 POVERTY--prevalence and definition of poverty; causes (e.g., low income, unemployment, sickness, alcoholism, improvidence, indolence); social attitudes toward poverty; begging and beggars; poor relief (e.g., almsgiving, private charity, public relief); special institutions for the poor (e.g., almshouses); support of institutions (e.g., municipal, ecclesiastical, private endowment); etc. See also:

Social stratification 56
Social insurance, public assistance, and private welfare agencies 74
Laziness 461
Wages 465
Housing 362
Gift giving 431
Income 434
Standards and levels of living 511

"It often happens that by the time of the arrival of th quite exhausted, and hunger reigns in the village; neve fête held in honor of the first catch; see category 116, with all due ceremony. On the following day the whole groups begin to gather up the 'fragments,' including th and reverence, are cast into the sea. The flesh and fa has plenty of raw, are offerings to Tol ni vookh, with permission to use the products of his domain, the sea;
offering in acknowledgment of the god's goodwill in s Gilyaks to open the New Year's fête with the due and p bones the great Tol ni vookh will make many more sea the bones to the four winds, thus making it more diffic Tol ni vookh would in that case have to recreate entire has only to reclothe them with flesh, and lo, the seals

The offering is cast into the sea in complete silence Uichkha rush, or water daimones, who, if they should would spoil the whole affair, by seizing what was inten

After the day of the offering, the Gilyak is free to fo ful is he with his harpoon that a canoe of five will som e seals, the winter stores are ertheless, the fête [LSS: The seal

pp. 252-254.] must be celebrated village turns out, and the family
e bones, which, in deep silence
t, boiled or roasted, for the god the request that he will give them and the bones are the thank-ending the seals and allowing the roper ceremonies. With these ls. It would be a sin to scatter ult to create for want of material. ly, whereas, given the bones, he are complete, alive!
, because there are many overhear the Gilyak praying, ded for the god.
llow up the hunt, and so success-etimes take as many as fifty

"The older Gilyaks say that during th famine had occurred before the Russia
there have been many repetitions. In th 1897, there were successive bad times, be given to the natives by the authoritie tion of the usual stores of dried fish, a worthy ex-overseer at Derbensk, in wh during that year. So terrible was the st every hut,' and in the hope of stemming famine, he took upon himself the respo most cases it was already too late, and [275] condition of the huts, and the acc
the ravages of disease and the exposure

Such a state of things presses hardly of mortality among them. There being tion, we can only gather from tradition statistics of recent years, the gradual

The figures already quoted show, for tween Arkovo and Cape Maria on the w eir time, and their fathers' before them, but one ns came, about eighty years ago, but since then e winter and early spring of 1896, and again of

, and around Rikovsk special assistance had to
s. In 1898, a wet autumn prevented the accumuland was followed by another very bad winter. The ose hut we had stayed, was on duty down the Tim tate of things that he found 'one or more dying in g the tide of disease following on the ravages of nsibility of giving away the Crown stores; but in l large numbers died of the grippe. The filthy umulations of winter, aggravated the effects of e to the severities of the climate.
on the children, and accounts for the high rate no statistics of the early years of Russian occupaand the shrinking of villages and from isolated diminution of the Gilyak race on Sakhalin.
the population of the Gilyak villages lying be-est coast, the miserable increase of $\frac{10}{43}$ per

422/278 cont./
583 iron, served as objects in the shagynd (1).
[174]

[773]

1. The following splendid legend gives evidence concerning this. In the central section of Sakhalin there is a mountain, Kryus' pal, and along side of it another, somewhat smaller mountain, the "wife" of the latter, who has run away from him and hidden her shagynd. Three riverside rocks represent the different objects of the shagynd. One bears the designation Wa-ul-s'if, meaning "place where the Japanese saber is buried," another Wyn-ul-af -- "place where the kettle is buried," and the third, Kys'okhty -- the butt of the ax.

583 These are objects which are unalienable, extra commercium.
422 Only in exceptional cases of extreme poverty or the absence of 556 clansmen is the alienation of objects of the shagynd category
735 allowed, and even then only a part of them. A poor widow in the 554 settlement of Pilavo, who had sold her only daughter, answered my question as to what she was going to do with the shagynd in this way: "Part of it I shall sell, and the remainder will go with me to Mlyvo -- to the world beyond the grave." They are preserved for only exceptional cases in the life of the owner -- for the payment of blood money on account of a slaying, or when one must marry off one's sons and pay a bride price or give a dowry to one's daughters, and, after the death of the owner -- to accompany him to the world beyond the grave. Only such objects figure in the bride price of rich persons. But among persons of lesser means, the bride price is made up of valuable utilitarian 554 objects -- boats, guns, dogs, and so forth.
583 Rich people, seeking a large bride price, are guided mainly 735 by ambition, for obtaining a rich bride price is the best evidence [556] of one's own wealth. For a poor man the bride price is his only

/278 cont./

583 chance to establish an independent economy. But there is anot
554 side to the coin -- it is almost impossible for a poor man to set 735 down with a family, and, consequently, an independent econo
But to a certain degree the rights of group marriage and the pos bility of leading a common domestic life with his brothers com [183] to his rescue. Everyone's dream, however, is to settle down wi [614] his own family. Usually the clan in the persons of the well-to-[496] clansmen comes to the rescue of the poor man. But not every has rich people, and, besides, there are persons whose clan has died out. The only solution then is to obtain a wife by work.
Usually such a transaction is entered into by a family in which there are no offspring of the male sex, and it is as though the son-in-law were declared an adopted son, although, as a mem-583 ber of another clan, he cannot be an actual heir. Methods of 554 lightening the payment of the bride price are practiced: a wife 452 is purchased in small installments with yearly payments until he 735 majority. But also in the purchase of an adult, /279/ installme buying is sometimes practiced, depending on the contract. A 583 curious means of paying the bride price is the case of payment 735 with the bride price of a future daughter. I know of such a case 554 The Gilyak Kanka married the sister of the young boy Pletunka.
He did not pay a bride price, but he promised to support his widowed mother and to hand over to him the bride price of his future daughter. And the agreement was fulfilled. Pletunka was about twenty years old when Kanka gave his own daughter in marriage, and he handed over the whole bride price to Pletu

583 As a matter of principle the bride price belongs to the cla
614 At a difficult moment of life, for example, if it becomes [627] necessary to pay blood money, each clan-member takes part with his shagynd. But usually the bride price is distributed amo the brothers, although not proportionately; the youngest, as heir to the house, usually receives the smallest share. Besides this, the elder brother buys a wife for the younger brother before his own marriage, so that the younger brother does not need the shagynd for bride price. Along with the distribution of the bride

7G

32

relative humidity is lower in summer than in fall and winter, but here the opposite is the case. Moreover the difference between the maximum and minimum of atmospheric humidity is much greater here than there. In winter during a purga, it is true, the humidity increases, but afterward it decreases again so considerably that the winter air may in general be said to be very dry. In the houses furniture splits and tobacco turns to powder. We spoke above of the summer fogs, but we must add that in these latitudes they seldom penetrate more than a few German miles inland (1) so that in the Amur

1. Along the southern coastal region they travel farther inland.

country itself one cannot complain of them. In summer, however, there are many rainy days.

The climate is generally healthful. Thus, for instance, the army of the coastal region has an average of fewer illnesses and deaths than the army of European Russia, although food and manner of living are by no means better. The birth rate among the Russian peasants between Nikolayevsk and Sofiyskoye outweighs the death rate considerably and more than in European Russia. However, some diseases occur more frequently in the coastal region, such as neurasthenia and mental diseases (2), chronic stomach- and intestinal-

2. This does not seem to apply to the natives.

catarrh and scurvy. The latter two seem to be of miasmatic origin, of which I shall present evidence in another connection.

III. Bodily Characteristics and Features

In general the Gilyak are below medium height, but people of very small stature do not occur, especially among the men who are more often tall. The women are considerably shorter and tall ones are not to be found. The average height of 12 men whom I actually measured was 162.2 centimeters, and that of eight women was 150.4 centimeters. These people had, of course, been picked at random.

The Gilyak are well-proportioned; they have relatively broad shoulders, very well-developed chests, small hands and feet. Their legs are usually slightly bowed (rider's legs) as a result of their straddle seats on the sleds and their bent

142 posture in rowing. Paunches and hunchbacks, etc. are not 516 to be found, and in general bodily abnormalities and de-732 formities are much less often found among these savages than among civilized peoples. Their features are not beautiful, although the Gilyak are by no means the ugliest race of men. Their heads are broad and markedly brachycephalic. Their thick black hair, parted in the middle, falls down their back in a braid. Their eyebrows are thick, black and often bristly toward the root of the nose. Their eyes are small, but not conspicuously so, as is the case with some other races. (1) They are straight and slant somewhat up-

1. Thus, in my opinion, the eyes of the Buryats, rather than those of the Gilyak are like slits.

ward and outward. Their color is without exception dark. The cheek bones are moderately prominent, the nose short and usually flat. In women the column of the nose is not pierced as is the case with Goldi women who wear nose rings. They do not have a large mouth, their lips are thick and red. They frequently hold their mouths open, showing two complete rows of strong, white teeth. If one examines their mouths closely one discovers that the incisors are more or less worn down from their pipes. Their beards and moustaches are black, but thin. The ear-lobes of both men and women are pierced for earrings.

142 Their complexion is brownish. Their facial expression is 302 serious; friendly faces are less often found among them than among the Goldi. However, the women have a gentler expression, although their type is very similar to that of the men. They wear two braids which are often tied together at the bottom.

142 Tattooing is not common among the Gilyak. Their bodies, 304 also, are not exceptionally hairy. Their skin, if it does not happen to be covered with eruptions, is very smooth, but usually dirty. Their hair, which they oil copiously, is usually not free of lice. The odor characteristic of the Gilyak is a mixture of smoke and fish, with the former predominating.

526 As far as muscular strength is concerned, it seems to fall 516 below that of Europeans, but they have more physical endurance; the women, moreover, are relatively strong. One cannot say that the Gilyak excel in speed [107] and agility of bodily movement. Only in rowing and mountain climbing are

/359 cont./

614 599 family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered in the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had bee adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must be fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

614 426 8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

614 428 9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, th clan is the heir).

614 736 768 10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. We have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased man's "ruvn" his widow and children should go. Before the gath [763] ing of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

614 627 In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settle not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals of different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the [685] affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled

743

743 HOSPITALS AND CLINICS--number and availability of special institutions for medical care; organization and operation of clinics and hospitals; personnel (e.g., administrative and medical staffs, nurses, orderlies, technicians); equipment; special services; charges and fees; sources of financial support (e.g., governmental, ecclesiastical, private); ambulatory clinics. See also:

Physicians, nurses, and medical care 75
Hospital buildings 344
Care of war veterans 729
Institutions for the care of defectives 732
Care of alcoholics and drug addicts 733 Sanatoriums, convalescent homes, mental institutions, and leproseries 734

/531 cont./

795 The dead come in a dream. Thus Indyn's mother came to 787 him several times. The last time she said to him, "Your father took me again," and she did not appear any more.

794 The big soul inhabits the entire body, and in the head of this
[231] large soul live small souls -- tarn. After the death of a person, a small soul lives in his pryski (dog), which is tied to his plank bed. Small souls resemble eggs and are white in color. During sleep the small soul goes everywhere, talks, sees, and so forth.
[935] A poor person "still has one tiny little soul." If a person dies away from home or drowns, his soul comes home. The soul of a dog which died accidentally roams all over.

Every body has a soul, and its shape corresponds to the body. Therefore, if the body is given a certain shape, it will acquire a corresponding soul, and therefore if a throat is sore, they make [825] a tongue, and his soul lives in that tongue. A captured bird with which children have been playing must not be let loose, for it will carry away the soul.

795 The fate of the soul depends on the kind of death. 1. A person who has been eaten by a bear lives to a ripe old age with Pal-nigyvyn (the master of the forest), while a person who drowned -- with Tol-nigyvyn, and then they go to Mlyvo.

2. A suicide (who hung himself) goes directly to Mlyvo.

3. Those who died from an epidemic (an epidemic is caused by the bloodshed during the wars of the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Russians) also go straight to Mlyvo.

4. One who died a wound (by a knife, a bow, or a rifle) lives, like a bird, in the air. The souls of such unfortunates shreik at night from the trees.

5. Until a tkhusind (ransom) is received, one who was killed by a person will also fly in the sky. If blood vengeance is taken for the dead person, both souls go to Mlyvo together.

795 The night bird takhch is of the size of a crow and just as 825 black, but its beak is red. If its cry is heard at night, one must not call it by name, but must say atk.

When a person is killed, a great number of these birds fly together into the village.

/666 cont./

556 named for me as mykstschr-kolla. The latter in particular was especially esteemed and popular among his countrymen, aside from other reasons, on account of his lavish and much visited bear festivals, in one of which I, too, took part. They related that he was held in such esteem that even the Chinese in Ssansin and the Japanese on Sakhalin referred to him as Gilyak dshangin and treated him accordingly, which prompted some of them, too, to refer to him occasionally in this way, and yet, they said, he is no dshangin, of whom there are none among them, but only a mykstschr-kolla nibach. Thus do they cling, even with the great differences in means and, accordingly, also in social position, to their complete equality legally.

426 When I previously said that the poor Gilyak, in case of
• 735 necessity, count on the help of their richer countrymen and may expect to receive from them some things on credit, but others for nothing, this needs an explanation. One might accordingly [439] think that the latter treat the former in about the same way as the Chinese traders, who, in an emergency, give the Goldi, Orochi, and other natives of the region among whom they reside the things required, calculated at a very high price, on credit, in order that afterwards, by means of repeated and unchecked promissory notes, they will never be out of debt to them for the rest of their lives; in fact, the debts are even inherited by their children. This never happens among the Gilyak. As much as I was in contact with the rich and the poor among them, I never heard of anything that would permit one to conclude that there is any considerable debt relationship between the one and the other. Both are also probably too cautious and practical, too subtly and cleverly calculating, to enter into such relationships, disadvantageous for both, for the one injurious to his respect and popularity, for the other to his existence. Not that they do not have any debts among one another -- but these always seem to be only small advances within their means to one person or another, the casual repayment of which is taken for granted, but often, and probably usually in cases of unequal means, /667/ is not even claimed, 426 and not much is said about it. Perhaps related to this is the fact

/667 cont./

426 that the Gilyak expression for "to be indebted" or "to have debts" -- a concept which must be very familiar to the Gilyak in view of the conditions prevailing among their neighbors, the Goldi and the Ainu -- escaped both Glehn and me, in spite of our otherwise quite copious word lists.

• 735 Be that as it may, the help given to a poor Gilyak in distress by his richer fellow-villager, business friends, or other acquaintances does not consist of their getting this or that on credit, but of being given free (Gilyak pai) what is needed to maintain life. And, to be sure, this is done as a consequence 181 of the national-communistic spirit, which, more or less peculiar to all primitive peoples, is in no slight degree inherent in the Gilyak. More, however, than among other peoples, the [186] Tungusic tribes, for instance, the communism of the Gilyak is strictly national, that is, active only within the tribal boundaries, which is conditioned and nourished by their sharp linguistic differentiation from all the neighboring tribes and their intense 421 national consciousness. Furthermore, the mind of the Gilyak, so much oriented toward trade, gain, and the increase of property, sets certain limitations on it, for it by no means puts all goods at its service without distinction, but rather only those which Nature herself provides in sufficient quantity and in a condition practically ready for use, and therefore labels, so to speak, as common property. The Gilyak regard as such primarily the products which the sea and the rivers furnish them in quantity, fish, seal, and the like, as well as, next, the dog, fed almost exclusively on these products and indispensable even to the poorest because of its fur, and, finally, what the local forest furnishes them in nourishing or refreshing roots, berries, 735 and other vegetables. It is taken for granted, therefore, that in 421 case of need the rich Gilyak will give to his poor fellow-villagers and other fellow-tribesman who approach him for help as much of his supplies of the products mentioned (fish, seal, etc., and dog furs) as is required to satisfy their most urgent needs in food and clothing. And as long as his supplies of these are not exhausted, no one will perish from hunger or cold. It is quite

/667 cont./

735 different, however, when it is a matter of goods which Nature
421 furnishes mankind only sparingly and which must be wrested from her, so to speak, with toil and effort, as, for example, sable and other precious animal pelts as well as everything which is obtained by trade by means of the latter from the Chinese, Japanese, and Russians. It would never occur to a Gilyak, be he rich or poor, to consider them likewise as common property and, accordingly, to sacrifice them in cases of need to the common good or to demand that this be done. In addition, these goods, in contrast to the first ones, and not exempting the cereals, tobacco, and the simplest Chinese or Russian clothing materials, are merely luxury goods without which he can still [182] very probably maintain life if need be. Thus, the extremely active instinct of the Gilyak for trade and acquisition and their endeavor to preserve /668/ and add to their property form an effective counterweight against the communism and prevent the lazy, and therefore poor, from living at the expense of the industrious and wealthy, even though without denying him, in case of need, what is absolutely required to sustain life.

342 The Gilyak also take account of the communistic principle 421 in the matter of shelter or the dwelling, which, in a region with 423 long and severe winters like their homeland, is of no less importance than food and clothing for the maintenance of life. How and to what extent this is done can be seen from the following. It has already been mentioned above that the Gilyak, in an apparently quite irrational fashion, do not evaluate a structure as large and, in some respects, complicated as their winter-house, built according to the Chinese pattern, half as high as a simple, always much smaller storehouse (1). This can be explained by the fact that the former, in spite of its size, yields a considerably smaller direct income than the latter, and this, in turn, rests on the fact that the dwelling is in part of communistic origin and

1. See pp. 937-943 above.

57 /672 cont./ with regard to me, 123 however, neither the one nor the other would apply, and yet I, too, never received any thanks from the Gilyak. I am not think-[735] ing now of the gifts given in response to begging, which in Gilyak houses can become very annoying to the traveler and for which mainly children are urged forward. They may never have learned to say thanks or may have forgotten it in their inquisitive amazement at the traveler. But I have often enough shown the Gilyak greater services. For instance, they always found a hospitable reception at my house, where the safety of their possessions, their dogs, and all the rest of their outfit were attended to so that they could calmly go about their business in the village. Among other things, I once saw to it, thanks to the strict sense of justice of the then governor, Rear Admiral Sawoiko, that an investigation was made about the theft of a whole vehicle laden with all kinds of wares, which had happened to the Gilyak Judin; the culprit was convicted, and Judin was paid a sizable sum in compensation. Even in this case I was not thanked, though I was dealing with the best and most respected Gilyak.

On the other hand, it is customary for the Gilyak to 431 exchange small gifts as a sign that they wish to enter into closer,
123 perhaps even business relations with each other. When I received such a gift for the first time, I asked the price of it, but was told that the word pai, that is, gratis or free, went with it and that I was informed by the Gilyak Jutschin, whom I already knew, that, in accordance with their custom, I would now have to give a gift in return, while repeating the same word /673/ pai. If the latter were not done, the objects offered in return would be rejected, and the word pai would be stressed once more. Sometimes I was even told in what form the return gift should be, for example, that it might consist of several tobacco leaves, some bread, sev-
431 eral buttons, or the like. Custom requires, however, that, upon acceptance of the return gift, the number of items is not to be closely examined, and in praise of the Gilyak I must admit they never deviated from this custom and that they were always satisfied with the return present, whatever it turned out to be. But this did not [439] by any means prevent them in accordance with their greedy natures, from demanding very high prices in trading later. This

758 Help in need is decidedly more the order of the day than 763 it is with us civilized people. If someone has undeservedly
735 become poor, he is immediately assisted, and debts are paid for relatives. Likewise people who have become incapable of work because of illness are assured support by relatives and neighbors. The sick, in general, are eagerly nursed; only when the death agony begins, the dying person is subjected to a harsh ordeal. He is carried out of the house into the open and is left there at any time of the year, until he is dead. This custom is based on the belief that a dead person brings ill-luck to the house, and in case a person dies indoors, the house must be taken down. However, the sick person who is subjected to these measures is usually already in a comatose state. It appears, that child-bearing women are removed from the house for similar reasons.

752 In danger and suffering the Gilyak also help the non-Gilyak
766 to say nothing of their fellow-tribesmen. I must mention two 609 exceptions. I heard repeatedly from Russians that a Gilyak on the point of drowning could not count on help from his people, in fact, the Gilyak watch him going under, with fatalistic calm, and comfort themselves by saying that "he is needed above." Besides, it is said that the Sakhalin-Gilyaks take care not to help a man who has fallen into the clutches of a bear, because they see in it a divine punishment. One who is killed in this way is not cremated but must be buried together with the body of the bear, should he also be killed; at the same time they scatter about pieces of bear flesh and scraps of the dead man's clothing. The Gilyak whom I questioned about drowning persons, unanimously testified [224] that they always helped them as much as they could and they showed me several people who had been rescued because help had been sent them from the shore. Furthermore, in the case of a man who has been attacked by a bear being left to his fate, we must take into consideration the fact that the custom of two or three people going out to hunt a bear presupposes mutual aid. The question deserves to be further investigated, but nevertheless I believe that the afore-mentioned fatalism does not appear in all cases, only in certain instances where superstition was awakened for some specific reason.

The Gilyak help not only their fellow-tribesmen but also strangers in time of distress as much as they can. They repeatedly saved the lives of run-away convicts, for which they were often wretchedly rewarded besides. More of this later.

Hospitality is decidedly practised.

[241] In 1951, the Nivkhi collective "Chir-Unvd" collected 200 tsentners of potatoes and cabbage per hectare. In the course of only 3 years, from 1949 [433] to 1951, the cultivated area increased by 30%.

Along with agriculture, the "Chir-Unvd" collective engages in animal [231] husbandry. Since the war, it has substantially increased its herd of cattle and established a sheep-breeding farm. Other Nivkhi collectives have also progressed.

177 An essential prerequisite for the successful organization and develop-648 ment of collective farms was the unification of small villages, formerly 474 scattered over large distances. Before the Revolution, Nivkhi villages often 361 consisted of no more than 3-5 households. But even in the larger villages, the houses were scattered without plan. The enlargement of old villages and the construction of new populated centers made rapid strides after the collectivization of the Nivkhi economy. The modern Nivkhi villages are comfortable, well planned, and laid out in streets. In the building of new villages, particular attention is given to selecting convenient and wholesome sites. Before the Revolution, most of the Sakhalin Nivkhi lived in dugouts, and most of the continental Nivkhi lived in frame huts resembling the Manchu-Chinese fanza.

177 The most widespread of the new dwellings is the warm Russian log 648 house. Near the houses of the collective members are various barns, sheds, 474 etc. Every collective-farm village has a number of public buildings; a 36 school, a reading room, a club, an administrative building, and buildings devoted to economic uses (a collective-farm garage, a smithy, a vegetable [342] storehouse, cattle-yards, etc.). Almost every collective-farm village has a bathhouse—something the Nivkhi never used in the past. Today, many individual collective-farm families build their own private bathhouses.

177 The internal furnishings of the Nivkhi home have also changed, and are 648 today similar to those of Russian homes. Some collective-farm villages 474 have electricity and radio. In the Nivkhi homes, especially on the conti-
342 nent, one often sees plastered and whitewashed walls, or walls covered 353 with wallpaper, and a variety of bought furniture, as well as curtains and flowers in the windows. The Nivkhi are very fond of pictures, and adorn the walls of their homes with illustrations, placards and photographs.

Today, the Nivkhi widely wear bought clothing of the Russian type. They 177 also use underwear, which was entirely unknown in the past. In winter, the 29 continental Nivkhi wear city-type coats, felt boots, high overshoes, and also footwear of elk or seal skins. The Sakhalin Nivkhi prefer clothing made of reindeer or seal skins. They obtain the reindeer skins from Orok collective-farm members. The fur clothing and headdress remain of the [294] traditional cut and materials. Many Nivkhi women make their own clothing of factory-made fabrics, bought in stores opened in collective-farm villages. Here and there, one encounters the ancient national costume. On holidays, [292] the young people love to wear robes made of fabric and richly ornamented. Such robes are made even today. Clothing of fishskin is almost discontinued, as are the old conical birchbark hats.

177 Substantial changes have taken place in the Nivkhi diet. There is greater 262 use of vegetables, bread, butter, tea, sugar and other purchased products.
758 The incidence of illness, and particularly of tuberculosis, which had been widespread in the past, has dropped sharply as a result of radically im-

751

751 PREVENTIVE MEDICINE--conception of health and hygiene; health regime protective measures (e.g., sun tan lotion, amulets, charms, spells, proph laxis, immunization);etc. See also:

Incidence of disease 164
Diet 262
Exercise 526
Public health and sanitation 744
Fetishes 778
Taboos 784
Health insurance 456
Personal hygiene 515
Magic 789
Infant care 854
Child care 855
Prescriptions for longevity 886

3 general precautions. Nevertheless, it happens that now
9 and then one of these unfortunates is shot down in the woods
7 by Gilyaks, even though the majority of them would not think of concerning themselves with such a disgraceful hunt.

1 XIII Economic and Social Conditions.

1 Among Gilyak there is no question of a body of laws, to say nothing of written statutes. Nevertheless, common law which functions in place of fixed statutes is equitable and just. The shadow of a prerogative may be felt only where it is accompanied by real qualities. But even the preponderance of natural talents is very modest; the race consists of individuals among whom the capabilities as well as the assets which are given them by nature are pretty evenly distributed.

6 There are "rich" and "poor" Gilyak, but these terms must
5 be interpreted in a very limited sense. A wealthy man who is in a position to support three to four wives is a rare exception. The "rich" man, besides having a greater number of wives, possesses objects which have a certain value, such as "beautiful" clothes [230], many and good dogs, etc. and sometimes quite useless objects which are kept merely for effect, as, for instance, lengths of cloth of gold (which in Greek churches are used for various decorations). The above-mentioned clumsy lances belong to such luxury articles. There are many rich men who keep on hand a couple hundred silver rubles in a box.

5 Contrariwise, there are very few Gilyak who are not
8 capable of supporting a single wife or even themselves.
6 Such individuals are either sick or alcoholics, for there are
1 no actual reasons for external poverty: fish, game, wood, berries etc., are everywhere to be found, but of course one must obtain them with one's own efforts. A scarcity of fish is a rare exception among the Amur-Gilyak. It happens in those years in which the kita is scarce (this usually coincides with very high water). The Sakhalin-Gilyak often have reason to complain of a scarcity, for there the various species of salmon, even in ordinary years, do not come up the rivers in such numbers. On the other hand, they have more bears, and thus the island Gilyak are in a position to trade young bears for dried fish with their mainland kinsmen.

If there are not enough fish, the Gilyak eats cedar nuts, berries, game, etc. All these are of course only a poor substitute, but in any case we cannot speak of actual "famines" here.

736

736 DEPENDENCY--incidence of dependency (e.g., orphans, widows, deserted and divorced wives, families of defectives and alcoholics, families of invalids and criminals); attitudes toward dependency; care and support of dependents (e.g., adoption, support by relatives, private charity, public relief); special institutions for dependents (e.g., orphanages); etc. See also:

Social insurance, public assistance, and private welfare agencies 74
Insurance 456
Levirate 587
Status of widows 589
Adoption 597
Treatment of motherless infants 846

/410 cont./

302 [171] 1. I later saw something similar among the Daur in the village of Chormoldin: the hair was shaved off the boys and a tuft of hair was left standing only here and there, quite unsymmetrically, either on the crown or on one side, which gave them a very comical appearance. The Chinese presumably also do this.

Adults, however, [753] [761] never have their head or beard hair cut; indeed, among the Gilyak there prevails the belief that if an adult among them had his braid cut and his hair shorn, it would bring him sickness and 302 765 death. After death, however, the braid may be cut off and preserved by the relatives of the deceased. For instance, the Gilyak Kimrkan in Kalm showed me the braids that he had removed from his first wife and his daughter after their deaths, and which he carefully stored, wrapped in birch bark, in the small hut erected for the manes of the deceased, the so-called rakk,* which

*/HRAF note: According to the list of errata on p. 777 of the foreign text, rakk should be raff. An asterisk on the latter word refers to a footnote which reads "Noted later"; see note * on p.1236./

302 515 136 will be discussed later. In caring for their hair, the Gilyak are just as untidy as in their clothing. Hence one often sees them hit their heads with the palms of their hands in order to check the annoying vermin, or scratch their heads, which characteristically is always done with the thumb while the other /411/ fingers rest on the head. Indeed, the Gilyak even regard the ● [751] presence of vermin in the head hair as a sign of good health. Thus, during my stay at the Nikolayev post, it happened that a Gilyak boy was taken by a Russian for rearing in his house, but when the father visited the boy after a time and missed the vermin in his hair, he explained that he was worried about 515 825 his health and took him back again. In connection with this, the bad habit of cracking vermin from the head or clothing in the mouth prevails among the Gilyak, as among so many primi- [123] tive peoples. My disgust at this, occasionally expressed to them, seemed ridiculous to them, and to my question as to why they did it, since it could be neither for food nor for a delicacy,

/744 cont./

778 755 532 [126] 6. Gilyak. Through C. v. Dittmar, following his visit in Tebach for the bear festival, I obtained a series of Gilyak idols which in part refer to the festival itself, such as Fig. 3, Plate LVII /p. 1258/, in part to other things. Subsequent inquiries about their significance enabled me to obtain new insight into the religious views of the Gilyak. These idols and representations of various kinds are amulets intended to keep the various sicknesses away from man or, if they have attacked him, to remove them. Most of them are made with flexible joints and for that very reason are supposed to remove the stiffness or sickness of certain limbs (*).

* See Plates LIV /p. 1254/ and LV /p.1255/.

For example, Figure 2, Plate LV /p. 1255/, with a jointed body, is intended for removing sicknesses of the back and body; the one with jointed legs (knees), ibid., Fig. 4, for healing sicknesses of these extremities. The large figure with jointed head, back, and legs, Fig. 1 on the same plate, the tschaltscha-tschngai, is made, as was mentioned above (), in connection with the birth of childr

 See p. 1046.

and held in front of them so that, by looking at it, they may be spared ailments of the neck, body, or extremities. The small idol with a cut-out in the chest and jointed arms and back, Plate LV /p. 1255/, Fig. 3, is intended for curing ailments of the chest, coughing, etc., as well as ailments of the joints concerned.

All these idols or amulets, the tschaltscha-tschngai not ex- [782] cepted, are fed with berries and other things in order to pacify their power or to win their favor, the wooden pieces bearing traces of this. These representations, however, are not worn around the neck, but are hung on the wall in the yurt.

778 532 ● 751 Related to these idols are two amulets that have a similar purpose: they are the lalż and kissj (Plate LX /p. 1260/, Figs. 1 and 2). -- The former is an iron ring, open at one place, which is worn around the head to prevent headaches. The two opposing end

/744 cont./

778 run out on either side into two points, one of which represents a ●751 lizard, the other a snake, the similar shapes of both ends facing one 532 another alternately. Unfortunately the specimen under discussion is somewhat worn by frequent use and is lacking the lizard at the one end.

778 The other amulet is an iron semicircle, from which hang 776 figures of different significance made of the same metal, specifi-
532 cally: at the one end, a crude human shape and a roughly triangular piece that, according to some of the Gilyak, is supposed to represent a ptarmigan, and at the other end an identical alleged ptarmigan and a heart; in the middle, finally, a roughly human shape with two heads, which is supposed to represent the kins, the evil, destructive power, that is, the devil. According to the re-
[753] ports of the Gilyak themselves, they believe that sickness is nothing but the kins gnawing at a human being and finally fatally devouring [761] him. That is the end of all who /745/ die of sickness. It is no 775 wonder that with such a belief the Gilyak do not claim heaven for 766 the souls of those who die of sickness, but have them wandering on earth, while the souls of all the murdered and even of suicides fly 776 to heaven. According to Gilyak belief, the earth is the abode of countless kins or devils who hide in the forests and mountains, as well as in the water and everywhere. The kins are represented with [532] two and three heads by the Gilyak, perhaps in order to indicate [778] with the extra ones, in contrast to man, their power over the latter (1).

1. According to the Gilyak, one of the heads on these two or three-headed forms is a human head. This therefore indicates that the kins has seized the human being.

778 I do not know the significance of the alleged ptarmigans, 532 if that is what they are. The heart, however, has reference to the [751] purpose of the whole semicircle Namely, it is to be worn around the neck against chest ailments, coughing, and the like. The name kissj, however, which was given to me for it, seems to have a

/768 cont./

764 A rough little rod or a similar stick (wadžach) stuck in the ground is likewise said to mark a place where a corpse is buried (Bm. I, p. 18.)

764 51. Gilyak. In September, 1854, the Gilyak of Kuĭk dis-648 covered that one of their burial houses, raff, had been destroyed by Russian soldiers and the ground on which it had stood was dug up, and they came to complain about it. I then learned that the ashes of cremated corpses are under the little houses and variously colored rags, peculiar implements, and the like are deposited there. Near Kuĭk, in the birch forest along the Amur, four or five such small houses stood together and formed a burial place, while such structures are otherwise often found individually in 764 the midst of the forest. The Gilyak said that in the destroyed 648 little house the ashes of six children's corpses were in one ●751 vessel, over which the same number of sable furs had been placed. The latter was done in order to prevent a sudden dying of their children such as had taken place during the year. Now, since the house had been destroyed, they feared the return of the epidemic. (Bm. I, pp. 15, 16.)

764 52. Gilyak. Every spot where a corpse is deposited or [778] a dead person's ashes are to be found is regarded by the Gilyak as sacred and inviolable to some extent. No Gilyak therefore would wantonly touch a raff. Moreover, the latter may never [784] be transferred to another place. This would be uĭtsch. Therefore, though the Gilyak from Kuĭk bewailed and complained about the plundering and destruction of their raff, they nevertheless decided not to transport the remains to the villages to which they themselves had moved from Kuĭk. (Bm. 1, p. 56.)

53. Gilyak. If one investigates the interior of a little burial-house he always finds in it a longish little board in an upright position: kakk, also tars. The middle of it is pierced, and the hole has a peg, kylms, stuck in it; a strip of linen is wound around the board, and sometimes the lower end, too, is wrapped in linen and decorated with various rags, kakk- or tars-rawż (Plate LXVIII /p.1268 /, Fig. 2). Close to the board and likewise in an upright position there is a little stick, pyk-ngir,

2:Schrenck--1260 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

1. Iron circlet with animal figures, worn to prevent headaches (Gilyak). 2. Iron semicircle with symbolic figures, worn around the neck to prevent sickness (Gilyak). 3. Amulet-belt with human and animal figures (Olcha). 4, 5. Fish carved out of wood (Gilyak). 6. Gilyak child's toy representing a dog.

25 but the better one among them sits at the bow. The hunters
76 must often get out on the floes for it is not always conven-
54 ient to get within shooting distance of the seals in a boat.
61 If there is an extra man in the boat, if, for instance, there
25 are five oarsmen, one pilar and one other man, then the pilar 76 -if he is the oldest man in the boat - sits at the stern without 61 doing anything, and his junior takes over the rudder. The 85 Gilyaks illustrated this point to me by the following example: if Xitkun and Kaun are among the hunters in the boat and if both are older than the rest of the hunters, than Xitkun, as the oldest, would sit at the stern and do nothing except for giving orders and Kaun, who is Xitkun's junior, would take over the rudder. If, on the other hand, Tujun, Xitkun, Pl skuk and Kaun and younger hunters set out in a boat then Pl skuk and Kaun, who are younger than Tujun and Xitkun, are at the oars, Xitkun takes over the rudder and Tujun, as the oldest of them all sits at the stern. It happens that the pilar is younger than the extra man in the boat. In that case the pilar tends the rudder and the extra man sits at the stern. I personally know of such a case. Pilar Norp took along with him in the boat old man Onkan who sat at the stern and did nothing while Norp tended the rudder. When Norp was at the bow shooting at the seals and t, to whom Norp had turned over the steering oar, tended the rudder, Onkan again sat at the stern. Jesting about his work Onkan said to me: "I was simply sitting without doing a thing, but I got my share." I found out from others that during the hunt he helped build the campfire and prepare food. He also seems to have helped with some other things; which is why he was taken along. Unfortunately, I was unable to clarify this point to any great extent. I simply had no time in which to do that. It seems that Onkan performed a number of functions which did not tax his strength and, in this manner, he made the rather heavy work of the hunters easier.

Incidentally, the facts given above illustrate with a sufficient degree of clarity the role of older people among the Gilyaks.

25 [82] As mentioned above the pilar performs mu-ziyd
89 and t aj.
74 Mu-ziyd is performed at the stern of the boat. Two short 51 sticks, the thickness of a match are driven into the stern board. The distance between them is approximately two fingers. Then they tie a thin thread made of nettle fibres around the sticks. The Gilyaks usually perform ziyd on hands of children. They believe that a thread made of hair of a dog and nettle fibre and tied around a child's hand protects the child from illness. The fact that the Gilyaks perform

25 mu-ziyəd on the boat supports the assumption that at one 89 time or another the Gilyaks, it seems, regarded a boat as 74 a living thing. Mu-ziyəd on the boat serves, it seems, as a 51 means of guarding the boat against and protecting it from misfortunes.

82 Aside from mu-ziyəd, tŋaj is performed on the boat. Tŋaj 78 means 'image', 'figure,' 'picture.' With shavings (inau) of 32 a branch of rowan (qosk-yəks) the pilaŋ makes two figurines.
25 One of the figurines is placed at the prow of the boat and the 89 other - at the stern. I once saw such a figurine on the neck of a representation of the bird ugŋ, placed by the Gilyaks at th bow of the boat. The figurine placed at the bow has its face turned to the sea. We shall come back to these tŋaj elsewhere

82 There is one other ceremony performed on the boat. Before 89 setting out on a hunt the Gilyaks expose the boat to smoke.
25 They light fires of spruce and bogulnik on both sides of the 72 boat and they try to build the fires so that the smoke hit the boat. The pilaŋ takes a branch of spruce or of bogulnik and, starting from the bow and going towards the stern, hits the outside and the inside of the boat as well as the rowlocks with the branches so as to elvlaf-pək-əzd --"lose bad places (evil)". Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the sea and are off.

35 I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from 02 a hunt, put out to sea with the hunters a second time. Five 54 hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an exper-7 ienced pilaŋ, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the sea bird ugŋ and the figunines tŋaj. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

5 After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They 3 first go to Uiy-krə "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull 6
2

1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

the boat out of the water. The pilaŋ picks up a scoop con-

On Sakhalin it happened that the Gilyak meant to kill such a Helen who lived with a Russian soldier and bore him a child.

Sodomy, onanism and similar perversions seem to be unknown among the Gilyak. Those whom I questioned about them regarded me with astonishment and did not know what I was talking about.

As for modesty, it varies according to the type referred to. In sexual matters it is not very pronounced, as we have already pointed out. First of all, the crowded way in which people live together does not permit such delicacy; however the Gilyaks try to hide their love-making from strangers. Their natural functions they do not exactly perform in the open, but they are not particularly ashamed in front of members of the opposite sex. Men as well as women squat in urinating. Women, at any rate younger women, guard against exposing their bodies before strange men. I had some difficulty in persuading them to do this when I was taking body measurements.

It is impossible to study the more subtle expressions of modesty in all their forms, but it seems that the Gilyak are most of all ashamed of being taken for thieves and cowards. Their entire character and cycle of habits is such that fawning and self-degradation are foreign to them. They do not make much of genuflection, but do it largely when they are forced to. Thus those Gilyak who decide to travel up the Sungari to the Chinese with their fur must, as a matter of course, bow before the Chinese officials. And probably the Chinese are responsible for teaching them such humiliating expressions of veneration. [227]

Begging is practically non-existent among the Gilyak. The only specimen one can see begging is the so-called Vanika-Gilyak, a degenerated half-idiot who goes begging along the streets of Nikolayevsk-na-Amure and who long since has deserted his countrymen. He is also the only one who can be seen in a drunken state, swaying and noisily roaming about. In general drunkenness has not taken root to such an extent that there are professional alcoholics, and this is probably partly because Gilyak cannot have spirits whenever they want, for it necessitates a trip to the Russians. But they love liquor very much, and unfortunately it is to be foreseen that this habit will become wide-spread.

XII. Councils, Jurisdiction, Duels, Prosecution of Criminals

Meetings and councils are seldom held. If they are, they

/72 cont./

G 796 171 262 Gi 796 171 262 773 An indirect confirmation of our hypothesis as to the origin of the above-mentioned prohibition among the Gilyak is to be found in an interesting legend of the Orochi and the Orok, whose religious views are very similar to those of their Gilyak neighbors. According to this legend, a certain Orochi woman was once abducted (in other words, eaten) by a bear and bore two children by him. The woman was subsequently often encountered by the Orochi in the forest in the form of a she-bear who warned them not to shoot her. It happened, however, that she was shot by accident. That it was actually she was clear from the fact that women's ornaments were found in her viscera, a bracelet and so forth. Dying, she requested in her testament to the Orochi who killed her that in the future, upon killing a bear, the ritual that is usually observed now during the festival be observed, for any bear that is killed may turn out to be her descendant and, consequently, a clansman of the Orochi.

G 776 Let us return to the gods. Up until now I have mentioned the gods that are beneficial to the Gilyak. Besides these, however, there are other supernatural beings who are evil and harmful to him. These devils are "mil'k'i" and "kinr'y." These beings appear in all kinds of forms and are classified according to their degree of harmfulness. They appear sometimes in the shape of a Gilyak, sometimes in the shape of animals, from the bear to the toad and lizard. They are encountered on dry land and in the sea, under the ground and in the sky.

/73/ Some of them constitute special clans of insidious creatures, destroyers by their very nature. Others are individual degenerates, "the prodigal sons" of the clans of beneficient beings, who only in exceptional cases become enemies of man. The first, of course, offer the most danger.

G 776 761 753 Some devote themselves exclusively to robbing the Gilyak on the road (the spirits of loss -- ger-nivukh'i); others ravage storehouses, snares, and traps and harm him in all sorts of ways, while still others make attempts on his very

/73 cont./

776 761 753 life, causing sickness and death. But for them, people would not die. Natural death is impossible. Death is the result of the scheming of these insidious creatures. Therefore the Gilyak will never touch a sable that died in the taiga, even though his skin is very valuable and very well preserved, for a devil assuredly rests in a sable that has died. Just as he, the Gilyak, lies in wait for a beast and tries in every way to kill him, so an evil spirit lies in wait for the Gilyak himself at every step, 753 in order to devour him. Sickness is no more than an evil being 776 who made his way into the body of a Gilyak and is slowly eating him. Nightmares and dreams in which the sick man dreams that somebody is strangling him, pressing from within, easily provide grounds for such a notion. If some organ is not functioning in the proper way, as, for example, in shortness of breath, it is easy to imagine that some kind of being has got inside and is interfering with breathing, and so forth. It is imperative to expel such a creature. This expulsion is effected in various ways, beginning with the simplest and ending with the most complex.

755 Here is an example which quite graphically illustrates the "psychology" of the expulsion of devils. One woman, who was subject to attacks of sudden hysterical psychosis, was placed in my presence on a high platform, generally used to clean fish, and a fire was ignited under it with all kinds of rags, canine feces, and stinking garbage. The devil inside the woman could not, of course, bear the horrible smell and prudently left the heart of the woman, who was thus saved. But not all devils are so sensitive to a bad smell; others require stronger methods. Such devils must be frightened by extraordinary noise, by frenzied shrieks, by the frightening appearance of the expeller, and by other such terrorizing methods, hence the necessity for the devil-expeller to beat his tambourine, make noise with rattles, shriek in an unnatural voice, and put himself in a state of frenzy, to which end /74/ he swallows smoke, drinks sea water, puts himself in a state of stupor with the smoke of bagul'nik (Ledum palustre), chews

/ 319/

XI.

Miscellanea

823 The cliff Uj-parne, in the form of an isolated stone pillar is between Khez' and Chil'mi. Formerly one could hear how th master of the cliff beat on a tambourine. Three times (a year) [782] [776] they made sacrifices to him and addressed to him the request: "Pkhys'kyr ururungja! -- do good for us with your risk!"

731 758 During a pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) they bring firewood and water to the sick, but do not themselves enter the house.

731 753 766 When they learn that it is all over in all the settlements (i.e., the epidemic is over), then the dead are taken out of the graves and burned; they are afraid of burning them earlier for they believe that smoke spreads infection. The only thing that is allowed is the smoking with marsh tea in the yurt.

538 562 The Female Character. Proverbs. 1) The female character is like a whirlwind, similar to the wind. 2) With just a tug you will change the female character. 3) A woman is like a fire started in a clear field; the wind blows and it is out.

158 [143] Meryachen'e. In Charbakh two people suffer from the disease meryachen'e -- two women; this sickness is inherited in the female line. Those who suffer from meryachen'e repeat literall everything, even in a foreign language; they repeat even actions. The attacks come during a fright. The sick woman is then unconscious, but later she comes to. If attempts are made to compel her to repeat something many times, she is ready to attack with a knife. In their youth they did not suffer from meryachen'e.

There are other such sick people in Tymvo and Pronga.

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'ka's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

[532] A representation of twins -- tongch: -- is placed in a little [778] storehouse. If one of the twins dies, they place one tongch:, while [782] if both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chukh-chugynd is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon. Kinsmen and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

[795] When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-n'gyvyn, who [787] gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.

766 A dead twin is not cremated, but is seated in Turkish fashion in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounded with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cremated after death, but is dressed in white and buried, also with inau placed around. According to B. Pilsudski, the same is done with the father of twins.

778 The tongch: helps catch bears and in hunting in general.
224 The tongch; is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis
164 (Slyavo).
782 Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or 847 even upon the order of the father of the underage husband of a woman.

682 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a boy, the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

• 753 Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-n'igyvyn or by Tol-n'igyvyn,
776 but each of them takes a milk not from his kingdom.

/338/ A milk can be of different shapes and often is red as blood and hard as stone, but when he enters a person, he becomes lively, "as if he were walking."

732 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in 758 summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

753 Kkhmàs'ind -- to be sick from not getting what one saw and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets well.

/338 cont./

• 753 The Gilyak Churka (1) recounted: "When I was little I saw 159
[122] 1. L. Ia. Shternberg's guide around Sakhalin.

a dog and wanted very much to have it, but did not dare. I felt ill under my armpits. I dreamed that the dog bit me in the very place that was sore. I lay just as if dead. Then my father bought the dog immediately -- he had to hurry -- and immediately fried a piece and I began to recover."

Everyone confirmed this fact. The husband of his present wife died from kkhmàs'ind.

V.

The Rescue of a Drowning Man

752 Having heard the cry of a drowning man, they come to his aid, press down on his stomach so that the water will come out, clean his mouth with shavings, and place a stick in his mouth. Then they wrap him in fur coats and tightly bandage his face (if he looks at fire, he will die). When he becomes warm, his face [782] is uncovered. He gives chukh-chugynd to Tol and then carries out a procedure called shavynd.

752 A Gilyak was drowning under the broken ice. He was 789 rescued and brought to a yurt where the rescuer-host and the one rescued sat down opposite each other; a bowl with sarana and puchka was placed before each of them on both sides, and a white dog near each of them. They hooked together with hooks which they held in their hands (an imitation of the rescue) and pulled against each other, saying: "You will live to an old age, and so will I." Then, at the departure, the rescued man stepped in the bowl of his host and in his own, and they exchanged bowls. After the exchange, the rescued man said: "Nikhkhakhrá --

/410 cont./

302 1. I later saw something similar among the Daur
[171] in the village of Chormoldin: the hair was shaved off the boys and a tuft of hair was left standing only here and there, quite unsymmetrically, either on the crown or on one side, which gave them a very comical appearance. The Chinese presumably also do this.

Adults, however
• [753] never have their head or beard hair cut; indeed, among the [761] Gilyak there prevails the belief that if an adult among them ha his braid cut and his hair shorn, it would bring him sickness and 302 death. After death, however, the braid may be cut off and pre 765 served by the relatives of the deceased. For instance, the Gily Kimrkan in Kalm showed me the braids that he had removed from his first wife and his daughter after their deaths, and whic he carefully stored, wrapped in birch bark, in the small hut erected for the manes of the deceased, the so-called rakk,* wh

*/HRAF note: According to the list of errata on p. 777 of the foreign text, rakk should be raff. An asterisk on the latter word refers to a footnote which reads "Noted later"; see note * on p.1236./

302 will be discussed later. In caring for their hair, the Gilyak are 515 just as untidy as in their clothing. Hence one often sees them hit their heads with the palms of their hands in order to check 136 the annoying vermin, or scratch their heads, which characteristically is always done with the thumb while the other /411/ fingers rest on the head. Indeed, the Gilyak even regard the [751] presence of vermin in the head hair as a sign of good health. Thus, during my stay at the Nikolayev post, it happened that a Gilyak boy was taken by a Russian for rearing in his house, but when the father visited the boy after a time and missed the vermin in his hair, he explained that he was worried about 515 his health and took him back again. In connection with this,
825 the bad habit of cracking vermin from the head or clothing in the mouth prevails among the Gilyak, as among so many primi [123] tive peoples. My disgust at this, occasionally expressed to them, seemed ridiculous to them, and to my question as to wh they did it, since it could be neither for food nor for a delicacy I was given the answer that they were paying back the little animals for what the latter were doing to them.

: Hawes--193 T-3 (1901) 1903
6, 177, 531, 751, 778

I turned my attention to two or three 'works of art nto the forms of a disc and a crescent hung from a nd the moon, and were used as charms. There we imilar to the one I have described as protecting th vil spirits; but these particular ones, I learnt, we ould ensure its recovery.

But no signs of worship were there, no graven im isible to mortal eyes. Charms there are, though v uence and the contact with Russians these are losi ilyaks, and they laugh when questioned about them rking sense of fear at the bottom of their hearts.'

.' Two small flat pieces of wood cut beam. These represented the sun re also two sticks, with shavings on, e canoe during its construction from ere for placing over a sick child, and nages, for the great 'Kiskh' is in-vith the decline of the cham's ining their value in the eyes of the by the foreigner, yet not without a

"

751, 756, 778

he cham, or medicine-man, exorcises spirits which take up a temporary abode in arms made in the shape of a human being. Otherwise even this anthropoid kind was used an amulet. A pair of these, carved from wood, which I have (p.194), are intended to worn on the limb or part of the body affected; for a sore throat, for instance, the le figures would be tied round the neck."

511 grave drawbacks. For one thing they have an astounding number 136 of mice which attain the size of rats, almost, and which are so bold that they nibble at the clothes that the inhabitants are wearing on their body. Jakobsen was told that they even gnaw at the fingers of the little children.

171 The clothing of the Gilyak of the male and female sex is gen-
291 erally like that of the Goldi; they also use the same materials:
177 fish skin, hides and Chinese or Russian cloths. The festoons customary among the Goldi women (see above, number XI, p. 173) [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] do not exist among Gilyak women; the latter generally seem to be interested less in gracefulness than durability in their clothing. The curious belt worn not only by the Goldi but also by the transitional people mentioned repeatedly earlier, is also in use among the Gilyak and with the 177 same appendages as there. It might be mentioned right here, also,
372 that, aside from stone and steel for lighting a fire, matches are already in use with them in boxes which are either made by the 171 Gilyak or imported from the Russians. The arms of the Gilyak 411 are the same as those of the Goldi. Everywhere they still use 531 bow and arrows, knives and lances, and the last-named weapon often appears in beautifully worked models with inlaid figures of 227 silver or copper. For fishing they use nets which they make them-411 selves, angling hooks and harpoon-like instruments which at 501 times have three to four spikes. To move on the water they use larger boats and skiffs made of birch bark which go by the name 492 of amerotscha; on land they travel in winter by narrow sleds to 231 which are harnessed eight to ten dogs. For that reason one will find a large number of dogs in the Gilyak settlements just as in the Goldi villages. These dogs are highly vicious and on occasion even dangerous for the stranger.

171 During his brief stay among the Gilyak, Jakobsen was of course 751 unable to form a judgment of their character; nevertheless his 301 experiences are sufficient to make the following assertion: The Gilyak are no less superstitious than their neighbors. The amulets (1) against diseases which one so often encounters

1. Be it noted on this occasion that Gilyak virgins wear rings on their chests as amulets and no offer however high can induce them to sell them. All the same, our traveller was able to acquire such a ring from an old Gilyak who had stolen it. The latter did not dare to offer it for sale to Jakobsen in the village itself, but met him on the river to conclude the bargain there. The traveller believed in this case that it would be permissible to silence his conscience and to enter upon the bargain.

171 among the Goldi, are in use throughout the Gilyak people
751 and are essentially the same as those discussed earlier
301 (Number XIII, p. 207) [see Goldi source 18: Genest-- Analyst]. The Gilyak on Sakhalin Island whose houses 372 Jakobsen entered were likewise highly indignant whenever 462 he left the house with a lighted pipe or when his companions
776 extinguished the fire burning in a hut by pouring water on it.
For in their opinion such things tended to conjure up destruction not only over the inhabitants of the one hut but over the whole tribe. The inhabitants of one house in the village of Varki below Nikolayevsk predicted the same result when Jakobsen was about to light a fire for making the tea, and they forced him to wait till the house-wife saw to this task, since, in their opinion, this was a job only to be performed by her. Plainly this conduct has its basis in the sacred position of fire. [380] Though this no longer leads to a personification of a fire god among the Goldi and the Gilyak, it no doubt existed among them at one time as it still does today among the Buryat.

776 The system of gods of the Gilyak is in no way behind that 171 of the Goldi in variety. Human and animal figures in color-
825 ful diversity serve as representations of celestial beings.
796 Here, too, there is a great similarity to the religious conceptions of the Goldi; the most important difference seems to me the one that was touched upon earlier (XIV, p. 223), [see Goldi source 18: Genest--Analyst] the fact that the Goldi pay zealous homage to the tiger while the Gilyak do honor to 796 the bear. It is true, though, that this homage is disastrous 415 to the bears since it means keeping a number of these
531 animals imprisoned in the cages in every village and killing
231 them at a bear festival. Before the festival the bears are fed plentifully for an extended time by means of large wooden spoons prepared especially for the purpose and decorated 796 with ingenious carvings. These bear festivals are usually held late in autumn and in winter and they are affairs of the greatest importance to their celebrators. I will now give the description of the festival that Jakobsen had the opportunity of observing in person.

796 On the 7th of February, 1885, the traveller arrived in
622 the early morning at the Gilyak village Vaida about 30 versts
574 above Nikolayevsk, where, as he had been informed, a festival was to take place on that day. From several other villages, some of which were considerable distances away large numbers of guests had come in already, and the whole place was astir in anticipation of the festival at hand. The opening of the bear festival is in the hands of the village

752

752 BODILY INJURIES--theory of the causation of mishaps and accidental injuries; first aid; treatment of wounds, cuts, burns, frostbite, bruises, and sprains (e.g., ligatures, bandages, poultices, massage, cauterization); treatment of snake and insect bites; antidotes for poisoning; treatment of fractures (e.g., bonesetting, trepanation); surgical operations; use of sterile techniques; adjustments to pain (e.g., anesthetics); dental surgery; etc. See also:

Obstetrics	84	Accident insurance	456
Incidence of accidents	164	Bloodletting	757
Mutilation	304	Wound doctors, surgeons, and dentists	759
Surgical instruments	413	Ideas about human anatomy	876

/338 cont./

752 789 [572] [614] [628] [766] thank you!" If they do not exchange them, then one of them will drown. After this they become friends. One must rescue an alien khal, and even good Russians (not the tramps), but a drowned person from another clan is not cremated, but is surrounded with sticks.

After the rescue and the shavynd procedure, the shaman must /339/ carry out his procedure: he sends his spirit kekhn to Tol for a small soul, which lies there on a small bed.

When a person who was drowning returns in a boat rescued from death, he and his wife must break the old chumashka and make a new one. If it is not broken, husband and wife will die.

766 [775] [776] A man who drowned or one who was eaten by a bear will be a god.

A drowned person is placed in a boat; the kinsmen get into another boat and float without rowing; they let the first boat, with the deceased, go ahead, and the deceased is cremated where it carries him to the bank. Hooks are used for pulling the body onto the bank. Inau are placed near the place of cremation. When the Tymovsk Gilyak travel to Tro, upon seeing the inau they throw chukh-chugynd (sacrifices) into the stream.

752 782 A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacrifices a dog to Pal-n"ivukh and makes chukh-chugynd.

/342 cont./

197 The Tymovsk and the Okhotsk Gilyak have one language.

/343/

823 973 A legend about three brothers-cliffs in Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin. Three Heng brothers went with a bear to look at a cast-up whale (kem), and then all of them turned into stone. Two jags -- mother and daughter -- look after them.

825 761 A rat must not be killed with an ax; a stick is necessary. Nakhvun's wife is dying because her father killed a rat with an ax; his son died for the same reason, and now his daughter is dying.

825 The attitude toward incest among dogs. According to the words of the Gilyak, among dogs a brother and sister do not copulate; exceptions are rare and are attributed to the milk. Dogs are killed for this; otherwise this heavy sin falls on the master; he will be punished with sickness and so forth. Father and daughter among dogs frequently have intercourse, but they are not killed for this.

302 Hair may be thrown away in any place.

752 825 [782] A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacrifices chukh-chugynd -- a dog -- to Pal-n"igyvyn. No one may look at a person wounded by a bear; only an old man or an old woman binds his wounds. His bed is curtained off with a sail.

784 825 [261] In need they sometimes eat a bear that has died, and they treat him like a killed one. When they set off somewhere (hunting) or in general on important business, they always take along their favorite ymgi (son-in-law).

773 In Mil'kvo one Gilyak had two women. Once his daughter with the grandchildren came to visit him. She went to gather berries while the men went out to hunt seals. Then

787 /753 cont./

756 825 782 [534] that he had been thus informed by the eldest of his people), and pronounced the conjuration or address to the bear and the snake as the two animals most feared by the Gilyak and Russians. During these conjurations he occasionally beat on a drum-like animal-skin stretched over a ring, using a little stick with a snake depicted at one end and a bear at the other. The bystanders howled and danced, and then the shaman beseeched the god for good fishing, good weather, for the rain to run off into the sea, for a favorable and safe sea for Gilyak and Russian. (Bm. I, p. 9.)

825 753 29. Gilyak. Shamanistic acts in case of sickness (2). The

[752] 2. Ineffective in cases of snakebite, for which the only remedy is tying the skin of the snake around the wound.

toad (which brings bad luck) is of two kinds, that is, sometimes a single one, simply called mipitsch, and sometimes a double one, wap-mipitsch, with a doubled body and extremities. The former has its abode on land, but the latter in the water; hence the former is also designated as mif-mipitsch, the latter as toll-mipitsch (3). Both are powerful and uncanny, magá, especially

3. Most of these accounts come from Porkuk and her son, Dshaman, from Kuik. Jutschin thought that the wap-mipitsch represents the copulation of the toads, which as a rule takes place in the water and the seeing of which is regarded by the Gilyak as uitsch. According to him, the wap-mipitsch must be worn by women.

the wap-mipitsch, /754/ which, as the Gilyak put it, resembles the devil (kins ngarlatsch), hence, perhaps, its double shape. Their evil power is shown by the fact that they sneak up on a sleeping human being and crawl through his mouth into his inner organs, into his chest and stomach, whereupon the person falls

758 Help in need is decidedly more the order of the day than
763 it is with us civilized people. If someone has undeservedly
735 become poor, he is immediately assisted, and debts are paid for relatives. Likewise people who have become incapable of work because of illness are assured support by relatives and neighbors. The sick, in general, are eagerly nursed; only when the death agony begins, the dying person is subjected to a harsh ordeal. He is carried out of the house into the open and is left there at any time of the year, until he is dead. This custom is based on the belief that a dead person brings ill-luck to the house, and in case a person dies indoors, the house must be taken down. However, the sick person who is subjected to these measures is usually already in a comatose state. It appears, that child-bearing women are removed from the house for similar reasons.

752 In danger and suffering the Gilyak also help the non-Gilyak
766 to say nothing of their fellow-tribesmen. I must mention two 609 exceptions. I heard repeatedly from Russians that a Gilyak on the point of drowning could not count on help from his people, in fact, the Gilyak watch him going under, with fatalistic calm, and comfort themselves by saying that "he is needed above." Besides, it is said that the Sakhalin-Gilyaks take care not to help a man who has fallen into the clutches of a bear, because they see in it a divine punishment. One who is killed in this way is not cremated but must be buried together with the body of the bear, should he also be killed; at the same time they scatter about pieces of bear flesh and scraps of the dead man's clothing. The Gilyak whom I questioned about drowning persons, unanimously testified [224] that they always helped them as much as they could and they showed me several people who had been rescued because help had been sent them from the shore. Furthermore, in the case of a man who has been attacked by a bear being left to his fate, we must take into consideration the fact that the custom of two or three people going out to hunt a bear presupposes mutual aid. The question deserves to be further investigated, but nevertheless I believe that the afore-mentioned fatalism does not appear in all cases, only in certain instances where superstition was awakened for some specific reason.

The Gilyak help not only their fellow-tribesmen but also strangers in time of distress as much as they can. They repeatedly saved the lives of run-away convicts, for which they were often wretchedly rewarded besides. More of this later.

Hospitality is decidedly practised.

164 conjunctivitis, corneal obscuration, and sty. Some cannot
293 stand a strong light and this is particularly noticeable in February and March because at that time, in the mid-day sun [249] the snow which is already partly melting on the surface, is intolerably blinding. These people, if they must go out during the day, wear spectacles of braided horsehair, which they make themselves. Among Gilyak women who do a great deal of fine needle work, nearsightedness occurs.

164 The infrequency of eye diseases seems to be partly connected with the non-prevalence of miasmatic and infectious diseases. (1) Soldiers also suffer little with their eyes, in spite of the blinding snow. The abundant summer rain fall, the long, severe winter, and, finally, the sparse population account for the scarcity of miasmatic and infectious diseases, in spite of the widespread swamps.

1. Disguised ague and scurvy are to a certain extent exceptions.

But as for the febrile skin diseases, which among the Russians occur more seldom than in Europe, they are a veritable scourge among the natives. Whether they were known before the advent of the Russians is difficult to say, but one may assume that they were less frequent and permitted the population to recover. Now, however, they suffer more.

After several murderous epidemics of smallpox and measles, there remained gaps which will not be so easily filled. This seems to be the chief reason for the decrease in the native population.

164 The nervous and mental diseases which occur among the 158 European inhabitants more frequently than in Europe,
732 chiefly from causes of a social nature (nostalgia, alcoholism etc.) are not wide-spread among the Gilyak. I heard of epilepsy, but nothing of neuralgias, paralyses, and idiocy. I know of one case of chronic intermittent mania. However, diseases in this category will increase if whiskey-drinking should become prevalent.

●752 External illnesses such as: burns, frost-bite, sprains, breaks, etc., of course occur, but I saw no case which resulted in permanent injury. From this one may conclude that the primitive methods of healing combined with the power of nature usually conquer such illnesses. [250]

164 Chronic skin diseases occur rather frequently. The chief cause of these is, of course, the lack of cleanliness, but it

164 also seems to me that the almost exclusive fish diet is a contributory factor. At any rate, I knew people who had a skin itch after eating fish, which, to a certain extent, points to its etiological significance.

Lithiasis does not occur among the Gilyak or the Russians of the Amur, and this may be partly explained by the softness of the water.

Goiter is also unknown. The only case I saw there, was that of a woman who had come from Irkutsk.

755 The treatment of disease is of course very rudimentary. They expect the most from the magic tricks of the shamans, since usually black magic is part of the game. The natural healing agencies over which the shaman commands are very few in number and are carefully guarded.

●752 Sprains are usually set by stretching. In cases of breaks, splints are used. Wounds are frequently left quite open and washed only with water. In cases of suppuration bits of agaric [Lärchenpilz] are sometimes put in the wound.

757 Frozen limbs are wrapped in oiled or clean cotton. In cases of chronic stomach and intestinal catarrh, bitter herbs, especially wormwood, are used as infusions. In cases of violent attacks of colic which occur with this illness the Gilyak sometimes set Moxa of burning sponge. Rheumatics bathe in the warm springs near the village of Mikhil, and these actually prove to be very helpful. (1) In bad

1. They have a temperature of 24 to 36 degrees Reaumur and belong to the indifferent thermal waters.

epidemics of measles, etc., the Gilyak sometimes separate into groups of families and go into the taiga.

The natives generally do not like to undergo treatment. They suffer patiently and call the shaman only in extreme cases. They very seldom turn to Russian physicians, but they regard them also as shamans, but wiser than the native ones.

231 Of diseases occuring among their sole domestic animal, the dog, I can mention only epidemic colds which sometimes wreak havoc. As for rabies, [251] not a single case has occurred up to now in the coastal region, which may be related to the fact that among natives as well as among many Russians, dogs are systematically kept for work, that is, for draft purposes.

753

753 THEORY OF DISEASE--extent of the attribution of disease to natural causes, to sorcery, and to supernatural aggression; prevalent theories of the supernatural causation of disease (e.g., soul loss, spirit possession, object intrusion, poison, evil eye, violation of taboos, pollution or contagion); special notions about loathsome diseases (e.g., leprosy); scientific theories of disease (e.g., transmission through germs); etc. See also:

Religious and magical beliefs	77	Development of biological science	815
Incidence of disease	164	Knowledge and beliefs concerning
Medical research	742	human physiology	827
Conception of the causes of death	761	Interpretation of mental disorders	828

/338 cont./

The Gilyak Churka (1) recounted: "When I was little I saw

1. L. Ia. Shternberg's guide around Sakhalin.

a dog and wanted very much to have it, but did not dare. I felt ill under my armpits. I dreamed that the dog bit me in the very place that was sore. I lay just as if dead. Then my father bought the dog immediately -- he had to hurry -- and immediately fried a piece and I began to recover."

Everyone confirmed this fact. The husband of his present wife died from kkhmàs'ind.

V.

The Rescue of a Drowning Man

Having heard the cry of a drowning man, they come to his aid, press down on his stomach so that the water will come out, clean his mouth with shavings, and place a stick in his mouth. Then they wrap him in fur coats and tightly bandage his face (if he looks at fire, he will die). When he becomes warm, his face is uncovered. He gives chukh-chugynd to Tol and then carries out a procedure called shavynd.

A Gilyak was drowning under the broken ice. He was rescued and brought to a yurt where the rescuer-host and the one rescued sat down opposite each other; a bowl with sarana and puchka was placed before each of them on both sides, and a white dog near each of them. They hooked together with hooks which they held in their hands (an imitation of the rescue) and pulled against each other, saying: "You will live to an old age, and so will I." Then, at the departure, the rescued man stepped in the bowl of his host and in his own, and they exchanged bowls. After the exchange, the rescued man said: "Nikhkhakhrá -- run out on either side into two points, one of which represents a lizard, the other a snake, the similar shapes of both ends facing one another alternately. Unfortunately the specimen under discussion is somewhat worn by frequent use and is lacking the lizard at the one end.

/744 cont./

The other amulet is an iron semicircle, from which hang figures of different significance made of the same metal, specifically: at the one end, a crude human shape and a roughly triangular piece that, according to some of the Gilyak, is supposed to represent a ptarmigan, and at the other end an identical alleged ptarmigan and a heart; in the middle, finally, a roughly human shape with two heads, which is supposed to represent the kins, the evil, destructive power, that is, the devil. According to the reports of the Gilyak themselves, they believe that sickness is nothing but the kins gnawing at a human being and finally fatally devouring him. That is the end of all who /745/ die of sickness. It is no wonder that with such a belief the Gilyak do not claim heaven for the souls of those who die of sickness, but have them wandering on earth, while the souls of all the murdered and even of suicides fly to heaven. According to Gilyak belief, the earth is the abode of countless kins or devils who hide in the forests and mountains, as well as in the water and everywhere. The kins are represented with two and three heads by the Gilyak, perhaps in order to indicate with the extra ones, in contrast to man, their power over the latter (1).

1. According to the Gilyak, one of the heads on these two or three-headed forms is a human head. This therefore indicates that the kins has seized the human being.

I do not know the significance of the alleged ptarmigans, if that is what they are. The heart, however, has reference to the purpose of the whole semicircle Namely, it is to be worn around the neck against chest ailments, coughing, and the like. The name kissj, however, which was given to me for it, seems to have a

/753 cont./

that he had been thus informed by the eldest of his people), and pronounced the conjuration or address to the bear and the snake as the two animals most feared by the Gilyak and Russians. During these conjurations he occasionally beat on a drum-like animal-skin stretched over a ring, using a little stick with a snake depicted at one end and a bear at the other. The bystanders howled and danced, and then the shaman beseeched the god for good fishing, good weather, for the rain to run off into the sea, for a favorable and safe sea for Gilyak and Russian. (Bm. I, p. 9.)

29. Gilyak. Shamanistic acts in case of sickness (2). The

2. Ineffective in cases of snakebite, for which the only remedy is tying the skin of the snake around the wound.

toad (which brings bad luck) is of two kinds, that is, sometimes a single one, simply called mipitsch, and sometimes a double one, wap-mipitsch, with a doubled body and extremities. The former has its abode on land, but the latter in the water; hence the former is also designated as mif-mipitsch, the latter as toll-mipitsch (3). Both are powerful and uncanny, magá, especially

3. Most of these accounts come from Porkuk and her son, Dshaman, from Kuik. Jutschin thought that the wap-mipitsch represents the copulation of the toads, which as a rule takes place in the water and the seeing of which is regarded by the Gilyak as uitsch. According to him, the wap-mipitsch must be worn by women.

the wap-mipitsch, /754/ which, as the Gilyak put it, resembles the devil (kins ngarlatsch), hence, perhaps, its double shape. Their evil power is shown by the fact that they sneak up on a sleeping human being and crawl through his mouth into his inner organs, into his chest and stomach, whereupon the person falls

/754 cont./

sick and dies, of the mipitsch
is a shaman.
the mipitsch fr carved by the the shaman is by the sick per A sick man we mipitsch are a mipitsch. It is 1156, 1162) th
This is made b made by the m tion for only th arabesques and birch bark.

The ideas similar to those less power is a of the sleeping above by a sha

1.

around the hea either side, in forehead, there dicating a man
the very front, is striking, sinc magá. (Bm. I

30. Gilyak
shaman perform
tion and esteem deviate from th
tion of the sorc

if he does not use the proper means to free himself
. The only means that can help him, however,
He conjures up a kägn (a good god), who removes om the sick person. At the same time a mipitsch haman himself or by someone else at the order of hung around the patient's neck and must be worn son from then on to protect himself in the future.
ars a single mipitsch, a woman a double one. The lways carved out of wood, especially the wap-only on the snout-band of the dead bear (see pp.
at a single mipitsch of birch bark may be found.
y the women, but the wooden ones are always en, since wood carving of all kinds is an occupae men, while the women are skilled at cutting figures out of cloth and therefore also out of

of the Gilyak concerning the lizard (mä(r)ngai) are e concerning the toad and snake, except that much tributed to it. It allegedly crawls into the head person and is removed in a way similar to the man and by putting an iron amulet-ring (lalź) (1)

See Appendix 6 /p. 1196 /.

d. This ring bears the representation of a lizard on the region of the temples; in front, closer to the is a human figure on either side, supposedly inon one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at on the forehead, the lalź bears a frog shape. This e the frog (dhal) is not regarded as unlucky, is not , pp. 44-46.)
. Amazing, miraculous acts which the Gilyak ns are chiefly the means by which he wins admiran among his countrymen. The more these acts e natural course of things, the greater is the reputaerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

9: Hawes--239 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 753, 776, 782

"The Gilyaks explain the visitation of disease in this way. The sick man must have offended the good spirit kiskh, who thereupon deserts him and leaves him in the power of the evil spirit. The offering made to the latter is a bribe, whereby the sufferer coaxes the evil spirit to quit him.

The Gilyak makes no offering to kiskh, the creator, the great spirit, the god of the moral world, for he does not know where he is; in fact, so vague is his notion of him that it can only be said to exist in his mind as a nebulous conception. With regard to the position of the cham, the evil spirit cannot but be angry at the trick he has been played, and the want of respect paid to him; but we need not be anxious for the healer, since he is secure in his knowledge of many exorcisms."

844 Pregnancy, Childbirth and Miscarriage among the 753 Inhabitants of Sakhalin Island (Gilyak and Ainu).
843 by Bronislaw Pilsudski

I. The Gilyak

The house of birth.

Among the Gilyak the act of birth is considered unclean and therefore is never allowed to take place in the yurt, their home. That is why not only in summer, but even in winter during the worst periods of frost and snowstorms, the woman in labor is led to a hut built especially for her near the home. The choice of the place makes it clear that the Gilyak feel no respect for the act of birth, for the hut mentioned above is built in the bushes which serve as a privy for the 62 women. The location of these bushes is always 41 definitely fixed, and no man would ever walk in that 753 direction. The boys are strictly forbidden to run or to look around there, and they are warned that they will contract a disease called taremynd if they step into a trace of women's blood. The disease begins with a paralysis of the hands and feet, the afflicted person loses the ability to move, loses weight and finally dies, for the disease is incurable.

44 As soon as the labor pains start the woman is 83 brought into the lan-raf or the "house of birth". This "house of birth" is erected hurriedly at the very last moment. Built of wooden boards roughly put together and covered with old bark from fir trees, it looks more like a dog house than like the room destined to welcome a new inhabitant of the world longingly expected by his parents. In the eyes of the Gilyak there is no conflict between the affection and love of the parents for the newly born child and the severe, if not cruel welcome, it is given. The child will go through a hard, more than Spartan education, and its life will be full of worries and hardships in a neither opulent nor gentle nature. This is why no Gilyak even comes to think that the first entrance into the world might be easier and more wholesome for the little guest if it took place in the presence of other people under other and better circumstances.

844 When the won 291 ready for her,
the weather is only distinction
the woman in la that Gilyak wom
844 Usually an ol
835 through several If [757] such a at hand the hus place; but unde member of the younger brothe to the customs wife of his olde way her husban
the child.
844 The Birth.
753 During the de does not stretc same height as a yard above the delivery the wo
not to strike ou lean over to on delivery, the w prescribed atti pain, it is the her up at her s making the forb that women wh contract a dise spine. Once I w had become a c quiet while in l or, as the Gily
She was not abl
845 If the labor p suffers too bad
and forth in fro down from abo

nan in labor goes to the place made she is clad in old soiled clothes. If cool she takes more clothes along. The in clothing worn during labor is that bor takes off the trousers, a garment nen wear in summer and winter.
der woman who herself has gone childbirths helps the woman in labor.
midwife, called lanaven szauk, is not band of the woman in labor can take her no circumstances may another male family take this place, not even the of the husband, although, according of the Gilyak he has a right to the r brother and considers himself in a d and certainly the second father of livery the woman in labor sits and her legs. The seat is erected at the the bed in the yurt, that is about half floor. During the whole period of man in labor is supposed to keep quiet, t in pain, not to try to get up, not to side or the other. If, during a hard oman is not able to stay in the tude by herself and starts writhing in luty of the midwife or husband to hold houlders in order to prevent her from bidden movements. The Gilyak believe try to get up during the delivery ase which causes a deformation of the as even shown a young woman who ripple because she had not stayed abor. Her spine was really deformed ak say, broken (naski ts' onkrynd).

e to walk and died a few years later.
ains last too long and the woman ly, a piece of clothing is moved back nt of her face and somebody blows ve on the part in her hair.

845 dwelling to the top of a near-by mountain; there, for 766 the last time, choice food is offered to the figure.
782 Next to the sacrificial objects a one to two meter long
775 stick carved in curly design is dug into the ground; they call it nau. From this moment on the whole tribe is safe [762] from being haunted by the dead child, tonhr ehlian, without further prayers or sacrifices.

753 If the relatives neglect to follow these rules, which 845 are designed to appease the awe-inspiring spirits of 776 the mountains and to win their favor, they evoke their anger. Several diseases which attack the parents and relatives of the twins are considered to be symptoms of their revenge (tohr ehlian). These usually are certain diseases like deformation of the jaw-bone, squint-eyes, stiffening of the neck or any kind of convulsions. The appearance of such diseases is considered to be a consequence of the mountain spirit's dissatisfaction; in such cases one says "tonhr ehlian singrund", that is "the twin child is tormenting".

784 The Gilyak are so afraid of these dangers that 845 young women and girls are strictly forbidden to listen
777 to reports about such happenings; by these precautions, they believe, they will be able to prevent the birth of twins. Women are neither allowed to borrow household articles nor to accept gifts from friends who had given birth to twins. In this case old soft objects are considered to be the most dangerous ones. Hard objects, however, especially tools made of metal, do not transfer the bad luck of the former owner to the new one.

842 It is altogether a trait characteristic of this northern 777 tribe that they believe in the possibility of the transference of physical peculiarities from one man to another man by way of his tools. This gives us an explanation for the superstitious remedies they use for overcoming a woman's sterility. The woman who cannot bear children must ask another very fertile woman to lend her the waistband of her trousers and she has to wear it up to the moment of the desired success. A Gilyak told me that fertility can be transferred from one person to another like a contagious disease, for example by way of a vessel which had been used by the sick person.

825 middle of a village, and there fattened upon fish. On feto-996 days he is led, or rather dragged, in procession, and of course is thoroughly muzzled and bound. Finally a great day arrives on which Bruin takes a prominent part in the festival by being killed. There are many superstitious ceremonies carefully observed on such occasions. The ears, jawbones, and skull of the bear are hung upon trees to ward off evil spirits, and the flesh is eaten, as it is supposed to make all who partake of it both fortunate and courageous.

I did not have the pleasure of witnessing any of these ursine festivals, but I saw several bear cages and looked upon a bear while he lunched on cold salmon. If the bear were more gentle in his manners he might become a household pet among the Gilyaks; but at present he is not in favor, especially where there are small children.

231 Ermines were formerly domesticated for catching rats, the high price of cats confining their possession to the wealthy.
823 Cats have a half-religious character and are treated with 739 great respect. Since the advent of the Russians the supply is very good. Before they came the Manjour merchants used to bring only male cats that could not trouble themselves about posterity. The price was sometimes a hundred roubles for a single mouser, and by curtailing the supply the Man-jours kept the market good.

756 The Gilyaks, like nearly all the natives of Northern Asia, are addicted to Shamanism. The shaman combines the double function of priest and doctor, ministering to the physical and spiritual being at the same time. When a man is taken sick he is supposed to be attacked by an evil spirit and the shaman is called to practice exorcism. There is a distinct spirit for every disease and he must be propitiated in a particular manner. While practicing his profession the shaman contorts his body and dances like one insane, and howls worse than a dozen Kamchadale dogs. He is dressed in a fantastic manner and beats a tambourine during his performance. To accommodate himself to the different spirits he modulates his voice, changes the character of his dance, and alters his cos-

754

754 SORCERY--ideas of the causation of disease and death through witchcraft and sorcery; actual and reputed prevalence of sorcery; motives for practicing sorcery; methods (e.g., bone pointing, manipulation of effigies, exuvial magic, invocation of spirit aids); employment of sorcerers; witches, wizards, and sorceress; physical, social and mental characteristics; sources of power, training; organization; special types of sorcerers (e.g., werewolves, vampires, individuals with the evil eye); evidence as to the efficacy of sorcery; reactions to sorcerers (e.g., witch hunts); etc. See also:

Ingroup antagonisms	678	Familiar spirits	776
Sorcery as a factor in social control	628	Uses of magic other than for the causation
Punishment of sorcery	683	or cure of disease	789
Counter-measures to sorcery	755

/256 cont./

143 In view of the fact that in ethnographic literature sexual 826 intercourse and marriages of hermaphrodites are often confused with homosexuality, I shall cite very characteristic instances of hermaphroditism from the life of the Gilyak known to me. On Sakhalin I know of two cases. In the settlement of Yama, near Aleksandrovsk, there lived an old Gilyak, Chubuk, who was known as a hermaphrodite, since up to a certain age he considered himself a woman (the membrum virile was underdeveloped) and wore woman's clothing.
Later the membrum virile attained the proper development, and he began to wear men's clothing and finally married.

143 I learned of another instance in the settlement of Myy Gyrk 826 on the western shore in the far north of Sakhalin. Here I once 588 met two young people sitting on the shore, a man and a woman, who appeared to be spouses. I immediately noticed that the latter very much resembled a man in the face. My companions explained that only a year ago she had been wearing men's clothing, considered herself a man, and was very friendly with her present husband. Once they went fishing together. They had to spend the night together, and then the hermaphrodite revealed her secret to her friend. From that time on they began to live together and ended up by getting married, although people strongly urged the young man against [538] /257/ taking this step. Similar cases may easily have given
● [754] rise to the legends about transformed persons (about werewolves).

On the Amur the Gilyak Putuk told me the curious details concerning his hermaphrodite friend. The latter had been a girl up to a certain age. Suddenly he began to notice that he was developing a membrum virile, which would sometimes grow larger, sometimes diminish, and sometimes disappear completely. He communicated this to his lover, who came to him at night and was convinced of the truth of his words and on the next day told everyone about it. In the course of several years a beard grew and the male organ was definitely developed, although his vagina was also fully developed, and he could have intercourse with men. After

685 /304 cont./
695 actually is the perpetrator, let the harm be to him." "Ni tajorś mykyslu jag:yd-lu ta-n´erokh tokh elyvgujś. Chi narl´ăr: chan maj:okhanś. Mykyz" mra lytyng ivg:aj huktokh elyvg:az´o."
685 While they argue, a crow (ves´) and a cat are thrown into the fire 695 alive. If the crow caws, the man also caws and gets into the 825 fire. If the cat mews, so does the man.

An oath is performed for an inveterate criminal, wishing him death; the thief will twitch in any case. The crow and cat, while they are burning and still struggling in the fire, are told:
"Chi tajrodz: furarś n´ivykh lerş mra chi unakhana uikhyndor hy nivukhdokh elyvgujś." "You do not know, you will suffer for a petty offense (i.e., you will serve as an example to the Gilyak), following the law of sin, let it go badly for that man."

614 Only a certain khal knows the oath with each particular 825 animal. There is a clan khal is a wolf -- kekhr; ping chnarpung. They caught a wolf. They went hunting seals. The wolf was sitting on the ice, and it had been carried into the estuary. As soon as the hunters saw it, they approached the bank, bow first. That wolf came and sat on the bow of the boat. They wanted to kill it, but took pity on it. They let it off and let it go. Sometime later these same (people) were hunting, and a bear attacked them. Then that wolf appeared, began to circle round, attacked the bear and saved them. Thus (it happened) many times.
This wolf multiplied and was frequently encountered (as a rule there were few wolves there). Chnar-pung do not kill a wolf, but whenever they see one they feed it. When the hunters, having killed many seals, leave the whole carcasses, the wolf spoils them, but if a Chnarpung is left, then he does not spoil them. They journey into the taiga, and the wolf goes along close by;
they leave yukola, mor´, and so forth there. The Chnarpung may call him atk. Wolves, like tigers, are of two kinds: docile and not docile.

685 This same wolf tendon is used in another way. When some-
● 754 thing is lost, they fashion a stuffed doll, like a man, out of a rotten piece of wood and place a seal bladder on its head. They bind its neck with a wolf tendon, and at night they walk around and knock in the corner of the first yurt, saying: "Pyz´ nyngiś -- look

685 /304 cont./
695 for your master!" And thus /305/ they go around the entire vil-
● 754 lage, meanwhile pulling on the tendon. Then the thief begins to suffocate from fright and confesses. A shout goes up; it happens that the thief dies from it.

627 An oath is taken also in controversial matters. Before the 695 court, in a balagan where the khlaj-nivukh sits, nothing is allowed to be boiled; they eat raw yukola.

A stick (kyt´) -- about an arshin in length with a human chkhnaj.

If the matter reaches the point of breaking the stick, then they pay more -- double. Both big and little assemble in the balagan of the khlaj-n´ivukh´s (the settlement of Karga, 1896).

881 Women, Childbirth, and Children. A maiden who has reached 30 sexual maturity makes two braids. Women pierce both ears in 178 order to put in earrings (mer´ăh); formerly men also pierced their ears. A wife who is a minor can be slept with only after she be-781 gins to menstruate. During menstruation the woman puts on her 585 oldest clothes and does not sleep with her husband. Women wash
541 themselves, but not with hot water, for otherwise the tŭgurmam [302] (the mistress of the fire) takes offense.

171 Among the Kekhal (Orochi) a man who has two wives ac-
834 commodates a guest under one blanket.

943 A pregnant woman must not look at the Amur when it be-
823 gins to break up, in order not to slow up the opening of the river.

They give birth in the balagan (midwife -- langyv-mam) 844 in winter the mother spends one and a half days in it, in summer -- three days.

84 One must not cry out during delivery -- a sin. The husband at this time does not go anywhere. If a child has died during birth, the woman must not travel on the river or sea for a whole year -- there would not be any fish. For a month before childbirth, it is not permissible to bind anything tightly or to drive in stakes; it is not permissible to repair anything for an alien.

[789] During difficult deliveries they open up boxes, tear off patches, and unscrew their rifles. The newborn baby is washed with cold water. The midwife is not paid. Until the umbilicus heals, the

/309 cont./

766 Two men, friends of the deceased, sit to watch, do not 766 move, do not speak, tie up all the dogs, and wait. In the yurt
● 754 a shaman shamanizes, calling on the sorcerer who drowned the 787 man to eat from the kinys n´ich: "Go eat human meat!" He rushes from beyond the mountains, from beyond the valleys.
Amid complete silence a wave splashes, a whirlwind rushes through, a bird swims up, a black dog runs up. Suddenly the wave has approached the very cup; the deceased either moves, makes a sound, or sits up. Now it is necessary to pierce the deceased or (to hit?) the cup with a dolphin harpoon which has been in constant use, or a spear, and it feels as if the spear has struck into the man, and there are traces of blood on it. On the following day the sorcerer has a wound or a sickness from which he dies.
Then the dead man is buried, while the cup is kept for two summers and then thrown away. The cup may also be destroyed right away. They do not make it very pretty. Then they make real tolr´ir and sacrifice from them down to the third generation.

756 Shamanistic kamlanie. Shamans are 1) toldokh urly cham; 787 2) paĭŭokh urly cham; 3) kurdokh urly cham; 4) pang:at n´ivukh -- fortuneteller. At home a shaman directs his questions to a stone with a hole -- tolfang. If the stone immediately gives answers, it is thrown away. The shaman queries his paĭ´pang: a (a wooden figure which is bound with white drel´, and with shavings on the neck; it is suspended on a string). The waving of the figure is an affirmative answer. If there is no pang, they tie tobacco wrapped in white drel´ to the stone. It advises the shaman about medicines, indicates what sacrifices to give and [755] to which particular paĭ (i.e., paĭ of one's own or of a different clan), and so forth. It cannot drive away the evil spirit, but it can find out what spirit is there and also give indications with regard to stealing and fish. A man receives his pang also during sickness. He may even be a shaman, but frequently bad shamans steal (tempt away) their major kekhr from them. There are shamans 756 who have pang:kh, but not each one has them. There are 777 shamans who have kitus, something like an earthworm.

/328 cont./

756 When shamans fight, the one who has more souls wins. The 774 killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition
776 of the kekhn of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul
[578] of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (tol). On these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tol-kekhn. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kekhn. The shaman kekhn fears only Pal milk and Tol milk, but not the milk of sables, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kekhn there are variously colored eared seals, iron trout, and tigers.

756 How the shaman Chomkx resurrected a woman (the settlement of 529 Rykovskoye). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night; if before morning she moves her left little finger, she will live." That is what happened.

756 A shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

756 A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman.
84 She kills her shaman competitor, sending her kekhn to rub her 756 competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shanikh-chokh. A
666 feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person waste 578 away. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local 833 ataxia.

756 The kamlanie of a female shaman, who, according to her 774 own words, was milkternd (mad) after the birth of her first daughter.
776 She first made inau and then rubbed her face, breast, and so forth 158 with marsh tea, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her tambourine... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings. She yawned. Moderate blows... The sounds grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She

/328 cont./

769 The favorite dog, "pryski" (every man has his own pryski)
23 is brought to be present at the funeral ceremony, and then it is taken away to the yurt, tied to the place where the dead man slept, and fed from his bowl for three years -- if it is a man, and four years -- if a woman. After this it is sold or given as a gift, but they cannot keep it.

766 Even where cremation is practiced, insane persons after death are buried directly into the ground.

764 In Ady-Tymi, if they suspect that a person died from magic,
●754 two men with rifles are sent at night to stand guard at the place
184 of cremation. Birds appear first, then hares and foxes and then the ormi-milk, rubbed with clay against arrows. He comes to eat the man, and if they do not kill him, then the others will die.

764 On the day following the cremation, when the fire has died out, firewood and boards are strewn on it, and on top a dog slied deliberately broken; sometimes small pieces of it are kept (as souvenirs).

Where the deceased are buried and not burned, they are placed in a coffin. Anyone can make a coffin of boards or from a boat -- two boxes. It is carried out through the door and placed on the dog sled, which in both winter and summer is carried on the arms. The required objects are placed in the coffin, some as models. Those who go along do not put on their festive clothes. The pit which they dig must accommodate the coffin up to the lid. There is no crying; kissing the deceased is a sin. It is not required that everyone throw earth into the grave. No signs are set up. Dogs are killed on the grave, but they are not fed beforehand, nor are inau put on them. The skin is immediately removed from the slain dogs and hung on a stick, while the meat is boiled right there, but it is eaten by few, and others throw it away. Boats and so forth are broken over his grave. The Gilyak is not afraid of the [769] deceased. When "good food happens," the deceased are fed for about half a year.

/367 cont./

002 suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy. Shamanism, 756 with its ecstasy, seems to me to be a borrowed phenomenon. It
791 does not fit in with the religious beliefs of the Gilyak. It is true
●[754] that he believes the shaman, trusts him to cure the sick, superstitiously fears him, believes in his predictions and in the power of his magic, believes, for instance, that the shaman can kill any man no matter how far away from him this last may be (thus they say that the Rykovo shaman killed the Nikolayevsk one by shooting a bird that was flying past); shamanism, however, is not typical
756 of Gilyak religious views. It is perhaps appropriate to mention at this point that shamans do a great deal of harm to their worshipers.
[754] In the case of the unsuccessful outcome of their treatments, they often pass the blame onto quite innocent people, whom they subject to physical violence and to cruel persecutions if the patient
[158] dies. Also, by suggesting to their patients that their illness is the result of possession by devils, they cause serious psychic disturb-
[782] ances in people whose nervous state is healthy. The prayers of the Gilyak are quite characteristic, simple and clear like their beliefs. "Kur, piongukhia!" (Oh, God, please!) -- the Gilyak limits himself to this when he asks for something from his god.

776 The Gilyak have a hazy conception, or better a feeling, about 577 a supreme deity, the father of all men and of all that exists, but for him it is just a vague feeling for which he does not have a clear formulation. The gods have a relation, not only to the material 577 life of man, but also to his moral life. Moral principles of com-
573 munal living, helping one's neighbors, and respect for the life [776] and property of another enjoy divine sanction. Violating them leads to punishment in this life (sickness, premature death) and in the future life. I happened to hear such a statement from a Gilyak: "If a rich man abuses a poor man, it is a great sin, but if a poor man abuses a rich one (in the material sense, if he borrows and does not repay, deceives him, etc.), that is not a sin!" This statement sounded all the stranger to me, because the Gilyak who made it was a very rich man himself, a big kulak, who did not hesitate to oppress the poor in any way. I do not venture to judge how much this extremely altruistic belief is really the belief of the Gilyak, or whether it is the result of Russian influence, or mere hypocrisy.

755

755 MAGICAL AND MENTAL THERAPY--individual therapeutic efforts (e.g., acts of faith, self-analysis); resorting to a specialized practitioner (e.g., circumstances, arrangements, payments); diagnosis (e.g., divination, interpretation of symptoms); therapeutic procedure (e.g., shamanistic seances, analytic couch); methods (e.g., interpretation of dreams, countermagic, exorcism, recapture of soul, sucking out of intrusive object, resort to spirit helpers); prescriptions (e.g., medication, purification, expiation, imposition of taboos); prognosis; ritual banishment of disease (e.g., ksapgoal); faith healing; scientific systems of psychotherapy (e.g., psychoanalysis, psychiatry, mental hygiene); evidence as to the effectiveness of magical and mental therapy; etc. See also:
behavior processes and personality . . . . . 18 Soul concepts 774
Shamanistic dances . . . . . 328 Spirit possession and dream interpretation . . 787

/37 cont./

123 the women rushed to their storehouse to fetch the precious buda
776 reserved for sacrifices. In order to feed me and my companions
782 and thereby fulfill the will of the Head of the earth. Thus, thanks to the piece of candy. I, in the opinion of the Gilyak, not only saved my life, but unexpectedly obtained for my companions and myself a dish which we had not seen for a long time.

782 The Gilyak also has live sacrifices, the objects of which are dogs. A dog is killed, by strangulation, before the season of sable hunting, during the bear festival, before departure for a long journey, during sickness, and generally on the solemn occasions of life. Before it is killed, it is fed, and at that time, depending upon the circumstances, it is given one or another
[776] mission. Thus, during the bear festival, the dog will be told: "Follow your bear to the highest mountain. May the master love you. Change this hair and come down next year as a bear ●[755] so that I may see you." When a dog is killed on the occasion of sickness, it is asked to be the intercessor for the sick man before the god to which it is being sent.

Thus the victim is a simple envoy, whose soul, after its death, will reach the master who lives on the highest mountain.

775 Clan gods constitute a special category of gods. As a
614 matter of fact, these gods play a most important role in the life of the Gilyak, and it is most often to them that the Gilyak offers his sacrifices. In each element there is a clan god. The clan gods are of particular /58/ interest, because in this tribe we can most clearly trace the very genesis of this very common fact of primitive religion. Even among the Greeks and the Romans the worship of clan gods was a common phenomenon. The clan gods of the Gilyak are not supernatural mythical beings, as among the Greeks and the Romans, but their very own clansmen who, for a variety of reasons, have entered the clan
775 of one or another god "master." A particularly fortunate com-
614 bination of circumstances, if I may express myself thus, is re-776 quired to attain such an honor. If, while hunting, a Gilyak was killed by a bear, if he fell prey to the waves on the water, if he was murdered or burned to death through his own carelessness, if, according to the shaman's explanation, a woman died from

/69 cont./

796 accident that the death of a relative, i.e., the fact of the 825 extraordinarily malicious designs of an evil spirit, forces him to catch or buy a bear cub, whatever the cost. That a bear
[787] by its mere presence drives away evil spirits may be seen
●[755] from the single fact that during the bear festival the shaman
[056] is forbidden to consult in his dreams his kekhn (see below) about curing a sick man, i.e., driving out the evil spirits residing in him, for the bear will be offended; he himself can drive them away with his own strength. Analogies to
[171] such beliefs in the purifying influence of the bear and of many other animals are to be found in vestiges of our own survivals and ceremonies. As is well known, in Little Russia /Ukraine/ there existed the custom of leading a bear through the village on certain holidays for purification... In our grand stables the custom of keeping goats, who are supposed to protect the horses and the grooms from evil power, has been preserved up to the present. And so, similarly, the
[614] clan that feeds a bear performs an important social function, securing all their own against the evil designs of their strongest, though invisible enemies. Unique religious sanitation, but the only kind available to primitive man!

Let us consider the meaning of those ceremonies that accompany every case of bear killing. First of all we should say that the Gilyak does not consider the killing of a bear a sin. In spite of all his respect for it, he is convinced that in the first place those bears that fall prey to him are sent to him by the "master" of the taiga, for whom the bears play the same role that dogs do for the Gilyak. "The bear is the dog of the master of the mountain," such is the formula of the [014] Gilyak. In addition, the bear loses nothing by its violent death, for death to it is only leaving its body to the Gilyak, while its soul -- that living duplicate -- then gaily runs to its master as if nothing had happened. Therefore no expiation whatever is required here. But the bear, even though only the dog of a forest man, is nevertheless a creature of a higher order, of a higher rank, than man. From the point of view of primitive man, there is nothing derogatory to the sacred

176 life, causing sickness and death. But for them, people w 161 not die. Natural death is impossible. Death is the result 753 the scheming of these insidious creatures. Therefore the will never touch a sable that died in the ta[illegible], even thou skin is very valuable and very well preserved, for a devil suredly rests in a sable that has died. Just as he, the Gily lies in wait for a beast and tries in every way to kill him, an evil spirit lies in wait for the Gilyak himself at every 53 in order to devour him. Sickness is no more than an evil 176 who made his way into the body of a Gilyak and is slowly eating him. Nightmares and dreams in which the sick m dreams that somebody is strangling him, pressing from wi easily provide grounds for such a notion. If some organ i functioning in the proper way, as, for example, in shortn breath, it is easy to imagine that some kind of being has inside and is interfering with breathing, and so forth. It imperative to expel such a creature. This expulsion is ef in various ways, beginning with the simplest and ending the most complex.

55 Here is an example which quite graphically illustr the "psychology" of the expulsion of devils. One woman, was subject to attacks of sudden hysterical psychosis, was in my presence on a high platform, generally used to clea fish, and a fire was ignited under it with all kinds of rags, canine feces, and stinking garbage. The devil inside the woman could not, of course, bear the horrible smell and prudently left the heart of the woman, who was thus save
But not all devils are so sensitive to a bad smell; others quire stronger methods. Such devils must be frightened b extraordinary noise, by frenzied shrieks, by the frightenin appearance of the expeller, and by other such terrorizing methods, hence the necessity for the devil-expeller to be his tambourine, make noise with rattles, shriek in an unn voice, and put himself in a state of frenzy, to which end he swallows smoke, drinks sea water, puts himself in a st of stupor with the smoke of bagul'nik (Ledum palustre), c

/744 cont./

708 755 532 126 6. Gilyak. Through C. v. Dittmar, following his visit in Tebach for the bear festival, I obtained a series of Gilyak idols which in part refer to the festival itself, such as Fig. 3, Plate LVIII /p. 1258/, in part to other things. Subsequent inquiries about their significance enabled me to obtain new insight into the religious views of the Gilyak. These idols and representations of various kinds are amulets intended to keep the various sicknesses away from man or, if they have attacked him, to remove them. Most of them are made with flexible joints and for that very reason are supposed to remove the stiffness or sickness of certain limbs (*).

* See Plates LIV /p. 1254/ and LV /p. 1255/.

For example, Figure 2, Plate LV /p. 1255/, with a jointed body, is intended for removing sicknesses of the back and body; the one with jointed legs (knees), ibid., Fig. 4, for healing sicknesses of these extremities. The large figure with jointed head, back, and legs, Fig. 1 on the same plate, the tschaltscha-tschngai, is made, as was mentioned above (), in connection with the birth of children and held in front of them so that, by looking at it, they may be spared ailments of the neck, body, or extremities. The small idol with a cut-out in the chest and jointed arms and back, Plate LV /p. 1255/, Fig. 3, is intended for curing ailments of the chest, coughing, etc., as well as ailments of the joints concerned.

 See p. 1046.

782 All these idols or amulets, the tschaltscha-tschngai not excepted, are fed with berries and other things in order to pacify their power or to win their favor, the wooden pieces bearing traces of this. These representations, however, are not worn around the neck, but are hung on the wall in the yurt.

708 532 51 Related to these idols are two amulets that have a similar purpose: they are the lalž and kissj (Plate LX /p. 1260/, Figs. 1 and 2). -- The former is an iron ring, open at one place, which is worn around the head to prevent headaches. The two opposing ends

708 532 825 755 /749 cont./

Idols and Amulets Combining Human and Animal Figures and Others

[195] 19. Gilyak. The belief in the transmigration of souls with reference to the bear may be the basis of a number of pictorial representations among the Gilyak -- amulets or small idol-images that are worn around the neck in case of sickness. Among them one finds double figures of a human being and bear. This is ordinarily a small piece of wood which at one end branches out into two parts, one representing a human head, the other a bear's [126] head. I acquired specimens of this type from Kalm and Allof. The former, in addition to the two representations mentioned, also has a human face on the single end (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 8), while the latter ends there without any carving. On both, however, the division of the points marked with human and bear heads continues for a while in the form of a groove which gradually tapers off at the single end. The Gilyak explained to me that this groove continues to separate the human half from the bear half until they merge. (Bm. II, p. 59.)

708 532 825 20. Gilyak. In the forest near the village of Chiare, not far from the place where corpses are buried, several idols of the Gilyak were placed under trees in the customary manner, that is, standing upright close to the foot of a tree and hidden with sticks and other pieces of wood (see Plate LXV /p.1265 /, left). For instance, there was the double figure of a tiger (att) and /750/ a human being, with the nose of the latter being represented by a bear (Plate LXVI /sic; see Plate LVI, /p. 1256/, Fig. 2). Another idol bore on a human body provided with movable arms and legs an att head with a four-toothed comb on it (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 2).

Finally I found here the representation of an animal 708 825 532 755 reminiscent of a crocodile or alligator. It was evidently an amphibian, and the wide snout was densely studded with teeth. The natives called it chaž, or, as an idol, chaž-kägn, but knew nothing about the animal which the figure represented, in that they had neither seen such an animal in the water or on land nor heard it mentioned in their traditions. They simply said that this

708 532 825 755 /750 cont./

figure was made in case of backaches, in order to rid oneself of the ailment (Plate LIX /p. 1259/, Fig. 9). (2 S.R. I, p. 15.)

21. Gilyak. In the village of Kalm I was able to buy [126] many idols, all different and some of them very interesting, for example, one idol of human shape with a bear's head (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 3). It was named for me as ogink, a designation that other idols in purely human shape also had. Another had the head of an owl (ki) on a human body (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 5); in the case of a third one the owl sat on the head of the human being (Plate LVI /p. 1256/, Fig. 4), several human figures had cavaties in the body to hold food.

One idol consisted of a block of wood with a human face and a row of prongs on top of the head, each of which was provided with a human face.

[126] I also bought here the bowl in which food served to the idols is put and which is called toll-ngir or kägn-ngir.

Then there were idols of the white whale (pōmi-tscho) with a human being on it (Plate LVI /p. 1256/, Fig. 5), as well as of the wolf, amulets with two heads, that is, of the bear and raven, etc., here.

In the village of Tschelmok many idols with zach wound around them and several clothed in bearskin stood on a shelf in the corner of a yurt. I acquired a small tiger-idol with a human [126] figure on top of it (Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 1), and furthermore an amulet with three idols, one of which represented a human being, the second a wolf, and the third another animal that could 708 415 532 not be named for me. Next to the idols there were a great many idol bowls, all of about the same shape with representations of various kinds, sometimes with a human face, sometimes with a toad, a lizard, and the like on them. These were all toll-ngir. Only one idol-bowl was completely different and consisted of two cups made out of a piece of birch bark and placed side by side in the form of an 8 (Plate LXI /p. 1261/, Fig. 1). This vessel [126] was called tschobrā and was used for the same purpose. No amount [784] of persuasion, however, helped in getting the woman who owned them to sell one or the other of these idol-bowls. She said that it was uitsch and would cause her death.

825 753 /754 cont./

sick and dies, if he does not use the proper means to free himself of the mipitsch. The only means that can help him, however, 755 is a shaman. He conjures up a kägn (a good god), who removes 756 the mipitsch from the sick person. At the same time a mipitsch 532 carved by the shaman himself or by someone else at the order of [187] the shaman is hung around the patient's neck and must be worn by the sick person from then on to protect himself in the future. A sick man wears a single mipitsch, a woman a double one. The mipitsch are always carved out of wood, especially the wap-322 mipitsch. It is only on the snout-band of the dead bear (see pp. 462 1156, 1162) that a single mipitsch of birch bark may be found. 824 This is made by the women, but the wooden ones are always made by the men, since wood carving of all kinds is an occupation for only the men, while the women are skilled at cutting arabesques and figures out of cloth and therefore also out of birch bark.

753 755 825 The ideas of the Gilyak concerning the lizard (mā(r)ngai) are similar to those concerning the toad and snake, except that much less power is attributed to it. It allegedly crawls into the head of the sleeping person and is removed in a way similar to the above by a shaman and by putting an iron amulet-ring (lalž) (1)

1. See Appendix 6 /p. 1196/.

around the head. This ring bears the representation of a lizard on either side, in the region of the temples; in front, closer to the forehead, there is a human figure on either side, supposedly indicating a man on one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at the very front, on the forehead, the lalž bears a frog shape. This is striking, since the frog (dhal) is not regarded as unlucky, is not magá. (Bm. II, pp. 44-46.)

756 554 30. Gilyak. Amazing, miraculous acts which the Gilyak shaman performs are chiefly the means by which he wins admiration and esteem among his countrymen. The more these acts deviate from the natural course of things, the greater is the reputation of the sorcerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

764 /770 cont./

the village. The raff, then, is a memorial erected for the deceased.

[178] The cremation site was very simply marked: the ashes scraped together, enclosed in an elongated frame formed by four boards set vertically, and this covered with boards; around the boards of the frame, however, little sticks with zach were placed (see Plate LXV /p. 1265/, to the right in the middle distance).

[784] There was no pittyssj in Kalm. I learned that such is set up for a deceased person only if no snow has yet fallen at the time of death; otherwise it would be uitsch to set up a pittyssj. (2 S.R. I, pp. 4-6.)

764 766 [195] 57. Gilyak. According to Surgin's report, not every deceased person is given a raff. If a very small infant dies, the corpse is not cremated, but simply wrapped and buried in the ground, and no raff is erected for it, for the soul of such a child does not wander, but goes to heaven. If larger children die, the corpses are cremated, and one raff is erected for two of them. Each adult gets a raff, men and women. The corpse of a person who has drowned is cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes; rather, a stick is stuck in the ground and a boat is placed next to it. If a Gilyak dies /771/ from being wounded by a bear the corpse is not cremated, but deposited in a structure which is especially erected out of beams crossing at the ends. Such a burial house is called tschchyf(*)-ngych and usually is located in

* Tschchyf--the bear.

[195] the forest where the deceased fell in the fight with the bear. The soul of such an unfortunate person does not go to heaven. The 764 burial house has a small opening through which all kinds of foods 262 are deposited for the deceased, such as berries, fish, groats, etc. 755 Inasmuch as these these articles lie next to the corpse, they acquire a strong curative power against various sicknesses, and ailing Gilyak customarily go to such a burial house and eat some of the food deposited there, which cures them at once. The [169] depositing of food in such a structure goes on for months and years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure

/771 cont./

000 years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure. The corpse 766 of a person killed by an att (tiger and leopard) is taken to a simi-
[262] lar burial house, supplied with food, and the latter is used as a
[755] remedy. (Bm. I, pp. 54-56.)

58. Gilyak. Between Hokk and Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I passed on the bank the tomb of a Gilyak who had met misfortune in the river. Here stood a small low house, in the manner of all Gilyak graves, surrounded by birch-bark baskets and bowls of various sizes, which were strung on the adjacent brush. This is the usual general custom of the Gilyak for designating the grave sites of persons and animals (bears, etc.). Next to the tomb lay a boat, probably the one in which the accident had occurred (). (1. S.R. I, p. 7.)

 Cf. Pl. LXVII /p.1267 /.

764 184 59. Gilyak. The inhabitants of the villages of Kuk, Hokk, and Tchilvi (on the right bank of the Amur) are said to inter their corpses, but the others, including those of Taur-wo and the villages up to Chiare (incl.), cremate them and erect raff for them. I personally saw many raff in Chiare. In the villages
[162] named, however, the population is in part Tungusic. (2 S.R.I, p. 8.)

60. Gilyak. Near My (on the Amur-Liman) I saw a fresh [778] Gilyak grave. The raff was not yet erected, the ashes (of the cremated corpse) were covered with boards set vertically and horizontally, and at each of their two ends there was wood shavings (zach). (2 W.R. II, p. 38).

766 61. Gilyak. If a Gilyak is murdered, his corpse is likewise
778 (like all others) cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes
532 in the forest; instead, a wagn is set up (). It is made out of a

 See Appendix 22 /p. 1206/.

tree trunk which is dug out of the soil with the roots. The various root-branches serve to represent the head, arms, and legs of the

G 778 532 755 G [844] [782]

Gi 778 532

1. Neck-idols of the Goldi. 2. Same of the Samagir. 3-7. Gilyak idols for certain conditions or illnesses.

778 755 532 789 856 532

1-4. Gilyak idols for various illnesses. 5. Gilyak amulet.

778 532 825

[755]

Gilyak idols made out of human and animal forms combine
1--human being and tiger; 2--human being with tiger head 3,4--human being with bear head; 5--human being with o head; 6--human back-joint with bear head and paw; 7,8-Gilyak amulets with human and bear heads; 9--similarly, bow with human head.

/75 cont./

755 It is evident from the following how realistic the 776 Gilyak's attitude toward the kekhn is. A large piece of new calico (por) is spread out on the floor of the yurt, inside before the threshold, and the kekhn will rest on it during the 755 seance. A bowl with sarana, sugar, the priest dish "mos'," a 776 potatoes, and other dainties to which the spirit-healer will be 787 treated in the intermissions of the kamlaniye are placed in a corner on a shelf. Over the bed of the sick man, a thong is hung in a circle, and a kettle with a nail in it is placed near the bed. The kekhn binds the sick man's soul which found its way into the milyvo (the settlement of the dead)and, clasping it under its arm, brings it back into the yurt, then throws it into the kettle, and fastens it with the nail. It must not be placed on the floor or on a plank bed, because it can run back through the floor.

755 /76/ The third method of curing is at a distance.
776 When a man suddenly falls sick at a place where there is no shaman or on the road, he goes outside at night when the shamans sleep, throws a sacrifice to the gods, and shouts with all his might; "Charmnay, nikhovlatyngra n'ronyuya," i.e., "Shaman! I am sick, help me!" The shaman is then supposed to begin the kamlaniye quickly and sends his kekhn, and the sick man not only hears the sounds of the tambourine, but in the gloom of night even sees the form of the spirit which has been sent. Upon returning to his village, the cured man will tell the shaman, with tender feelings and gratitude, the details of the wonderful night.

756 Although the shamans do not play as big a role among [191] the Gilyak as among the natives of the banks of the Amur River, the faith in their supernatural powers is boundless even here. I was often shown places from which shamans were lifted into the air like birds by the power of a spirit and flew up to attend to their affairs in the region of the sky dwellers.
I was no less frequently told of cases where a shaman resurrected the dead, killed at a distance, created trout, etc.
ooo Once I myself became the object of a legend about the

/305 cont./

84 mother has her own fire. After childbirth a woman washes herself for three days and then moves to her yurt, but for seven days she sits apart and eats from a separate kettle. For ten days after childbirth, it is not permissible to drink cold water or to eat raw fish, but if twins were born, then it is permissible. When a child is born, they bring in two sticks, put them into his hands and lift [155] him up. Similarly, sticks will be placed in the infant's hands when he falls ill, and he will be compelled to lift himself up (1).

[BM] 1. On another page of the same notebook,
we find the following notation: "These sticks kyz' nyngydz' (from kyz' -- risk, luck, and nynydz: -- to seek)," which probably refers to the above-mentioned sticks.

845 /306/ If two children were born, they make two pairs of prung, two kiong z'akh, two sticks made of rose-willow, cut as strips (pylng z'akh), two small bows (pudz:) and arrows of a special shape (m'erlan), and attachments for the cradle -- pitur'. When they prepare food, these trees -- ola' bitur' -- must be fed (settlement of Kal'ma).

855 While a child is growing up, his umbilical cord -- kylmyr
785 is kept at home, and then he himself must carry it into the forest [846] and hang it on a tree. O'ging chkhnaj is a figure that they make when a child is suddenly frightened during his sleep. The chkhnaj is the figure made when a person himself, without the shaman, does that which he dreams.

514 The child's excrement is poured out near a fir tree (both male and female); after being cut, hair is also thrown here (it is not permissible to cut the hair of twins). One must watch carefully to see that no female blood drops on the urine or the refuse, [824] for then the child is lost. The child will die if the tree growing [761] there is broken. This tree is called pila uigf, and the place is called ki markf -- literally -- "urine pouring out place."

/309 cont./

764 Two men, friends of the deceased, sit to watch, do not 776 move, do not speak, tie up all the dogs, and wait. In the yurt
784 a shaman shamanizes, calling on the sorcerer who drowned the 787 man to eat from the kinys n'ich: "Go eat human meat!" He rushes from beyond the mountains, from beyond the valleys.
Amid complete silence a wave splashes, a whirlwind rushes through,
a bird swims up, a black dog runs up. Suddenly the wave has approached the very cup; the deceased either moves, makes a sound, or sits up. Now it is necessary to pierce the deceased or (to hit?) the cup with a dolphin harpoon which has been in constant use, or a spear, and it feels as if the spear has struck into the man, and there are traces of blood on it. On the following day the sorcerer has a wound or a sickness from which he dies.
Then the dead man is buried, while the cup is kept for two summers and then thrown away. The cup may also be destroyed right away. They do not make it very pretty. Then they make real tolrfir and sacrifice from them down to the third generation.

756 Shamanistic kamlanie. Shamans are 1) toidokh urly cham; 787 2) pai'lokh urly cham; 3) kurdokh urly cham; 4) pang:at n'ryukh -- fortuneteller. At home a shaman directs his questions to a stone with a hole -- tolfang. If the stone immediately gives answers, it is thrown away. The shaman queries his pai'pang: a (a wooden figure which is bound with white drel', and with shavings on the neck; it is suspended on a string). The waving of the figure is an affirmative answer. If there is no pang, they tie tobacco wrapped in white drel' to the stone. It advises the shaman about medicines, indicates what sacrifices to give and [755] to which particular pai (i.e., pai of one's own or of a different clan), and so forth. It cannot drive away the evil spirit, but it can find out what spirit is there and also give indications with regard to stealing and fish. A man receives his pang also during sickness. He may even be a shaman, but frequently bad shamans steal (tempt away) their major kekhn from them. There are shamans 756 who have pang:kh, but not each one has them. There are 776 shamans who have kitus, something like an earthworm.

/310 cont./

755 Mainly it is necessary to treat leprosy -- khachudz, and skin diseases.

The treatment of a leper. The shaman asks that a dog be brought into the isba. The sick man sits up with his legs hanging from the plank bed to the floor. In front of him there is an iron kettle with the opening upward. The man holds the dog, while the shaman moves around the yurt and kamlaet (shamanizes);
then the shaman spits -- "emits the spirit," takes a small worm out of his mouth and carries it toward the dog. The dog jumps back -- it has been pricked. Then the angry worm is brought over to the sick man; the shaman stands opposite the sick man with the worm in his hands, and the head of the shaman turns into a large woodpecker -- ves'khr; -- black, with a red forehead -- and, squinting his eyes, he begins /311/ to look closely at the face of the sick man in order to determine where to peck a bald spot, i.e., to learn where the worm of the disease is (the shaman, having squinted his eyes, sees through the man, and the sick man sits "all naked"). The shaman finds a soft spot, pricks it with the worm, and pulls out of there another worm, which he throws into the kettle. He thus pulls out all the worms from the entire [761] body, leaving only one worm, samuir. Without a worm, a [825] person cannot live, but this worm cannot propagate. Those who have seen these worms in the kettle say that they look like tree worms. This kettle is covered with other kettles. At the same time he orders his kekhn to keep watch at night over the cup. On the following day he orders the Gilyak to bind the kettle tight with a kaluga net and to bury it in the ground, while he himself shamanizes. The shaman carries it away over five rivers and five ranges. He sings, so that the small mountains become large, and the streams -- large rivers. There he digs out a pit, where he places the kettles together and binds them.
Those who go must count five narrow valleys and five ranges.
And the shaman sings once again, so that the dried up little springs turn into large rivers, the rivers -- into cliffs, and the kaluga net -- into the dense

/321 cont./

776 upon himself. Ge-n'ivukh beats the seals. He is seen from a distance, but up close he disappears. He does not drive away sickness. In appearance he is "just like a Gilyak."

777 Talismans. Gibel'ka became rich in the following way: His eldest brother, Amgunka, found a piece of red material under a log in the taiga; from that time on he began to get rich. Gibel'ka stole this talisman from him, and then a chkhnaj fell from the sky, and he began to get even richer.

Tanu -- talisman -- is an object which falls to a lucky person (lyg narla n'ivukh) and which increases the number of things in his possession (for instance, two fur coats instead of one), such as: a May beetle, a piece of gold, a larch with fir cones, a climbing lizard, a worm.

Alekksy caught a goya with three worms adhering to it by suction, and after this there was a lucky catch of fish.

755 Father Konki is very old and by now remembers nothing. But on the basis of dreams he advises the sick -- to make chkhnaj, feed them, and carry them into the taiga.

In recent times he has not had visions and therefore thinks that he will soon die.

/322/

756 Shamanism. A kekhn answers the shaman's questions about sick-
776 ness and medication, but nobody hears his answers. The mightiest master is Tlykekhn (the spirit of the sky). He travels on foot through the sky and with a rope leads the shaman through the air wherever he wishes. The shaman does not take his kekhn along to Mlyvo (the world beyond the grave). The kekhn of Koynyt (1) comes to him only in a dream or during a seance. He sends him to various gods with tasks, for example, to learn what sacrifice to make. So far he has only pal-n'igyvyn (kekhn). His kekhn is small, with a human face and a body covered with hair.

[115] 1. The author's storyteller -- a youth who subsequently became a shaman. S. Sh.

/322 cont./

G 756 Chamkh, the father of Koynyt, my storyteller, was a 776 shaman in Ady-Tymi. He had four souls: one from Pal, another from Tol, a third from Tly, and a fourth from Mly-yz'n.

G 756 Shamans make chkhnaj (a wooden image of pal-n'igyvyn), 778 inspired during a seance, and feed them. The feeding consists 782 of giving sugar, saranka, and so forth, but they are eaten by the shaman; it only appears to those around as if he eats it, however, while it is eaten by the kekhn himself. The chkhnaj must be fed or else it will gnaw a person.

G 755 When one is dangerously ill, then the yurt begins to shake 776 and becomes full of openings and through the openings, like mosquitoes, many kekhn fly and shout: "Believe me, me!" And then the shaman falls down as if he were drunk. Then he eats marsh tea and drinks sea water -- he gives this to his kekhn. He swallows fire. Kekhn love songs.

G 755 If a person is near death and a milk has carried his soul to 756 Mlyvo, a kekhn kills him, and the shaman sets out for there for the 776 soul, and, if he succeeds in getting the soul, the sick man will 794 live. The kekhn shows the shaman the road (to Mlyvo). The shaman gets to Mlyvo directly through an apperture; the same earth as here, the same sky, and many villages are there. If the soul is outside, it can still be obtained; if it is in the yurt, all is lost. If the shaman himself enters the yurt, he will die. In Mlyvo the soul of the shaman is like a bird and flies around the subterranean world.

Parnkhasind (an Orok word) is done only by the Omyr, i.e., G' 755 by the Orok. They ask the chkhnaj whether the sick man will recuperate or not. If the chkhnaj rocks from side to side, he will recuperate; if not -- he will die. All this is done under the smoke of marsh tea. When the shaman beats his drum, the kekhn advises the making of chkhnaj, and if somebody's soul comes into it, then the sick man will live. If he will live, the chkhnaj is fed; then when in the shaman's opinion it is time /323/ to lose him, he comes and arranges for the milk to go from the sick man into the chkhnaj, and the sick man then recovers. (see "Fortunetelling with a Stone").

/324 cont./

●755 During the seance of the curing of a sick man, a looped thong -- ishyng -- is tied over his bed, and on the floor before him is placed a kettle (nich) with a nail (trofvar). With this thong the kekhn catches and ties up the sick man's soul in Mlyvo, places it under his arm, brings it to the yurt, sticks it in the kettle -- otherwise it will depart through the floor into Mlyvo-khuty -- and pierces it with the nail. The nail and the thong are taken by the shaman.

756 The kenchkh and shaman conjuring. The kenchkh helps the 783 shaman only in conjuring -- lemd; the shaman pierces his breast 776 with a knife, but in reality he pierces the kenchkh (chekokhin' pes'pind). They bind the shaman's hands behind him with a thong, and the kenchkh comes and unties it and throws the looped thong to its Gilyak owner. The shaman's robe, fully buttoned, slides off over his head and flies (sits on a plank bed).

The shaman puts a noose made out of a slender thong on his neck, and two men on each side pull the noose tight while he continues to sing songs. Finally the shaman's head falls to one side and his torso to the other. Then the Gilyak begin to tap, while one beats a tambourine. Finally, one hears stamping outside the door and in comes ken'chkh-yz'n in the shape of a large cow. He walks up to the big kettle, drinks up all the water, eats all the meat of the shaman, and new meat and a head grow. Then the soul of the shaman gets up on the crossbeam over the hearth and begins to sing Kyu-kyu songs. Then the head grows onto the body, and the shaman again comes back to life. In 1897 /325/
756 there were shamans in Pylvo--1, in Tekhrvo--1, in Tyrmych--2, in Chayvo--2, in Kekhrvo--2, in Ornyr--one female shaman, an old woman. The biggest shaman is the old man Kymysk in Tyrmych.

/336 cont./

854 A newborn baby is washed with his mother's milk for 15 days 1844 and then with cold water from the mouth. For the first year the whole body is washed twice a day, and then only the face.

854 Protecting the child. A stick on which the cradle is hung -- 789 ekhl-chugir(?). Sometimes a Japanese saber in birch bark is used instead of a stick for frightening away evil spirits. If a child dies, they preserve everything, along with the amulets, for the next child, whom they again serve; if another child is not born, they preserve them until their old age.

845 If a child dies during childbirth, the woman must not ride 784 along a stream or on the sea for a whole year; there would be no fish. Chkhnaj -- weapons, a little ax, a knife, a bow and arrows, 854 ●755 are hung over the child's bedding on both sides. Over the head of 789 a little girl's bed is hung a piece of fish net. All this is hung up at the first sickness of the child.

842 /337/ If a woman does not have children, the wife of her husband's brother gives her her belt (chik) and, secretly -- a piece of her husband's belt.

553 Names. Names are given after the grandfather, but if there are too many grandsons, a new name is thought up. One must not take names from an alien khal; otherwise one must give the latter the names from his own.

845 Twins. Twins -- tongch: -- ekhlang (tongch: means "twins" and [776] the god who gives birth to twins). Tongch: may be from Pal-n'igyvyn, i.e., the master of the forest, and Tol-n'igyvyn -- the master of the sea.

When twins are born, chukh-chugynd must be arranged for 845 Pal-n'ivukh: mos', saranka, puchka, rare fish, etc., in small 782 quantities; they first set them in place and then eat them themselves.

The place where the chukh-chugynd is made is called chauf. If twins die young, then they make chkhnaj -- two or one depending on how many died. A little balagan is made under the chkhnaj. Chukh-chgynd is made here also before setting out on a journey or a hunt, and also upon one's return and when the children are ill.

771 /741 cont./
174 tradition, reaching any pretensions of a religious one or completely 812 driving out and replacing that empty concept of God among the Gilyak.

I realized that the wooden idols of the Gilyak do not 778 actually enjoy any very great esteem or reverence among them
[124] from the fact that the Gilyak from Kulk from whose deserted yurt /742/ I had appropriated a collection of their idols in the summer of 1854, did not seem to notice the loss upon their arrival in the village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the same village I also once saw a small boy come out of the house playing with a wooden bear figure, a sign that these things were not as inaccessible to him as they certainly would be if they enjoyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

778
789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
532 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward off danger, misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated to me by the Gilyak with the general names of kägn and tschngai (1).

[199] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A crude representation of the whole human form (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig 1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the crossbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha 778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped säwa stand). Sometimes, however,
789 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
●755 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak 532 is seriously ill, the shaman carves such an idol for him, or advises him to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But [756]

778 /742 cont./
189 it is not the general custom to wear idols around the neck. Often
● 755 it is not exactly an idol, but some other kind of amulet, straps
532 knotted in a ball and the like, which is put around the sick man's neck on the advice of the shaman and worn even after recovery. Such an amulet is called ngif and kissj. From Judin in Tebach I [126] obtained an amulet in the form of a carved bow with a human face (see Plate LVII /p. 1257/, Fig. 9). (Bm. 1, pp. 57, 58.)

778 3. Gilyak. The village of Poghobi on the west coast of 755 Sakhalin. In one yurt I saw my host cut long curls of wood-shavings 184 on a stick. When these were quite voluminous, he cut off the whole bundle from the top of the stick and tied it together there. This zach was intended for a sick woman in the yurt, who had pains in her chest and sat there groaning and complaining. The zach was tied round her neck, and she tucked the ends carefully in her bosom, pressing them against her body. This was supposed to be a remedy. In fact, after she had received this medicine, the woman stopped groaning and behaved very calmly and quietly the rest of the time. Thus, in this case, as often happens, a superstition may have a curative effect. The zach is therefore still used on Sakhalin as an amulet /743/ against sickness and seems to take the place of the various forms of idols and similar figures which are used for similar purposes along the Amur and Liman. (2 W.R. I, p. 6.)

778 4. Gilyak. The idol in human shape illustrated on Plate 755 LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 4, was named for me by the Gilyak as myikr.
532 It is distinguished in shape by having only one arm; the other one was omitted intentionally. I was unable to learn what the circumstances were with regard to this representation. This idol, too, is carved by a shaman, or upon the advice of one, for warding off [126] sickness. I acquired it in the village of Kulk. In the same vil-
778 lage among the belongings of the Gilyak that had been put away
532 for the summer in a storage chamber, I found carved idols of another kind, but likewise of human shape. They were cylindrical pieces of wood, on one side of which was a crudely represented human face. The upper end of the wooden piece is conically pointed and bears a sort of cap of thin strands of bark, which hang

1--Gilyak idol-bowl; 2--shaman's belt (Gilyak); 3--altar for burning incense by the shaman (Gilyak); 4--shaman's performance before a sick woman (Gilyak).

9: Hawes--236 [2
116, 755, 776

"If a Gilyak is so arrives, followed b to show honour and sufficient for him t decides upon his m has been doing pric
the sick man, and about it, and ask h
before the evening,

o ill that all domestic resources fail, then the cham is sent for. He by one of the elder representatives of the hut, who has been told off l courtesy to the healer. An inspection of the patient is generally to determine whether the sufferer will recover or no; but before he easures, the cham tries to find out from the relatives what the patient or to his illness. Then he tells them that the evil spirit is angry with has sent this illness as a punishment; but he will speak to the spirit im how his anger may be appeased. Nothing, however, can be done , for the element in which the spirit lives is the night."

9: Hawes--236-237 T-3 (1901) 1903
16, 755, 776, 778

"[LSS: In the cure of illness by the medici appears, and drives out of the hut all unnece
his head a band of birch bark, with three litt
These, it is said, are to aid him in the expul but are more probably to inhance the myster then places in the corner of the hearth three tobacco, and roots; and close to these, two back to back; one having the face of a laughi woman. The ch'khnai are there to provide so he leaves the body of the sick man. Note her ch'khnai that the image of the weeping woma evil spirit, summoned from the body of the p cies, naturally enters into the image so plac himself kind-hearted and weak as a weeping and takes refuge in the other image; where h man, especially when the cham draws near The evil and good spirits finding themselv there is never any doubt of the result, for vi spirit. Then commence negotiations between or what offering he will accept to keep away f

ne man] When the sun has set, the cham ssary persons, and proceeds to place upon le rustling rosettes of papery bark lining.
sion of the evil spirit from the sick one;
y [237] and authority of the exorcist. He little bowls, containing respectively fish, wooden images, ch'khnai, bound together ng man, and the other that of a weeping omething for the evil spirit to enter, when e how clever the cham is. He so places the n faces the cups containing the food; and the patient by exorcism and attracted by delicaed; and, having taken this form, will be woman. The good spirit is then exorcised, e becomes jolly and strong as a laughing
r to him one of the bowls of food.
es in close proximity, begin to fight; but ctory must be to the stronger—the good the cham and the evil spirit as to how much rom the sick man."

: Hawes--238 1-3 (1901) 1903

16, 535, 578, 755, 776, 782

"[LSS: During a cure by a medicine man] The ey oams at the mouth, and sings the orders of the evi

'Take two great dogs,
One black,
The other white;
Kill these two offerings
There,
Where is kept the bear;
That will make the sick man wel

The first syllable in each line is articulated quic slowly, merging into a howl. (1)

1. Each line in the Gilyak original is made to e

If the cham is angry with the sick man, or has a he may ruin the whole family by his interpretation
o bring all their dogs and everything that they valu imes human offerings were demanded."

es of the cham are like flames; he l spirit—

l.'
kly, and the last vowels in the line

nd in a—aa.

ay spite against him or his relatives, of the spirit's demands, forcing them e most. It is even said that in olden

116, 755, 776, 782

"On the following day, the head of the hut takes possible to the village appointed where the bear i There he kills the dogs near the cage of the bear, them in the forest to the east, and sings, 'Make s well.' The offering is made near the bear becaus bear, and therefore is to be found near at hand.

The cham having been liberally rewarded for h

One old Gilyak in reply to my question as to wh with stoical submissiveness, 'We make offerings but if the spirit does not restore it, it is well als

the offerings, and goes as quickly as s, even if it be a hundred miles away.
takes out the heart and liver and casts so that the sick man may [239] be quite e the evil spirit is a great friend of the is pains, the matter is ended.

at happened if the patient died, said,
, and if the child recovers, it is well;
o.' "

771 More frequently one finds those who recognize a supreme being and immortality, but do not bother much about them. Some do not even believe in the idols, and these may already reflect the opinions of those of other beliefs. Thus the little village of Kula near Nikolayevsk has for some time already had neither idols nor shamans. I was visited by two brothers who were born there and who were both wide-awake and good-natured chaps; they confessed to me that they believe in god, but regard the idols as foolishness.

756 The shamans are the mediators between the visible and 789 invisible world; they always excel in experience and 782 perspicacity, whereby they know how to predict many things, for instance, changes in the weather, and thus they exert their influence. Their chief function consists of driving out sickness which is mainly the work of evil spirits. Incidentally they are [243] also consulted on other occasions. For instance, there may be few fish at one place or another; the shaman is consulted and orders a dog of such and such color to be killed and offered up in the river at the designated place. The sacrificial gifts are generally made according to the shaman's prescriptions. A competent shaman knows how to "drive away the rain" by threatening the clouds and denouncing them loudly. Likewise, of course, he understands how to make rain and thunderstorms. "As soon as he begins his magic song, rain clouds immediately appear", a Gilyak believer told me. His magic practices can also bring harm. For instance, he can cause a human somewhere far off in some village to die of a fish or a drink which does not harm others. He can flood a village, and so forth. Occasionally the magic practices are feared, but the magician is never persecuted. However, the shamans are usually merciful enough to stick to threats only. If someone irritates them; and besides, not everybody believes in them.

● 755 If a shaman is invited to visit a sick person he appears
534 in his official costume. He wears a girdle on which hang numerous clinking tin objects. In his hand he carries his drum and his staff. The drum is about two-thirds meters long and consists of a wooden ring on which is stretched a pig skin or the skin of a stag, and on which hang a number of little bells. He alternately beats his drum and sings

● 755 softly or whispers magic formulas, walks back and forth
534 like a pendulum, far into the night. Sometimes he leaps over a burning pile of wood, or he makes the sick person 755 run about if he is able. Some shamans impress their public 786 with more difficult tricks. They appear laden with chains, 778 whirl about like mad, and in a state of ecstasy may hurl themselves into the fire and make believe it does them no harm. Narcotic drinks are not given, but the sick person sometimes gets certain herb infusions from which the shamans expect healing effects. The magic feats are corroborated with various prescriptions relative to the spirits. For instance, an idol in the shape of a human being is placed next to the sick person, its face smeared with cranberry juice, and the sick person himself has wood chips hung around his neck, etc. Or the shaman orders that the clothes of the sick person be hung out in the woods and that he be [244] dressed in others. This is done in order to outwit the kobold who saw him only in his old clothes.

755 This medical magic is usually begun in the evening, at 789 twilight, when the imagination is more active and also when deception can be more easily concealed. The shamans also seek to consolidate their authority by means of various magic tricks that otherwise have no practical meaning. For instance, they swallow knives and needles. Not long ago there lived a celebrated magician near Sofiyskoye who gouged out his eyes and thrust a knife into his belly, which was afterwards excreted. He was later exposed in these juggling tricks by an itinerant Russian merchant. It was shown that the knife blade, instead of penetrating his belly, disappeared into his pants and passed into a receptacle. After that the magician was completely discredited.

789 Finally, there are a few superstitious practices we must 372 mention. If a Gilyak goes on a journey he must drink some 271 water in the yurt shortly before he leaves; he does the same thing as soon as he has returned. The hearth fire is also to a certain extent sacred for the Gilyak; it is not carried outside and the Gilyak do not like to have a traveler light his cigar at it and then leave the house.

177 This chapter is also the place to say a few words about the 797 baptized Gilyak. There are not many of them, but no one knows exactly how many, first of all because many of these "Christians" let themselves be baptized several times, in the city, for instance, as well as by their village divine. From this we may see how much they really understand of their new religion. We have said before that they regard

164 also seems to me that the almost exclusive fish diet is a contributory factor. At any rate, I knew people who had a skin itch after eating fish, which, to a certain extent, points to its etiological significance.

Lithiasis does not occur among the Gilyak or the Russians of the Amur, and this may be partly explained by the softness of the water.

Goiter is also unknown. The only case I saw there, was that of a woman who had come from Irkutsk.

● 755 The treatment of disease is of course very rudimentary. They expect the most from the magic tricks of the shamans, since usually black magic is part of the game. The natural healing agencies over which the shaman commands are very few in number and are carefully guarded.

752 Sprains are usually set by stretching. In cases of breaks, splints are used. Wounds are frequently left quite open and washed only with water. In cases of suppuration bits of agaric [Lärchenpilz] are sometimes put in the wound.

757 Frozen limbs are wrapped in oiled or clean cotton. In cases of chronic stomach and intestinal catarrh, bitter herbs, especially wormwood, are used as infusions. In cases of violent attacks of colic which occur with this illness the Gilyak sometimes set Moxa of burning sponge. Rheumatics bathe in the warm springs near the village of Mikhil, and these actually prove to be very helpful. (1) In bad

1. They have a temperature of 24 to 36 degrees Reaumur and belong to the indifferent thermal waters.

epidemics of measles, etc., the Gilyak sometimes separate into groups of families and go into the taiga.

The natives generally do not like to undergo treatment. They suffer patiently and call the shaman only in extreme cases. They very seldom turn to Russian physicians, but they regard them also as shamans, but wiser than the native ones.

231 Of diseases occuring among their sole domestic animal, the dog, I can mention only epidemic colds which sometimes wreak havoc. As for rabies, [251] not a single case has occurred up to now in the coastal region, which may be related to the fact that among natives as well as among many Russians, dogs are systematically kept for work, that is, for draft purposes.

756

756 PSYCHOTHERAPISTS--prevalent types of psychotherapists (e.g., shamans, faith healers, psychoanalysts, clinical psychologists); physical, mental, and social characteristics; source of power (e.g., inheritance, spirit helpers, specialized knowledge); training and initiation; prerogatives and disabilities; special paraphernalia and behavior; source of support (e.g., gifts, fees); penalties for failure; relations between practitioners (e.g., rivalry, organization); shamanism as a religious complex; special organizations (e.g., medicine societies, psychoanalytic societies); etc. See also:

Sorcery 784
Familiar spirits 786
Revelation and divination 787
Nondrugpsychotic functions of psychotherapists . . 789
Magicians and diviners 791
Transvestitism 838

/xxix cont./

000 to it. In spite of the fact, however, that the material presented by
* 114 Shternberg convincingly testifies to the rudiments of class differentia-
565 tion among the Gilyak, he did not discover this, because he looked through the spectacles of the Populists and saw in the appearance of class differentiation the manifestation, not of the immanent economic laws of every society, but merely the effect on the Gilyak of their neighbors -- the Russians.

* 114 A significant part of the monograph is devoted to the re-
597 ligion of the Gilyak. /xxx/ Here the conceptions of Shternberg
614 about the masters, first stated by him in "Sakhalinskie giliaki," are unwound in all their breadth. "Each element has its 'master'
[676] who is a 'god,' but, just as in each clan there are outstanding persons, wealthy men, of whom one is the richest ('the master,' according to the everyday terminology of the Gilyak), so are there 'masters' among the spirits, who, according to the beliefs of the Gilyak, also live in clans. With this concept Shternberg stresses the reflection of the social structure in the religious views. The views of Shternberg on the relationship of totemism to clan society also deserves attention. According to Shternberg, "... it was not totemism, i.e., not belief in descent from one or another form of animal, that created the clan gods, which is the accepted way of thinking, but the other way around: the clan gods created totemism.
[262] One cannot explain the interdictions among the totemists against using the meat of totems in their food by anything except a fear of killing some kind of clansman turned into a totem animal."

* 114 Shternberg contests the opinion that fear created god and [677] advances his own understanding that the cult of a number of ani-
[825] mals (e.g., the bear and swallow) is caused by their seemingly protective relationship to man.

● [956] In "Giliaki" Shternberg also, for the first time, formed his opinion that the shaman is divinely selected.

* 114 "Obraztsy materialof po izucheniiu giliatskogo yazyka i 197 fol'klora" and Materialy po izucheniiu giliatskogo iazyka i fol'klora constitute the second group of Shternberg's works on the study of the Gilyak; included here also is the summary of a paper at the Fourteenth Congress of Americanists in Stuttgart, "Bemerkungen

/69 cont./

796 accident that the death of a relative, i.e., the fact of the 825 extraordinarily malicious designs of an evil spirit, forces him to catch or buy a bear cub, whatever the cost. That a bear
[789] by its mere presence drives away evil spirits may be seen
755 from the single fact that during the bear festival the shaman
• [756] is forbidden to consult in his dreams his kekhn (see below) about curing a sick man, i.e., driving out the evil spirits residing in him, for the bear will be offended; he himself can drive them away with his own strength. Analogies to
[171] such beliefs in the purifying influence of the bear and of many other animals are to be found in vestiges of our own survivals and ceremonies. As is well known, in Little Russia /Ukraine/ there existed the custom of leading a bear through the village on certain holidays for purification... In our grand stables the custom of keeping goats, who are supposed to protect the horses and the grooms from evil power, has
[614] been preserved up to the present. And so, similarly, the clan that feeds a bear performs an important social function, securing all their own against the evil designs of their strongest, though invisible enemies. Unique religious sanitation, but the only kind available to primitive man!

Let us consider the meaning of those ceremonies that accompany every case of bear killing. First of all we should say that the Gilyak does not consider the killing of a bear a sin. In spite of all his respect for it, he is convinced that in the first place those bears that fall prey to him are sent to him by the "master" of the taiga, for whom the bears play the same role that dogs do for the Gilyak. "The bear is the dog of the master of the mountain," such is the formula of the [774] Gilyak. In addition, the bear loses nothing by its violent death, for death to it is only leaving its body to the Gilyak, while its soul -- that living duplicate -- then gaily runs to its master as if nothing had happened. Therefore no expiation whatever is required here. But the bear, even though only the dog of a forest man, is nevertheless a creature of a higher order, of a higher rank, than man. From the point of view of primitive man, there is nothing derogatory to the sacred

/74 cont./

755 the disgusting bitter root of that plant, eats hot coal, etc. Even such strong measures, however, do not always prove effective. Sometimes the evil spirit does not give in to any human terrorizing, and not only that, but sometimes he even carries off the soul of the sick man into the kingdom of the shades. Then the aid of the higher beings is indispensable.

• [756] Such aid can be proffered only by specially chosen men, by specialists-expellers, i.e., shamans.

756 Among the Gilyak, shamans do not constitute a class, 776 as among more cultured barbarians. Among the Gilyak, the shamans are chosen ones, who in night visions or in a trance receive a revelation from the god-protector about their high calling. From that moment the shaman has gods-assistants, executors of his commands. These gods-assistants are of two kinds: the kekhn and the kenchkh. The first perform his most important tasks. By force or trick it is they who pull the devil [774] out of the organism of a sick man. They also carry the shaman's soul in search of the stolen soul of a sick man, making their way with it even into the kingdom of the shades. As for the assistants, they are happy spirits who play with the shaman and help him only in tricks. The kekhn are creatures of the most varied breeds: there are kekhn-wolves, eared seals, eagle owls, reindeer, hares, celestial creatures, etc. Each kekhn has his master, who himself personally, very rarely comes to assist, sending his subordinates. The kekhn are capable of assuming any form and consequently can go anywhere necessary to save the sick man.

755 The shamans have three main methods of curing. One consists of hearing the patient out, falling asleep, and then, combining the dreams he has had, giving this or that advice. Having, for instance, seen a skewbald dog in his dream, he decides that for a cure it is necessary to sacrifice a dog, etc. Another method is the ordinary method of kamlaniye normally described by ethnographers, namely, expelling the devil by means of frenzied shrieks, beating the tambourine, in a word -- [776] terror. Since, however, you frequently can do nothing with

/75 cont./

755 It is evident from the following how realistic the 776 Gilyak's attitude toward the kekhn is. A large piece of new calico (por) is spread out on the floor of the yurt, inside before the threshold, and the kekhn will rest on it during the seance. A bowl with sarana, sugar, the prized dish "mos'," potatoes, and other dainties to which the spirit-healer will be treated in the intermissions of the kamlaniye are placed in a corner on a shelf. Over the bed of the sick man, a thong is hung in a circle, and a kettle with a nail in it is placed near the bed. The kekhn binds the sick man's soul which found its way into the mlyvo (the settlement of the dead)and, clasping it under its arm, brings it back into the yurt, then throws it into the kettle, and fastens it with the nail. It must not be placed on the floor or on a plank bed, because it can run back through the floor.

/76/ The third method of curing is at a distance.
755 When a man suddenly falls sick at a place where there is no shaman or on the road, he goes outside at night when the shamans sleep, throws a sacrifice to the gods, and shouts with all his might: "Chamnay, nikhovlatyngra n'ronyuya," i.e., "Shaman! I am sick, help me!" The shaman is then supposed to begin the kamlaniye quickly and sends his kekhn, and the sick man not only hears the sounds of the tambourine, but in the gloom of night even sees the form of the spirit which has been sent. Upon returning to his village, the cured man will tell the shaman, with tender feelings and gratitude, the details of the wonderful night.

• 756 Although the shamans do not play as big a role among [171] the Gilyak as among the natives of the banks of the Amur River, the faith in their supernatural powers is boundless even here. I was often shown places from which shamans were lifted into the air like birds by the power of a spirit and flew up to attend to their affairs in the region of the sky dwellers. I was no less frequently told of cases where a shaman resurrected the dead, killed at a distance, created trout, etc.

ooo Once I myself became the object of a legend about the

• 756 /76 cont./ Once I myself became the object of a legend about the 123 omnipotence of a shaman. In the settlement Nyyvo, at the mouth of the Tym', I once ventured to offer medical help to a female patient of a famous shaman. Learning of my interference, the shaman not only prohibited taking my medicine, but decided to punish me severely for my insolence. Immediately after my departure he went fully dressed into the waters of the bay and began to adjure the god of the water to fall on me with all sorts of punishments. A day later I had to spend the night in an abandoned Orok shed on the lower shore of Nabil' Bay. At night there arose a strong wind accompanied by a most terrible downpour; the water began to spread beyond the shores of the bay and to flood the low area. We awoke at dawn, literally swimming on our bedding. It was necessary to build a platform and shiver with cold on it for many hours until the water receded. For all the Gilyak on the coast there was no doubt that I had borne the punishment sent down by the shaman, who, moreover, could have been much sterner, but this time spared the Russian "tyan'gi" (gentleman). It is remarkable that the death of my female patient, even though she had refused to take the medicine I had left, was charged, not to the shaman, but to her sacrilegious appeal to me for help.

177 The Gilyak, however, willingly and with full faith, are treated by the Russians, not, of course, because they believe in the power of science, but for completely peculiar reasons. "The Russian god," they reason, "is stronger than the Gilyak one; this means that the Russian shaman is stronger than the Gilyak one." /77/ And if you inquire why the Russian god is stronger than the Gilyak one, you might hear such an answer: "Behold how many centuries the Gilyak has been living here, and he still travels on paths, but the Russian arrived and immediately built wide roads, such roads as the Gilyak has never seen." It is curious that neither steamboats nor automobiles, nothing impresses the Gilyak and convinces him of the superiority of the Russian god over the Gilyak one as much as just these roads.

/77 cont./

• 756 Now a few more words concerning the nature and psychics of these strange people called shamans.

According to the views of the Gilyak, the shamans are chosen beings. Do not be a shaman! The talent of a shaman is not a gift, but a burden. In order to become a shaman, it is necessary to be liked by a kekhn, or to recei such a kekhn from one's father or uncle. Turning into a shaman constitutes a turning point in the life of the chosen one, a crisis accompanied by very complex psychological phenomena.

One shaman with whom I was acquainted told me t before he became a shaman he was sick for more than two months, during which he lay motionless on his back in con plete unconsciousness. No sooner would he awaken from o paroxysm than he would fall into another. "I would have died," he told me, "if I had not become a shaman!" Dur [789] ing these months of trial he dried up like a stick. At nigh he began to dream that he sang shaman songs. Once a whi eagle-owl appeared to him and stood near him, quite clos while a little farther away stood a man who said to him: "Make yourself a tambourine and everything that a shaman should have, and sing songs. If you are a simple man, no ing will come of you, but if you are a shaman, you will b real shaman." He slept for a long time, how long -- he d not know, but when he woke up, he saw that he was held d a fire by the feet and by the head; the people around him thought that he had been killed by the kekhn. Then he co manded that he be given a tambourine and began to sing s He felt not quite drunk, not quite dead. Then he first saw his kekhn and kenchkh, and the former said to him: "If yo see a sick man, cure him; do not believe the kenchkh, he has a human face, but the body of a bird; believe only us.

I myself was once a witness to the first appearance such a paroxym. A Gilyak boy by the name of Koynyt, twelve years old, the son of a shaman, my guest, fell asle after dinner, and, accidentally awakened by my comrad, the boy began to thrash furiously and to shout, repeating a

116, 755, 786

"During all these exorcisms and negotiati illness] the hut has been the scene of an awe lay on the nakh, or bench, the cham has bee cha, a fish-skin tambourine, uttering all ma wild gyrations in order to prevent the escap time of the combat of the good and evil spiri and when negotiations commence, the cham begun in almost a whisper, and to the slowimprovises his prayers, conforming [238] th working himself into an ecstasy, he babbles
From the great strain his voice sometimes amazing dexterity whirls around in the semi ground as his wild circlings in the air incre ings to his wild springings. Black shadows f quicker and quicker grow the wild howls and the spectators sink with fright, and even the voluntarily bewitched."

ons [LSS: by the medicine man while curing -inspiring spectacle. While the sick man n whirling round the hut, beating the kos-anner of strange sounds, and quickening his e of the evil spirit from his reach. By the ts, the wild dance has reached its climax; is in an ecstatic state. His exorcisms are measured strokes of the tambourine. He hem to the circumstances; and by degrees with hoarse voice, howls, and even shrieks.
cracks; but he draws off attention, and with -darkness, his feet appearing to leave the ase and the flames leap in answering flickeritfully race over the walls of the hut, and the thuds of the tambourine. The hearts of most sceptical of the Gilyaks is in-the future and all the feminist desires of the shaman. When the pancytum was over, the face of the poor boy was terribly exhausted /

/77 conf. /

/323 cont./

When shamans fight, the one who has more souls wins. The killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition of the kehlm of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (Pal) to these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tol-kehlm. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kehlm. The shaman kehlm fears only Pal milk and Tol milk but not the milk of tabbit, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kehlm there are variously colored eared seals, not trout, and tigers.

How the shaman Chomka resurrected a woman (the settlement of Ilyinovtsy). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night if before morning the moved her left little finger, she will live." That is what happened.

The shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman. She also kills her shaman competitor, sending her kehlm to his or her competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shanki-chohh. A feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person water and cry. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local ataxia.

The kanilange of a female shaman, who, according to her own words, was emasculated (mad) after the birth of her first daughter. She first made ifau and then rubbed her face, breast, and so forth with marsh ma, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her handkerchiefs... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings, she yawned. Moderate blows... The smoke grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She began to walk around. She sat down. She became blind, saw nothing. The milk drank ten cups of horrible liquid. Clink, clink /as in touching glasses!/ She drank it down in a gulp... then demanded a pipe and began to smoke and to exhale the smoke through her nose. She then (said): "Kymuta" -- I am hungry! And she began to eat saranka. Then they gave her sake -- she drank it. "Heavy (to lift the tambourine)!" The milk did this. She demanded my cigarette. "Give tobacco to the spirit," and ordered some distributed to everybody to smoke. She beat her breast, while a maiden beat the tambourine. Then she said: "Make a fire!" She sat down /?/ then rose suddenly, began to dance, and ran through the door, but the wet caught. The cold of the forest shamans. "People assembled to listen. There is no danger whatsoever. I cannot speak of various things. Naked people (i.e., not laimah), a misfortune, cannot say anything. I hear the talk of the wife, I hear the talk of the husband, I hear the talk of the sky, and I hear the talk of the sea fish. I hear the talk of the fish all sides. Everybody listen only to me. everything was born from Pal, born from the middle of the existing mountains. They call (me) Pontyst. The name of my husband is Kabaiya. The shaman given by my husband -- They call me Vee'tyk. I am an old woman. Smoke tobacco, all you (who are sitting) in the yurt! Small and large, all smoke with my risk! I am not afraid of any devil (!)" I am a mother-in-law to all of you.

/324 cont./

1. Here there is evidently an omission in the notes. S. Sh.

I am the only big old man (?). Yellow-copper squirrel, come my way! (When you stared from the sea) to his grate house (in down to rest. When he ascended from there, cannibals were located before eight bear cages at the edge of an opening through which they pulls a trough, rail.

/324 cont./

During the season of the curing of a sick man, a looped thong -- nhyng -- is tied over his bed, and on the floor before him is placed a bottle (nin) with a nail (nedvyn). With the thong the kehlm catches and ties up the sick man's soul in Mlyvo, places it under his arm, brings it to the yurt, sticks it in the bottle -- nin; after this it will depart through the floor into Mlyvo-hluty -- and pierces it with the nail. The nail and the thong are taken by the shaman.

The kenshih and shaman conjuring. The kenchlah helps the shaman only in conjuring -- lemd; the shaman pierces his breast with a knife, but in reality he pierces the kenchlah (chekshih-ne'lgnd). They bind the shaman's hands behind him with a thong, and the kenchlah comes and unties it and throws the looped thong to its Gilyak owner. The shaman's robe, fully buttoned, slides off over his head and falls (sits on a plank bed).

The shaman puts a noose made out of a slender thong on his neck, and two men on each side pull the noose tight while he continues to sing songs. Finally the shaman's head falls to one side and his torso to the other. Then the Gilyak begin to tap, while one beats a tambourine. Finally, one bears stamping outside the door and he comes kenchlah-yr'h in the shape of a large cow. He walks up to the big kettle, drinks up all the water, eats all the meat of the shaman, and new meat and a head grow. Then the soul of the shaman gets up on the cromberm over the hearth and begins to sing Kyu-kyu songs. Then the head grows onto the body, and the shaman again comes back to life. In 1897 /?/ there were shamans in Pylvo--1, in Ekhkrvo--1, in Tymyych--2, in Chayvo--2, in Kekhrvo--2, in Onyr--one female shaman, an old woman. The biggest shaman is the old man Kymyk in Tymyych.

The kenchlah is a bird which comes on the wind. They pull up a thong (nhyng) to the kenchlah during the song. The thong is attached to a rope, and the kenchlah seizes it and pulls over the people.

/340 cont./

the corpses boiled the grandchildren, ate them, ran into the taiga, and disappeared.

Chnyr-chhinka. If a loss has occurred, they make chnyr-chhinka, a figure of grass, and beat it (thresh it); if the chhinka is good, the lost thing will be found on the following day. If it is not known what milk caused the harm, chnyr-chhinka is hung up over the plank bed and fed.

For stealing bear meat or a fishing rod, the face is maimed.

Kleptomania. There are thieves-kleptomaniacs, for example, Sennuh from Ady-Tymu. After his brothers threatened to kill him, he ran away to /?/ Ilmgut. Then he and his wife continued doing the same. He has one soul -- a rat sitting in his belly. The things that tempt him shine in the dark for him. The Gilyak confined themselves to depriving him of the things.

The shaman Kymyt's father, from Tro, once noticed that his tronchyn had disappeared. He began to shamanize, found a rat in the belly of a woman, killed it, and on the following day the woman died.

Over an insult it is necessary to fight with sticks (chhkarkivand), or pay tshinand, or take something by force. Frequently they kill over an insult.

Fortunetelling with a stone parakhanind, with a kettle. The gamakhanind replies thanks to the chehlm, if the kettle swings straight, one has hit the mark; if to the side -- one has not hit it. If one hit the mark, he must make a wooden chhinai, hang it around his neck, and feed him.

/367 cont./

suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy. Shamanism, with its ecstasy, seems to me to be a borrowed phenomenon. It does not fit in with the religious beliefs of the Gilyak. It is true that he believes the shaman, trains him to cure the sick, superstitiously fears him, believes in his predictions and in the power of his magic, believes, for instance, that the shaman can kill any man no matter how far away from him this last may be (this they say that the Kyrvo shaman killed the Bibolayevsk one by shooting a bird that was flying past); shamanism, however, is not typical of religious beliefs of the Gilyak view-s. It is perhaps appropriate at this point that shamans do a great deal of harm to their worshipers. In the case of the unsuccessful outcome of their treatments, they often have to pay a fine some quite considerable, or they subject to physical violence and to cruel persecutions if the patient dies. Also, by suggesting to their patients that their illnesses is the work of evil spirits, they make them more superstitious and fearful of the spirits, which certainly does not strengthen their health. The prayers of the Gilyak are quite characteristic, simple and clear like their beliefs. They are "Kymyt'h! Kymyt'h! Ch, Ch, Ch, pasnayr; the Gilyak limits himself to this when he asks for something from his god.

The Gilyak have a hazy conception, or better a feeling, about a supreme being, the father of all things, the creator, the standing close to him is just a vague feeling for which he does not have a clear formulation. The gods have a relation, not only to the material life of man, but also to his moral life. Many of the gods facilitate mutual living, helping one's neighbors, and respect for the life and property of another enjoy divine sanction. Violating them leads to punishment in this life, particularly, perhaps, and also in the future life. I happened to hear such a statement from a Gilyak: "If a man steals a poor man, it is a great sin, but if a good man steals a rich man (in this material sense), if he borrows and does not repay, deceives him, etc., that is not a sin." This statement reminded all the strangers me, because the Gilyak who made it was a very rich man himself, a big kulak, was did not hesitate to oppress the poor in any way. I do not venture to judge how much this statement accurately expresses belief in a really the belief of the Gilyak, or whether it is the result of Russian influence and other mythology and a rule when an old she-bear with its one or two-year-old cubs is found in a lair. In this case, the all too dangerous hunt to capture the old animal is usually not even undertaken, but rather it is enough to mark it at once, and only the cubs are captured and led into captivity. The bears killed in the wilderness in this or some other way are, to be sure, likewise eaten by the Gilyak, /?/ but, as far as I know, without special festivities, and this is not merely because the procedures, so very essential in this connection, which are conducted with the imprisoned bear, must naturally be omitted, but rather perhaps also because the slain bear does not by far have the tastiness for a Gilyak palate and does not have the thick layer of fat of the animal kept imprisoned because of the cubs and fattened on a fish diet. Along the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk Middendorff (1

/362 cont./

1. Reise, etc., Vol. IV, p. 1381

learned of another method of the Gilyak for capturing bears alive, which, however, could rarely occur in the Amur region and on Sakhalin, with different natural conditions. It consists in putting, at places where deeply cut game-trails lead down from the heights of the steep coast to the sea and between two standing close to each other, on the latter large trap-noses, in which the bear, since it does not find another path either to the right or left, must inevitably be caught. I do not know such localities in the Amur region, and, accordingly, I have never heard of such a method of catching bears there.

Of the fight with inscectsfly and ticks are certainly associated with the hunting of bears among the Gilyak, and their observance is considered necessary in order to undergo the danger of the fight with successfully and to master the mighty animal unharmed, but to be able to escape the revenge of its mates in case of its death. But I cannot agree at all with the statement by Nobomov that "lively songs" are first delivered by a few Gilyak to the bear tracked down in its lair, which are still completely intact and evidently had not been brought in from a trap. As I was looking at the animal, the wife of the about [illegible] entered, obviously distressed because I had seen the

/363 cont./

it to come out from its hiding place (?). For the shamans among

2. Arch. Nordmann, "Ueber den Fischfang und die Jagd der am Amur wohnenden Gilyaken /On the Fishing and Hunting of the Gilyak Living on the Amur/ (Bull. de la Soc. Imp. des Natur. de Moscou, 1861, Vol. XXXIV, Sec. Part, p. 281).

the Gilyak, quite apart from the character ascribed here to their songs, which in reality never at any time belonged to them, have nothing whatever to do with hunting, either the bears or for other animals. They never interfere with the pursuits of the practical life, fishing, hunting, trading, of this supernatural, to be sure, but rigorous and enterprising people. Indeed, on the contrary, as shall see in the following, practice their arts on entirely different occasions. The Gilyak, by the way, do not regard the capture of a bear as an offense perpetrated against it, because through this it is introduced to a life with abundant food, a good home, and many marks of respect. The spirits of revenge can be around only by death and being eaten, and therefore the bear festival, leading to this outcome, are surrounded by a number of rules of behavior dictated by superstition, whose observance is supposed to ward off misfortune. The other animals are given less consideration, but even with regard to them there are many rules that are not to be neglected without causing future mishaps in connection with the hunting concerned, and, along with this, depending on the kind of animal involved, more or less grievous injury to the people. /?/ For example, I by accident came across the following superstition concerning the hunting of sables. When I entered the yurt of Mlawach on the lower Tymy on Sakhalin, I saw a table hanging from the wall beam, which was still completely intact and evidently had not been brought in from a trap. As I was looking at the animal, the wife of the about [illegible] entered, obviously distressed because I had seen the

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

9: Hawes--199 T-3 (1

116, 178, 184, 527, 756

"Customs differ from coast to coast divergence. In many cases I believe officiate [LSS: At the sacrifice of th influence of his office is on the wane cham now.' "

t, and from village to village, and here is a point of the cham, or medicine-man, is not called in to he bear during the bear fête] possibly because the e, and as the Tro Gilyaks told me 'we have no great

CONTINUED FROM PREC. FICHE

/642 cont./

553 Immediately, or at least very soon after its birth, the child 554 is given a name, usually toward evening of the same day or in the 555 morning of the following day, depending on whether it was born 556 in the daytime or during the night. This takes place without any 557 ceremony; the mother whispers the name desired by her son in 558 the mother, or /643/ a Gilyak who happens to be present may 559 propose a name, and the father approves it and adopts it for his 560 child. It must be also pointed out that no shamanistic arts are 561 practiced either in connection with the birth or the name-giving.
562 In most cases the birth of a child is not the occasion for a special 563 celebration. Well-to-do people, however, occasionally express 564 their joy over the family increase by a feasts which they share 565 with a few villagers and friends.

566 Immediately after the name is bit, it is placed in a cradle 567 (Gilyak nch,ykh). This has a very peculiar nature: it consists of 568 a canoe-shaped or flated, hollowed-out piece of wood of such a 569 length that the upper body of the child, up to its head, 570 can be fitted into it comfortably. While it upper end, usually 571 pointed, remains open, the lower end is closed with a crossboard 572 which is provided with several grooves supporting into a central 573 hole. The child, wrapped in blanken except for its naked buttocks, 574 is set on this board so that the upper body rests in the hollow, 575 whereupon a couple of strips are drawn from one edge of it to the 576 other to prevent the child from falling out. A small basket half 577 filled with moss or fine wood-shavings is fastened below the 578 opening in the lower end of the cradle, and then the cradle is hung on 579 a cronbeam of the house, above the sleeping bench (cf. Pl.XII /see 580 p. 992/). But in order to prevent the latter from being soiled by 581 human beings on the stove, To my answer that these objects 582 were too small to be seen even with a telescope because of the 583 great distance of the stars they replied with great assurance that 584 nevertheless a big shaman had seen them, and from their stories 585 they firmly believed that on the stars there are tall trees and 586 extensive forests, various animals, such as sable, otter, fox, 587 bears, dogs, etc., and finally, even human beings. These 588 human beings, whom they called, again indiscriminately,

/678 cont./

882 the thought of a continuous movement of the sun around the earth
883 which is a mere extension of the sun's daily movement from east 884 toward west. Some of them, however, were of specially gigantic 885 proportions, such as Iutechin and Reigun —a thought which immediately 886 gave rise to the question as to whether there were also a 887 moon and men on the other side of the earth. Moreover, the 888 idea that the earth did not have a disk-shape, but a globular-shaped 889 form was accepted by them more easily than I had imagined 890 According to their view, the stars moved around the earth just 891 like the sun. They have, however, a comic conception of them
892 as objects to which they regard them as celestial bodies 893 similar to the earth, which appear to small to them only because 894 of the great distance. This /679/ undoubtedly arose from their 895 indiscriminate use of the designation unghur, "star," and 896 unghir-nifi, "earth-star." Some of the constellation bear special 897 names among them. For example, the three stars in the tail 898 of the Great Bear are called tarkhinchich, the last in its body 899 nangnon (?), that is, rats' storehouse; a constellation with

/699 cont./

4.(cont.)

also liable to be the Yukagir in the country of "Sashanta" (sobach'ya zemlia = dog country) in Siberia, but he himself labelled the report doubtful.

/700 cont./

The length of the bear's captivity depends on its age; old 701 animals are kept in captivity only a few months; young ones for 702 several years, until they are fully grown. When it has acquired 703 a thick layer of fat as a result of plentiful food and lack of 704 exercise, the time drawn near to lead it with great pomp to its 705 doom. The only season of the year in which bear festivals take 706 place among the Gilyak is winter, for then they stay, at least 707 on the mainland, in the spacious dwellings built in accordance 708 with the Chinese pattern and have much time for social gather-
709 ings, festivities, and feasting; in fact, the abundance of time 710 is probably the chief reason why they like to indulge them on 711 such as possible. In particular December, or Anj-long of the 712 continental Gilyak, is the month in which most of the bear festi-713 vals occur. But this is by no means obligatory; they may equally 714 as well take place in January and February. Indeed, I myself 715 attended such a festival among the Olcha that did not begin until 716 March 22 (April 3). But this is about the latest date for it, for 717 by then preparations for the summer begin in earnest, and soon 718 afterward, in April and at the beginning of May, the move to the 719 summer dwellings is undertaken. Sometimes setting the date for 720 when a bear festival is to take place is assigned to the shaman, 721 but usually, as was mentioned, it is left to the owner of the bear 722 or bears, who is also the host, and he will let it depend on his 723 own business affairs and can, if the latter demand it, have a more 724 or less long pause between the individual acts of the festival.
725 As a result of this, as well as thanks to the great number of bears
726 kept in captivity by the Gilyak and Olcha and the long duration 727 of the whole festival, it may easily happen that the traveler in 728 the country will encounter bear or there an individual act of 729 the festival, but usually on such an occasion the Gilyak, ani-730 mated by mistrust and suspicion, try to keep such strangers from 731 entering their dwellings by all kinds of pretexts, as I myself ex-732 perienced on Sakhalin.

/722 cont./

G-755 It would therefore also be prohibited for the women, however, /723/756 to dance and sing in the presence of the bear, because they would 757 easily misuse it simply out of revenge for their exclusion from the 758 festive meals as a matter of principle.

759 In these festivals there have no definite duration: the feasting 760 goes on, with a constant rotation of the participants, relatives, 761 friends, villagers, and other guests as long as the quantity of bear 762 meat and fat lasts. In Tebakh, Jadin told his guests, Dimsa and 763 Brevera, that it would last for many days since three bears had been 764 killed. When, therefore, on the following day (February 1/13) 765 the proceedings of the festival in fact began to be repeated in 766 exactly the same way, they left this village and returned to 767 Nikolayevsk.

768 As I have mentioned above, I had an opportunity in the previ-769 ous year (1895) to witness this second part of the bear festival, con-
770 cluding with the eating of the bear, among the Olcha in the village 771 of Gilyak. I was very concerned to observe that their customs would not differ essentially from those of the Gilyak was in large part confirmed by Dittmar's report. As proof of this and at the same time as evidence of the adoption of Gilyak customs among the Olcha, I shall here insert a brief description of what I saw among them on this occasion, with reference to the above information about the Gilyak.

G-772 I arrived in the village of Gilyak located only five 773 versts below Kidzi, on March 22 (April 3) at about 10 o'clock in 774 the morning and stepped into one of its five houses. I found it 775 occupied by the bear festival in the same manner as it done among the 776 Gilyak for an imminent bear-festival feast. Here, however, 777 opposite the ritagtre decorated with the bear's head and skin and 778 with numerous fir branches and wood shavings (Gilyak ,ssad = Olcha 779 giamasaad), a second rack quite similar to the first one but some-780 what smaller stood at the other central-post of the house and on its 781 shelves lay some bold meat and pieces of the fat of the slaughtered 782 bear, along with all kinds of other articles. Moreover, the passage-783 way between the bear rack and the bench of honor was blocked off 784 by a pole laid across it, and by means of it this bench, as well as the 785 whole yurt, was divided into halves. The floor throughout the

/750 cont./

771 tradition, reaching any premonition of a religious one or completely 772 driving out and replacing that supply concept of God among the 773 only a few inhabitants.

774 I realized that the wooden idols of the Gilyak do not
775 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
776 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
777 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
778 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between 779 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 780 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 781 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 782 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
783 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha 778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/781 cont./

771 tradition, reaching any premonition of a religious one or completely 772 driving out and replacing that supply concept of God among the 773 only a few inhabitants.

774 I realized that the wooden idols of the Gilyak do not
775 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
776 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
777 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
778 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
779 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 780 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 781 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 782 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
783 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/782 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dodaldy).
789 likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between
790 village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the 791 direction. In front, in the middle, there was a pouch of leather and 792 on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the 793 was inacceptible to him as they certainly would be if they en-
794 joyed special veneration. (Bm. 1, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

789 2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, some-
790 times human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward
791 off danger; misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated
792 to me by the Gilyak with the general names of hakp and inchogai (?).

[792] 1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A transcription of the pronunciation of the whole tribe, from (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig.1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the cronbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha
778 and Goldi the similarly-shaped sawa stand). Sometimes, however,
779 the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they
780 give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak
781 is seriously ill, the Shaman carves such an idol for him, or adzen
782 Sakhin to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But

/792 cont./

783 the disease. Since then the once large village of Chala has had
784 only a few inhabitants. (Bm. 1, p. 28.)

785 26. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw no idol-belt, a sieuchas
786 provided with various sawa or representations of idols, to be worn
787 around the body as an amulet against sickness (Plate LX /p.1260
788 Fig. 7). On either side of the belt were two makes (dod wai Sajan, far above Nikolayevsk on the Amur River. Another, less famous one, Tachdzach, lives in the village of Amur, above Nikolayevsk. Incease of an emergency, such as sickness, death, and the like, they are called to villages where there are no shamans (3). There are shamans (mipinnach), however, such as

/753 cont./

1. That among the Gilyak the shamans have less a religious significance than a practical one, mixed with superstition, to be sure, also follows from the fact that they are religious as shamans, or regard as corresponding to their shamans, clergymen, but rather physicians and apothecaries, because they heal sickness. (The shaman may be present at a bear festival, to be sure, but not "to dominate" see pp. 1153. 1163, cf. also p. 880.)

drums and the like, among other Gilyak, for example, the brothers Sugin and Sugin in Kulk, though neither of them was a shaman. Also, the art of dancing, of beating the drum, and the like, as it is customary in the shaman performances, is known to many other Gilyak and is exercised upon request or as desired without it being regarded as sinful or the practitioners being shamans. For example, a boy in the village of Wait was said to be able to do the shaman's work very well, without being a shaman himself. A part of this among the Gilyak, it seems to me, rather than skill in dancing, singing, and the like, is the ability to do a certain trick, such as apparently plunging a knife into the body and the like, feats for which they particularly praise their great shaman. (Bm. I, pp. 36, 38.)

28. Gilyak. The shaman performance. I learned that makes are especially feared from inshamans given to me by an experiment to the conquering of spirits by a shaman among the Gilyak of Petrovskye.- After singing and howling had been performed by the shaman, the shaman turned to the pad mitnoi lamb hawes, sun, moon, and stars (about whom, incidentally, he could say nothing more than that he had been shut informed by the elders of his people), and thereupon on the occasion of a bear festival, he was addressed as the two animals most feared by the Gilyk'ski and Russians. During these conjurations he occasionally beat on a drum-like animal-skin stretched over a ring, using a little stick with a make depicted at one end and a bear at the other. The bytanden howled and danced, and then the shaman beseeched the god for good fishing, good weather, for the rain to run off into the sea, for a favorable and safe ice for Gilyak and Russian. (Bm. I, p. 39.)

/754 cont./

29. Gilyak. Shamanistic art in case of sickness (p. The

2. Ineffective in cases of snakebite, for which the only remedy is tying the skin of the snake around the wound.

toad (which brings bad luck) is of two kinds, that is, sometimes a single one, simply called mipinch, and sometimes a double one, wap-mipinch, with a doubled body and extremities. The former has its abode on land, but the latter in the water; hence the former is also designated as mifrangipinch, the latter as tulmipinch (3). Both are powerful and uncanny, magl, especially

3. Most of these accounts come from Bocharov and her son, Dshaman, Bum Kulk. Junchin thought that the wap-mipinch shaman himself, a part of this among the Gilyak, it seems to me, rather than skill in dancing, singing, and the like, is the ability to do a certain trick, such as apparently plunging a knife into the body and the like, feats for which they particularly praise their great shaman. (Bm. I, pp. 36, 38.)

28. Gilyak. The shaman performance. I learned that makes are especially feared from inshamans given to me by an experiments to the conquering of spirits by a shaman among the Gilyak of Petrovskye.- After singing and howling had been performed by the shaman, the shaman turned to the pad mitnoi lamb hawes, sun, moon, and stars (about whom, incidentally, he could say nothing more than the wap-mipinch, /754/ which, as the Gilyak put it, resembles the devil (kim ngallatch), hence, perhaps, its double shape. Their evil power is shown by the fact that they sneak up on a sleeping human being and the pad mitnoi lamb hawes, sun, moon, and stars (about whom, incidentally, he could say nothing more than stars and dipe, if he does not use the proper means to free himself of the mipinch. The only means that can help him, however, is a shaman. He conjures up a Mgn (a good god), who removes the mipinch from the sick person. At the same time a mipinch carved by the shaman himself or by someone else at the order of the shaman is hung around the neck of the sick person and then by the sick person from then on to protect himself in the future. A stick man wears a single mipinch, a woman a double one. The mipinch are always carved out of wood, especially the wap-mipinch. It is only on the moot-band of the dead bear (see pp. 1156, 1163) that a single mipinch and a bear's hair may be found. This is made by the women, but the wooden one are always made by the men, since wood carving of all kinds is an occupation for only the men, while the women are allowed to make the arabesques and figures out of cloth and therefore also out of birch bark.

/754 cont./

The ideas of the Gilyak concerning the lizard (mkrygan) are similar to those concerning the toad and snake, except that much more is attributed to the lizard. The lizard lives in the heat band of the sleeping person and is removed in a way similar to the above by a shaman and by putting an iron amulet-ring (lalp) (1)

1. See Appendix 6 /p. 1136/.

around the head. This ring bears the representation of a lizard on either side, in the region of the temples; in front, closer to the forehead, there is a human figure on either side, supposed to indicating a man on one side, a woman on the other. Finally, at the very front, on the forehead, the tail bears a long shape. This is striking, since the frog (that) is not regarded as unlucky, is not magl. (Bm. II, pp. 44-46.)

30. Gilyak. Amazing, marvelous acts which the Gilyak shaman performs are chiefly the means by which he wins admiration and esteem among his countrymen. The more these acts deviate from the natural course of things, the greater is the reputation of the sorcerer. Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

/754 cont./ Such is enjoyed, for example, by the Gilyak

1: Schrenck—1854 E-S (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

2: Schrenck—1854 E-S (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

III. Gilyak. The Gilyak Junchin from Patchi gave me a minute description of the procedure during the conjuration of a spirit which is done through the power of a shaman. This report corresponds to what the shaman performances described above to a large extent. I shall let it follow here.

It is night and dark in the yurt. On the floor, in the center of the yurt, where the dogs' table has been removed, a shaman is lying with his arms tied to his back, a noose of straps around his neck, both ends of which are held by two Gilyak sitting far apart and at some distance from the shaman. There is not a sound in the yurt until the shaman shouts the word dschu, whereupon a noise which sounds like dancing pieces of wood is made in the yurt -- it emanates from one or several kags who have appeared in the yurt. The Gilyak sitting around immediately address the kags, asking him various questions as to why he has appeared: whether he needs bonbons, or silk fat or a soot, and the like, or whether he has simply come, etc. The kags answers each question affirmatively, negatively, or evasively, expressing himself by different kinds of noise. If the question is followed by a simple hammering, the answer is affirmative; if a mere scraping follows, it is negative. Finally if a single hammering and then a scraping follow, it means "I do not know."

/754/ Now the kags, during constant noise, approach the shaman (lying bound and noisily above /illegible/). The shaman becomes his talk audible to everyone. If he is dead, all the Gilyak around in the yurt begin the monotonous song of the kags, but if he is alive, only one of the Gilyak sings, for the choosing of whom the kags is questioned. This is done by asking him, "Should this one (for example, the name in question) sing?" Should that one (for example) sing?" etc., until the answer is affirmative. The sing which the Gilyak begin to sing who are fond of the shaman begins, "Come to life! Come, come, come, come!" Come soon, come soon!"

This causes the kags to dance noisily again down from the shamar. Once more one hears him emave a deep sigh -- this time breathing at life now -- and now he stands there freed

1: III. Gilyak. The Gilyak Junchin from Patchi gave me a minute description of the procedure during the conjuration of a spirit which is done through the power of a shaman. This report corresponds to what the shaman performances described above to a large extent. I shall let it follow here.

It is night and dark in the yurt. On the floor, in the center of the yurt, where the dogs' table has been removed, a shaman is lying with his arms tied to his back, a noose of straps around his neck, both ends of which are held by two Gilyak sitting far apart and at some distance from the shaman. There is not a sound in the yurt until the shaman shouts the word dschu, whereupon a noise which sounds like dancing pieces of wood is made in the yurt -- it emanates from one or several kags who have appeared in the yurt. The Gilyak sitting around immediately address the kags, asking him various questions as to why he has appeared: whether he needs bonbons, or silk fat or a soot, and the like, or whether he has simply come, etc. The kags answers each question affirmatively, negatively, or evasively, expressing himself by different kinds of noise. If the question is followed by a simple hammering, the answer is affirmative; if a mere scraping follows, it is negative. Finally if a single hammering and then a scraping follow, it means "I do not know."

/754/ Now the kags, during constant noise, approach the shaman (lying bound and noisily above /illegible/). The shaman becomes his talk audible to everyone. If he is dead, all the Gilyak around in the yurt begin the monotonous song of the kags, but if he is alive, only one of the Gilyak sings, for the choosing of whom the kags is questioned. This is done by asking him, "Should this one (for example, the name in question) sing?" Should that one (for example) sing?" etc., until the answer is affirmative. The sing which the Gilyak begin to sing who are fond of the shaman begins, "Come to life! Come, come, come, come!" Come soon, come soon!"

This causes the kags to dance noisily again down from the shamar. Once more one hears him emave a deep sigh -- this time breathing at life now -- and now he stands there freed

1:-Gilyak idol-bowl. 2:-shaman's belt (Gilyak). 3:-altar for burning incense by the shaman (Gilyak). 4:-shaman's performance before a sick woman (Gilyak).

4: Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1914 RX2 Gilyak RX2

buried their dead, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burying, they broke the sled on which they had brought the corpse and placed it on the grave, and placed the dog's food and tobacco on the spot. The "dog of the dead" took place afterwards later, on the day of the "calling the tree." as the cemetery was called. There dogs had a rail a little but for the funeral.

At the cemetery there dogs were killed on this day. The corpses were placed on the ground, and the dogs were killed and their bodies were attached closely to the corpse. A variety of household articles were laid out. The dogs, sable, fox, lynx, tinpot and other articles were broken nearby. It was held that the dead man's soul would be reborn and take the world of the dead, situated underground. The dead were buried only by members of their clan.

The Gilyak believed in a "soul" (mitch) and in a "shadow" (ngrgan). The shadow was considered to be a dangerous thing, and was connected with "healing" and with the constant struggle with the evil spirits. The Gilyak sitting around immediately address the kags, asking him various questions as to why he has appeared: whether he needs bonbons, or silk fat or a soot, and the like, or whether he has simply come, etc. The kags answers each question affirmatively, negatively, or evasively, expressing himself by different kinds of noise. If the question is followed by a simple hammering, the answer is affirmative; if a mere scraping follows, it is negative. Finally if a single hammering and then a scraping follow, it means "I do not know."

/754/ Now the kags, during constant noise, approach the shaman (lying bound and noisily above /illegible/). The shaman becomes his talk audible to everyone. If he is dead, all the Gilyak around in the yurt begin the monotonous song of the kags, but if he is alive, only one of the Gilyak sings, for the choosing of whom the kags is questioned. This is done by asking him, "Should this one (for example, the name in question) sing?" Should that one (for example) sing?" etc., until the answer is affirmative. The sing which the Gilyak begin to sing who are fond of the shaman begins, "Come to life! Come, come, come, come!" Come soon, come soon!"

This causes the kags to dance noisily again down from the shamar. Once more one hears him emave a deep sigh -- this time breathing at life now -- and now he stands there freed

"The charm, or medicine-man, exorcises spirits which take up a temporary abode, charms made in the shape of a human being. Otherwise even this anthropoid kind was as amulet. A pair of these, carved from wood, which I have (p.194), are intended be worn on the limb or part of the body affected; for a sore throat, for instance, the little figures would be tied round the neck."

9: Hawes--199 [2] 1-3 (1901) 1903
116, 527, 539, 756, 782

"The following, however, is the part played by i.e. the medicine man immediately preceding as given me by an observer on the island.
The cham, with a pine-twig in his hand, ami close to the bear and whispers in its ear—
'You have eaten many berries,
'You have caught many fish,
'You have frightened many people;
'Your ancestors and your comrades have 'brok
'Therefore you must die for it.
'But your "host" has fed you three whole years, (dried fish),
'He has given you the best water,
'He has taken you for walks,
'He has bathed you thrice a day (1) in the "sumr

1. I am afraid this is imposing on the bear's business getting him out of his cage; and th frequently, it was then autumn, than once a

this functionary at this juncture, [LSS:
the sacrifice of the bear at the bear fête]

d the deep silence of the spectators, goes en' many Gilyaks:

not stinting the delicious yukola

mer year," s memory. It is such a difficult ose I saw were not taken out more fortnight for a constitutional.

9: Hawes--200 1-3 (1901) 1903
116, 527, 756, 782

"At the end of this adjuration the cham moves a pine-twig over the bear's head. At this point the a forward, and at a couple of yards or so from the the bow. The animal, however, would not expose he turned round, when the archer let fly. Strange but simply tried to rub the arrow out with his paw round as if nothing had happened. The arrow had and the animal, still making no sign of pain, only this time merely hit the collar. The first was the vent, the poor beast sank down and died. When qu with sticks and lifted up the paws, and the carcas ground three times.

When the cham is present, he first cuts out the
the pieces to the most honoured members present the sacrificed beast will be assured successful hu

The skin having been quickly stripped in this ca cauldrons were soon steaming with bear stew. Al roots, roe, seal-oil, etc., were brought forth, a sat in groups, the women waited upon them and th little to one side, still holding the accounts agree. An archer now came bear fitted his iron-tipped arrow to his heart, and had to be teased until ly enough poor Bruin emitted no sound,

, and failing to do so, sat looking missed the heart, but pierced the lung, coughed. Another arrow was shot, but n pulled out, and the blood now finding ite dead, the women came forward
e was dragged round the execution-heart of the bear, and dividing it, gives . To these partakers of the heart of nts during the whole of the season.

ase, the carcase was cut up and the l the delicacies of dried fish, rice, nd the feasting again began. The men en took part in the feast."

9: Hawes--239-240 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 177, 578, 692, 756

"His [LSS: The cham or medicine man] moral influence ar losing ground, as the Gilyaks come more into contact with th said to a Russian, 'A cham tells very many lies.'

'Then why do you call him in?'

'He is needed. If he got angry it would be bad for us,' was

It is true that it may result badly for the Gilyak, not becau divine anger to fall upon his head; but when the Gilyak has a accused of crime, the cham may remember his [240] omissi the last word, he can make the punishment very severe."

ıong his tribe is certainly e Russians. One of them the answer.

se the cham can cause the misunderstanding, or is on or insult, and as he has

16, 124, 756

"From the first meeting with the Gilyal
a cham, or 'medicine-man' of the tribe.
earn from him more than I could from th
n-the-canoe.' All the replies had indica heir cham. On reaching New Val, which quiries if [232] the great man were at hor at Chaivo, however, I was informed he h suspected evasion, and therefore put my etch him. This had the desired effect, a hirty-five, of less wild appearance than dividual—came hesitatingly towards us. I disarm his suspicions, for the natives ar through the interpreters that I was a frie way from over the sea and would like to k

ks I had made inquiries as to where I could find I was anxious to do so, because I hoped to ie Gilyak 'man-in-the-street,' or rather, 'man-ted the village of Chaivo as the residence of was close by, I thought it prudent to make inne. The answer was in the affirmative. Arrived ad gone to New Val. This would not do. I foot down and insisted on our crew going to nd, shortly after, a man of about thirty or the others—in fact, a rather mild-looking in-offered him a few tobacco-leaves, and to e shy of talking about their religion, explained nd of the Gilyaks, and that I had come a great know about them and their forefathers."

116, 756

"The Gilyaks themselves declared, ' last winter. He was great indeed! If in the fish, he went to the cham and f granted, and the wind began to blow.
being able to locate a bear. 'When th voice of the spirit, saying, 'There is there I discover a bear.' "

We have no great cham now. We had one. He died a man wanted to fish, and there was no wind to drive ell on his knees, and immediately his prayer was ' His successor, indeed, claimed the power of e Gilyak wants to find one, ' he told us, 'I hear a a bear in the forest, ' and I go into the forest, and 116, 756, 776, 782

"Being anxious to know what claims t whether he could cure illnesses. To whi cham, pray and make offerings of tobac out of the door to the spirits (of the fore added, 'and we offer to fire at one time he cham had to healing power, I asked him ich he replied, 'If a child or person is ill, I, the cco to the lord of fire and cast some rice or tea est and water). There is one god—Nature,' he and to water and the forest at others.' "

However, there are no forms or obligatory expressions of esteem of any kind. In general, a kiss, bow, or hand-shake are, as we said, not often used by Gilyak.

Beside the aged, the rich, and the brave, shamans are especially esteemed, but here again we see reflected the respect [233] which is paid a superior mind. The shamans do not form a separate, exclusive class but live like other people, but they draw an additional income from their craft. It frequently happens that the shaman is also the son of a shaman and has, in a manner of speaking inherited his "science". Some, however, become students of another shaman for a considerable sum, still others become impromptu shamans whenever the "power" descends on them. Women can also become shamans, as we have said. It is arranged so that large villages have their own shaman, whereas several smaller ones fall within the territory of one shaman.

The work of these priests is probably rooted partly in self-delusion, but in any case there is a considerable addition of intentional deception.

Fortunately they themselves, although smarter than the rest, are not very superior, and can therefore not teach the people anything very harmful, nor have they been able to make a privileged place for themselves. The shaman's advice is sought where every-day experience does not prove adequate, but the counsellor is not generally treated with great veneration. Most of the shamans are received without any kind of greeting, only famous ones are met with a bow; beyond Sofiyskoye there was even one before whom the whole house went on its knees when he appeared at the door in order to perform his magic. In general the shamans not only enjoy a certain esteem, but they are also feared. Nevertheless, there are cases where people refused to pay a shaman because of his false predictions and his ineptitude, and sometimes shamans are even flogged. Their magic practices will be considered later.

Finally, there are the "starosti" (1), that is, elders who

1. This is a Russian word.

are appointed by officials. They are, however, not actual mayors; they have nothing to say and are scarcely more than intermediaries through whom the official gives his orders to the community, for these starosti speak Russian

771 More frequently one finds tho being and immortality, but do Some do not even believe in th reflect the opinions of those o village of Kula near Nikolayev had neither idols nor shamans brothers who were born there and good-natured chaps; they believe in god, but regard the 756 The shamans are the media
789 invisible world; they always e 782 perspicacity, whereby they kn for instance, changes in the w their influence. Their chief f sickness which is mainly the they are [243] also consulted instance, there may be few fi shaman is consulted and order to be killed and offered up in place. The sacrificial gifts a to the shaman's prescriptions how to "drive away the rain" denouncing them loudly. Like stands how to make rain and t he begins his magic song. rai a Gilyak believer told me. Hi bring harm. For instance, h where far off in some village which does not harm others.
so forth. Occasionally the ma the magician is never persecu are usually merciful enough to someone irritates them; and b lieves in them.
755 If a shaman is invited to vis
534 in his official costume. He w numerous clinking tin objects.
drum and his staff. The drum long and consists of a wooden pig skin or the skin of a stag, of little bells. He alternately se who recognize a supreme not bother much about them.

ne idols, and these may already of other beliefs. Thus the little vsk has for some time already
s. I was visited by two and who were both wide-awake confessed to me that they idols as foolishness.
tors between the visible and xcel in experience and now how to predict many things, veather, and thus they exert unction consists of driving out work of evil spirits. Incidentally on other occasions. For sh at one place or another; the rs a dog of such and such color the river at the designated re generally made according
. A competent shaman knows by threatening the clouds and wise, of course, he under-hunderstorms. "As soon as n clouds immediately appear", s magic practices can also can cause a human some-to die of a fish or a drink
He can flood a village, and gic practices are feared, but ted. However, the shamans stick to threats only, if esides, not everybody beit a sick person he appears ears a girdle on which hang In his hand he carries his is about two-thirds meters ring on which is stretched a and on which hang a number beats his drum and sings

796 on a bed of fir twigs as on a bed of state and the participants in the festival visit it for the last time. After two or three days they pull off its hide and the meat is distributed among 796 the guests who eat it with relish. There is a strange con-825 tradiction in these bear festivals. On the one hand, they honor 531 the bear as a celestial being, as is proved not only by its pictures serving as idols and amulets but also by the tender attentions that they show the animal during its imprisonment.
For this speaks also the solemn way of killing it, as well as the ceremonious procedure used in treating the corpse; also, the circumstance not mentioned above, that the traveller was not allowed to take with him one of the willow sticks of the fence which was later used for the bed of the dead bear. He would all the sooner have done so since the stick was distin-796 guished by tasteful carving. On the other hand, they are not 825 afraid to kill this animal that they honor as a divine being, 756 and by a death, even, that is only the conclusion of a rather barbaric torture. Furthermore it is a curious circumstance that during the whole course of the festival, as far as Jakobse was able to observe it, the shaman was not even visible, even though the latter plays such an outstanding role at all the 796 religious ceremonies of the Amur peoples. What, besides, is 782 the purpose of leading the bear out on the ice of the river?
776 [in the bear festival; see p. 381--Analyst] Should it suggest the idea that the animal is to be offered as a sacrifice to the river honored as a god? And if this is really the case, what a strange idea it is to sacrifice one god to another and to eat him up in the end. And why don't they kill the bear on the river bank and let at least its blood flow into the water, just as the fish gods are entrusted to its waves? What, furthermore, is this sacrifice meant to effect? and what is its nature? Are we to imagine it as a sacrifice of thanks offered up to the river dispensing blessing and nourishment, or as a sacrifice of expiation by which the river is supposed to be made favorable to the dwellers near it, because the latter are well aware of their dependence on the river and its power to bring them destruction? In the former case one would think that the celebration would take place as soon as possible after the time fishing ended, that is, about September or beginning October, while these festivals actually are not till later. The second assumption does not agree, again, with the circumstance that the nature of the festival is a thoroughly joyful one, as is proved, at least to my mind, by the description of it given above. This is not contradicted, either, by the solemn silence which reigns during the lethal shot and the 796 preparation for it. For it is by no means necessary to see

116, 682, 692, 756

"The cham of the Gilyaks resembles, i the Golds, and the Tungus on the mainlan but the primary function of the cham woul that purpose he is elected. He it is who p elders, and afterwards carries it out. Le but [235] actually his moral influence doe depends upon him. Probably he was chose necessary in olden times, was much agai the cham, with his powers of exorcism, c voluntarily felt must attach to the killing longer obtains, but is commuted in practi

n many respects, the shaman of the Oroktis,
d. Both are addicted to superstitious practices;
d appear to be the judicial executive, and for ronounces sentence in the criminal 'court' of gally these were the limits of his function; s not stop there, and the criminal's fate largely en because the death of a murderer, though nst the grain of the kindly, jolly Gilyaks; and could clear himself of any sin which they inof a human being. The penalty of death now no ce to a fine."

middle of a village, and there fattened upon fish. On fete-days he is led, or rather dragged, in procession, and of course is thoroughly muzzled and bound. Finally a great day arrives on which Bruin takes a prominent part in the festival by being killed. There are many superstitious ceremonies carefully observed on such occasions. The ears, jawbones, and skull of the bear are hung upon trees to ward off evil spirits, and the flesh is eaten, as it is supposed to make all who partake of it both fortunate and courageous.

I did not have the pleasure of witnessing any of these ursine festivals, but I saw several bear cages and looked upon a bear while he lunched on cold salmon. If the bear were more gentle in his manners he might become a household pet among the Gilyaks; but at present he is not in favor, especially where there are small children.

Ermines were formerly domesticated for catching rats, the high price of cats confining their possession to the wealthy. Cats have a half-religious character and are treated with great respect. Since the advent of the Russians the supply is very good. Before they came the Manjour merchants used to bring only male cats that could not trouble themselves about posterity. The price was sometimes a hundred roubles for a single mouser, and by curtailing the supply the Manjours kept the market good.

The Gilyaks, like nearly all the natives of Northern Asia, are addicted to Shamanism. The shaman combines the double function of priest and doctor, ministering to the physical and spiritual being at the same time. When a man is taken sick he is supposed to be attacked by an evil spirit and the shaman is called to practice exorcism. There is a distinct spirit for every disease and he must be propitiated in a particular manner. While practicing his profession the shaman contorts his body and dances like one insane, and howls worse than a dozen Kamchadale dogs. He is dressed in a fantastic manner and beats a tambourine during his performance. To accommodate himself to the different spirits he modulates his voice, changes the character of his dance, and alters his cos-

22: Knox T-2 (1866) 1870 Gilyak

● 756 tume. Both doctor and patient are generally decked with wood-shavings while the work is going on.

Sometimes an effigy of the sick person is prepared, and the spirit is charmed from the man of flesh to the one of straw. The shaman induces him to take up lodgings in this effigy, and the success of his persuasion is apparent when the invalid recovers. If the patient dies the shaman declares that the spirit was one over which he had no control, but he does not hesitate to take pay for his services.

PRACTICE OF MEDICINE.

A Russian traveler who witnessed one of these exorcisms said that the shaman howled so fearfully that two Chinese merchants who were present out of curiosity fled in very terror. The gentleman managed to endure it to the end, but did not sleep well for a week afterward.

776 The Gilyaks believe in both good and evil spirits, but as the former do only good it is not thought necessary to pay them any attention. All the efforts are to induce the evil spirits not to act. They are supposed to have power over hunting, fishing, household affairs, and the health and well-being of animals and men.

22: Knox T-2 (1866) 1870 Gilyak

The shamans possess great power over their superstitious subjects, and their commands are rarely refused. I heard of an instance wherein a native caught a fine sable and preserved the skin as a trophy. Very soon a man in the village fell ill. The shaman after practicing his art announced that the spirit commanded the sable skin to be worn by the doctor himself. The valuable fur was given up without hesitation. A Russian traveler stopping one night in a Gilyak house discovered in the morning that his sledge was missing, and was gravely told that the spirit had taken it.

In 1814 the small pox raged in one of the tribes living on the Kolyma river, and the deaths from it were numerous. The shamans practiced all their mysteries and invoked the spirits, but they could not stop the disease. Finally, after new invocations, they declared the evil spirits could not be appeased without the death of Kotschen, a chief of the tribe. This chief was so generally loved and respected that the people refused to obey the shamans. But as the malady made new progress, Kotschen magnanimously came forward and was stabbed by his own son.

In general the shamans are held in check by the belief that should they abuse their power they will be long and severely punished after death. This punishment is supposed to occur in a locality specially devoted to bad shamans. A good shaman who has performed wonderful cures receives after death a magnificent tomb to his memory.

The Russians think that with educated Gilyaks they can succeed in winning the natives to Christianity, especially when the missionaries are skilled in the useful arts of civilized life. Hence the school in Mihalofski, and it has so far succeeded well in the instruction of the boys. Russian and Gilyak children were working in the gardens in perfect harmony, and there was every indication of good feeling between natives and settlers.

757

757 MEDICAL THERAPY--extent of differentiation of medical from magical and mental therapy; home remedies and self-medication; resorting to a specialized practitioner (e.g., circumstances, arrangements, payments); diagnosis (e.g., examination for symptoms, diagnostic aids); consultations; therapeutic principles (e.g., counterirritation, homeopathy); therapeutic methods (e.g., bloodletting, administration of cathartics and emetics, medication); prescribed regimen (e.g., rest, diet, isolation); remedies for specific complaints (e.g., fevers, colds, toothache, indigestion, rheumatism, infectious diseases); etc. See also:

Ideas about anatomy and physiology 82
Obstetrics 84
Materia medica and pharmacology 278
Medical research 742
Public health and sanitation 744
Surgery 752

9: Hawes--275 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 164, 278, 757

"Coughs, colds, and pulmonary complanints are very prevalent, and the methods of healing scarcely adequate. For a sore throat, a concoction of moshun-tomash (field camo mile) is swallowed, and for inflammation of the lungs, a diluted exusion from the gungi of trees is drunk in place of tea.

Whether these herbal remedies are dictated by experience and the Gilyak knowledge of medicinal herbs, which is said to be considerable, or is anything more than Shamanistic lore and a series of charms, I cannot say. The treatment adopted for other ailments, such as toothache, swellings, earache, and ulcer, is certainly of the latter kind. For the first they apply some of the down of a hazel-grouse (Tetrao bonasia) to the cheek; for the second and third, the squirrel's tail (olf-rega) and a piece of its ear (tul-noss) are respectively tied to the parts affected; and for the last, gazhu, i. e. a piece of a wasp's nest, is placed on the ulcer."

/ 319/

XI.

Miscellanea

823 The cliff Uj-pame, in the form of an isolated stone pillar, is between Khez' and Chil'mi. Formerly one could hear how the master of the cliff beat on a tambourine. Three times (4 year) they made sacrifices to him and addressed to him the request: 824 "Pshay'kyr urungqif -- do good for children, please!"

During a pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) they bring fire-wood and water to the sick, but do not themselves enter the house.

When they learn that it is all over in all the settlements 853 (i.e., the epidemic is over), then the dead are taken out of their graves and burned; they are afraid of burning them earlier for they believe that smoke spreads infection. The only thing that is allowed is the smoking with marsh tea in the yurt.

838 The Female Character. Proverbs. 1) The female character is like a whirlwind, similar to the wind. 2) With just a rug you will change the female character. 3) A woman, like a fire started in a clear field: the wind blows and it is out.

858 Meryachen'e. In Charbakh two people suffer from the disease meryachen'e -- two women. This sickness is unknown in the female line. Those who suffer from meryachen'e repeat literally everything, even in a foreign language; they repeat even actions. The attacks come during a fright. The sick woman is then unconscious, but later recalls it. If attempts are made to compel her to repeat something many times, she is ready to attack with a knife. In their youth they did not suffer from meryachen'e.

There are other such sick people in Tymvo and Pronge.

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'sa's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

852 A representation of twins -- tongch; -- is placed in a little storehouse. If one of the twins dies, they place one tongch, while 853 if both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chuhh-chugyrnd is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon. Kinsmen 854 and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-r'gyryn, who 855 gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.

A dead twin is not cremated, but is seated in Turkish fashion 856 in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounded 857 with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cremated after death, but is dressed in a top white and buried, also with 858 inau placed around. According to B. Pilsudski, the same is done with the father of twins.

The tongch; helps catch bears and in hunting in general. 859 The tongch; is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis (Gilyavo).

860 Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or even upon the order of the father of the underage husband of a woman.

862 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a boy, the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

863 Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-r'gyryn or by Nol-r'gyryn, 864 but each of them takes a milk not from his kingdom.

/339/ A milk can be of different shapes and often is red as 865 blood and hard as stone. Such milk can be eaten a person, he becomes lively, "as if he were walking."

866 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

867 Nakhsh'ka -- to be sick from not getting what one saw 868 and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small 869 crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets well.

/363 cont./

870 in the land of Bun (tunnch-ne) are tormented and have to 871 pay similar to that of the inhabitants on earth and in yurt special.

872 If a Bunnchi-nei dies "peacefully" or violently, through 873 murder, he changes into an herb, a grass, or a tree of our earth here. This is therefore the shape in which an ordinary mortal returns from the land of Bun to this earth. Chom- and a Dyta 874 Goldi present expressly affirmed the transformation of the dying Bun-inhabitants into various plants on earth. There was said to be no distinction according to age or sex for the various types of plants, so that a child as well as an adult, a man as well as a woman, can be transformed into a tree or a lowly grass. But there is a great difference according to the good or bad character of the deceased. A good man or a good woman, for example, will 875 be a fine tree and a fine bush, while a bad man will be a poor tree 876 or a fine bush, while a bad man will be a poor tree or a lowly grass. 877 But there is a great difference according to the good or bad character of the deceased. A good man or a good woman, for example, will be a fine tree and a fine bush, while a bad man will be a poor tree or a lowly grass.

/72 cont./

796 An indirect confirmation of our hypothesis as to the 797 origin of the above-mentioned prohibition among the Gilyak 798 is to be found in an interesting legend of the Orochi and the 799 Orok, whose religious views are very similar to those of their 800 Gilyak neighbors. According to this legend, a certain Orochi 801 woman was once abducted (in other words, eaten) by a bear 802 and bore two children by him. The woman was subsequently 803 often encountered by the Orochi in the forest in the form of a she-bear who warned them not to shoot her. It happened, however, that she was shot by accident. That it was actually she was clear from the fact that women's ornaments were found in her viscera, a bracelet and so forth. Dying, she requested in her testament to the Orochi who killed her that in the future, upon killing a bear, the ritual that is usually observed now during the festival be observed, for any bear that is killed may turn out to be her descendant and, consequently, a clansman of the Orochi.

804 Let us return to the gods. Up until now I have mentioned the gods that are beneficial to the Gilyak. Besides these, however, there are other supernatural beings who are evil and harmful to him. These devils are "mil'k'i" and "kinr'y." These beings appear in all kinds of forms and are classified according to their degree of harmfulness. They appear sometimes in the shape of a Gilyak, sometimes in the shape of animals, from the bear to the toad and lizard. They are encountered on dry land and in the sea, under the ground and in the sky.

/73/ Some of them constitute special clans of insidious creatures, destroyers by their very nature. Others are individual degenerates, "the prodigal sons" of the clans of beneficient beings, who only in exceptional cases become enemies of man. The first, of course, offer the most danger.

805 Some devote themselves exclusively to robbing the 806 Gilyak on the road (the spirits of loss -- ger-nivukh'ly); others 807 ravage storehouses, snares, and traps and harm him in all 808 sorts of ways, while still others make attempts on his very

/73 cont./

809 life, causing sickness and death. But for them, people would 810 not die. Natural death is impossible. Death is the result of 811 the scheming of these insidious creatures. Therefore the Gilyak will never touch a sable that died in the taiga, even though his skin is very valuable and very well preserved, for a devil assuredly rests in a sable that has died. Just as he, the Gilyak, lies in wait for a beast and tries in every way to kill him, so an evil spirit lies in wait for the Gilyak himself at every step, in order to devour him. Sickness is no more than an evil being who made his way into the body of a Gilyak and is slowly eating him. Nightmares and dreams in which the sick man dreams that somebody is strangling him, pressing from within, easily provide grounds for such a notion. If some organ is not functioning in the proper way, as, for example, in shortness of breath, it is easy to imagine that some kind of being has got inside and is interfering with breathing, and so forth. It is imperative to expel such a creature. This expulsion is effected in various ways, beginning with the simplest and ending with the most complex.

812 Here is an example which quite graphically illustrates 813 the "psychology" of the expulsion of devils. One woman, who was subject to attacks of sudden hysterical psychosis, was placed in my presence on a high platform, generally used to clean fish, and a fire was ignited under it with all kinds of ragis, canine feces, and stinking garbage. The devil inside the woman could not, of course, bear the horrible smell and prudently left the heart of the woman, who was thus saved.
But not all devils are so sensitive to a bad smell; others require stronger methods. Such devils must be frightened by extraordinary noise, by frenzied shrieks, by the frightening appearance of the expeller, and by other such terrorizing methods, hence the necessity for the devil-expeller to beat his tambourine, make noise with rattles, shriek in an unnatural voice, and put himself in a state of frenzy, to which end /74/he swallows smoke, drinks sea water, puts himself in a state of stupor with the smoke of bagul'nik (Ledum palustre), chews

Amur

/305 cont./

814 mother has her own fire. After childbirth a woman washes herself for three days and then moves to her yurt, but for seven days
she sits apart and eats from a separate kettle. For ten days after childbirth, it is not permissible to drink cold water or to eat raw fish, but if twins were born, then it is permissible. When a child is born, they bring in two sticks, put them into his hands and lift [1055] him up. Similarly, sticks will be placed in the infant's hands when he falls ill, and he will be compelled to lift himself up (1).

[897] 1. On another page of the same notebook,
we find the following notation: "These sticks kyz' nynyydz' (from kyz' -- risk, luck, and nynydz: -- to seek)," which probably refers
to the above-mentioned sticks.

815 /306/ If two children were born, they make two pairs of 816 pyung, two kong-z'akh, two sticks made of rose-willow, cut as 817 strips (pying-z'akh), two small bow (pudax) and arrows of a special 818 shape (m'erlar), and attachments for the cradle -- pitur'. When they prepare food, these trees -- ola' bituz' -- must be fed (settlement of Kal'ma).

819 While a child is growing up, his umbilical cord -- kylmyr
820 is kept at home, and then he himself must carry it into the forest 821 and hang it on a tree. O'ging chakhna) is a figure that they make 822 when a child is suddenly frightened during his sleep. The chkhna) 823 is the figure made when a person himself, without the shaman,
does that which he dreams.

824 The child's excrement is poured out near a fir tree (both 825 male and female); after being cut, hair is also thrown here (it is 826 not permissible to cut the hair of twins). One must watch care-827 fully to see that no female blood drops on the urine or the refuse,
828 for then the child is lost. The child will die if the tree growing 829 there is broken. This tree is called pilz nigf, and the place is called ki markf -- literally -- "urine pouring out place."

/310 cont./

830 Mainly it is necessary to treat leprosy -- khachudz, and skin diseases.

The treatment of a leper. The shaman asks that a dog be brought into the iaba. The sick man sits up with his legs hanging from the plank bed to the floor. In front of him there is an iron kettle with the opening upward. The man holds the dog, while the shaman moves around the yurt and makes (shamanizes);
then the shaman spits -- "emits the spirit," takes a small worm out of his mouth and carries it toward the dog. The dog jumps back -- it has been pricked. Then the angry worm is brought over to the sick man; the shaman stands opposite the sick man with the worm in his hands, and the head of the shaman turns into a large woodpecker -- xuk'khr -- black, with a red forehead -- and, squinting his eyes, he begins /311/ to look closely at the face of the sick man in order to determine where to peck a bald spot, i.e., to learn where the worm of the disease is (the shaman, having squinted his eyes, sees through the man, and the sick man sits "all naked"). The shaman finds a soft spot, pricks it with the worm, and pulls out of there another worm, which he throws into the kettle. He thus pulls out all the worms from the entire [761] [825] body, leaving only one worm, xamul. Without a worm, a person cannot live, but this worm cannot propagate. Those who have seen these worms in the kettle say that they look like tree worms. This kettle is covered with other kettles. At the same time he orders his kekhn to keep watch at night over the
cup. On the following day he orders the Gilyak to bind the kettle tight with a kaluga net and to bury it in the ground, while he himself shamanizes. The shaman carries it on a pole, and over five rivers and five ranges. He sings, so that the small mountains become large, and the streams -- large rivers. There he digs out a pit, where he places the kettles together and binds them.
Those who go must count five narrow valleys and five ranges.
And the shaman sings once again, so that the dried up little springs turn into large rivers, the rivers -- into cliffs, and the kaluga net -- into the densest wild bag -- "become a wire bag, so that the worm does not come out." The shaman solders the kettles with words: "Two kettles, having melted together, merge and mutually become one."

/329 cont./

764 with embroidery, with otter fur, and so forth. A honikh -- 349 muslin, mly (a small sack for flint), and a knife with a scabbard are tied to the belt of qrel'. Vessels, food, and so forth are set in place. In the corner they place an image of the pyk (cuckoo) on a wooden support, and a wooden cup -- ning, into which they put rice, is placed in front of it. During the building of a raf, all the belongings are broken, and everything that is broken is placed inside the raf, or, if it does not fit inside,next to it; all kinds of ornamented things may be put in the raf.

764 The raf, the vessels, and so forth are done on the spot.
765 They lay a fire, begin to prepare various dishes, and bring vodka.
First they themselves eat, and then they place the food in the [231] raf mu nig-yvyn arind. The pryski is untied in the morning, brought to the raf, and fed while they are eating. In addition to the boiled food, rice, buda, peas, and tobacco are sprinkled in the raf and around it. On the following day someone must come and eat up the remains of the boiled food.

/330/ After this, the mu n'igyvyn is fed no longer, though they come to look, smoke, and, frequently, to drink vodka.
This continues for from two days to two or three months. The [231] pryski is then returned to its original place. It may not be sacrificed or eaten; one may not make a fur coat of its skin, either for kinsmen or for someone from the kikhal.

766 After the death of a murderer, at his cremation, they set 764 up a takhch (see below, pp.475-476), and then they make a raf anyway.

767 The soul and the world beyond the grave, Mlyvo. Every man is • [761] [796] killed by a milk (evil spirit), who carries away his soul. The soul is afraid and hides with Pal-n'igyvyn or Tol-n'igyvyn, depending on which milk killed the person. The soul will return to Mlyvo in at most three years. If an old man died, he will arrive there old, if young, then young. After death in Mlyvo, the soul goes to another Mlyvo, and the soul of a woman to still a third Mlyvo, and then is born again. The soul of a man is completely similar to the man.

/342 cont./

197 The Tymovsk and the Okhotsk Gilyak have one language.

/343/

823 A legend about three brothers-cliffs in Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin.
793 Three Heng brothers went with a bear to look at a cast-up whale (kem), and then all of them turned into stone. Two jagi -- mother and daughter -- look after them.

825 A rat must not be killed with an ax; a stick is necessary.
• 761 Nakhvun's wife is dying because her father killed a rat with an ax; his son died for the same reason, and now his daughter is dying.

825 The attitude toward incest among dogs. According to the words of the Gilyak, among dogs a brother and sister do not copulate; exceptions are rare and are attributed to the milk. Dogs are killed for this; otherwise this heavy sin falls on the master; he will be punished with sickness and so forth. Father and daughter among dogs frequently have intercourse, but they are not killed for this.

302 Hair may be thrown away in any place.

752 A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacri-
825 fices chukh-chugynd -- a dog -- to Pal-n'igyvyn. No one may [782] look at a person wounded by a bear; only an old man or an old woman binds his wounds. His bed is curtained off with a sail.

804 In need they sometimes eat a bear that has died, and 825 they treat him like a killed one. When they set off some-[261] where (hunting) or in general on important business, they always take along their favorite ymgi (son-in-law).

793 In Mil'kivo one Gilyak had two women. Once his daughter with the grandchildren came to visit him. She went to gather berries while the men went out to hunt seals. Then

/410 cont./

302 1. I later saw something similar among the Daur [171] in the village of Chormoldin: the hair was shaved off the boys and a tuft of hair was left standing only here and there, quite unsymmetrically, either on the crown or on one side, which gave them a very comical appearance. The Chinese presumably also do this.

Adults, however,
[763] never have their head or beard hair cut; among the [761] Gilyak there prevails the belief that if an adult among them h his hair cut and had his hair shorn, he would bring him sickness an 302 death. After death, however, the braid may be cut off and p 765 served by the relatives of the deceased. For instance, the Gil Kimrkan in Kalm showed me the braids that he had removed from his first wife and his daughter after their deaths, and whi he carefully stored, wrapped in birch bark, in the small hut erected for the manes of the deceased, the so-called rakk.* *

*/HRAF note: According to the list of errata on p. 777 of the foregoing text, rakk should be raff. An asterisk on the latter word refers to a footnote which reads "Noted later"; see note * on p.1236. /

303 will be discussed later. In caring for their hair, the Gilyak a 512 just as untidy as in their clothing. Hence one often sees them 136 hit their heads with the palms of their hands in order to check the annoying vermin, or scratch their heads, which characteristically is always done with the thumb while the other /411/[751] fingers rest on the head. Indeed, the Gilyak even regard the presence of vermin in the head hair as a sign of good health.
Thus, during my stay at the Nikolaevsk post, it happened that a Gilyak boy was taken by a Russian for rearing in his house, but when the father visited the boy after a time and mixed the vermin in his hair, he explained that he was worried abou 512 his health and took him back again. In connection with this, 825 the bad habit of cracking vermin from the head or clothing in the mouth prevails among the Gilyak, as among so many pri [123] tive peoples. My disgust at this, occasionally expressed to them, seemed ridiculous to them, and to my question as to w
they did it, since it could be neither for food nor for a delic

also seems to me that the almost exclusive fish diet is a contributory factor. At any rate, I knew people who had a skin itch after eating fish, which, to a certain extent, points to its etiological significance.

Lithiasis does not occur among the Gilyak or the Russians of the Amur, and this may be partly explained by the softness of the water.

Goiter is also unknown. The only case I saw there, was that of a woman who had come from Irkutsk.

The treatment of disease is of course very rudimentary. They expect the most from the magic tricks of the shamans, since usually black magic is part of the game. The natural healing agencies over which the shaman commands are very few in number and are carefully guarded.

Sprains are usually set by stretching. In cases of breaks, splints are used. Wounds are frequently left quite open and washed only with water. In cases of suppuration bits of agaric [Lärchenpilz] are sometimes put in the wound. Frozen limbs are wrapped in oiled or clean cotton. In cases of chronic stomach and intestinal catarrh, bitter herbs, especially wormwood, are used as infusions. In cases of violent attacks of colic which occur with this illness the Gilyak sometimes set Moxa of burning sponge. Rheumatics bathe in the warm springs near the village of Mikhil, and these actually prove to be very helpful. (1) In bad epidemics of measles, etc., the Gilyak sometimes separate into groups of families and go into the taiga.

1. They have a temperature of 24 to 36 degrees Reaumur and belong to the indifferent thermal waters.

The natives generally do not like to undergo treatment. They suffer patiently and call the shaman only in extreme cases. They very seldom turn to Russian physicians, but they regard them also as shamans, but wiser than the native ones.

Of diseases occuring among their sole domestic animal, the dog, I can mention only epidemic colds which sometimes wreak havoc. As for rabies, [251] not a single case has occurred up to now in the coastal region, which may be related to the fact that among natives as well as among many Russians, dogs are systematically kept for work, that is, for draft purposes.

758

758 MEDICAL CARE--regimen and care of sick persons (e.g., diet, rest, isolation); apparatus and paraphernalia of medical care (e.g., clinical thermometers, bed pans); general availability of medical advice, treatment, and care (e.g., organization, finance, services); etc. This category is intended for general information on medical care. For specialized data see relevant categories in 73, 74 and 75. See also:

Gift giving . . . . . 431 Visiting 574

762

762 SUICIDE--incidence of suicide; motives (e.g., humiliation, thwarted love); common methods (e.g., jumping, drowning, shooting, poison); stereotyped methods (e.g., suttee, hara-kiri); justifications; attitude toward suicides; etc. See also:

Personality disorders. . . . . 158 Punishment of attempted suicide. 682

/184 cont./

*835 183 587 768 [614]

levirate. Then, in order that the woman remain in the clan of her deceased husband, she is given, according to the decision of the clan council, to any clansman of an ascending or descending degree of kinship with her late husband.

684 *835 [776] [825] • [RX2] [533]

Ordinarily the very idea of sexual connection with persons of the forbidden categories evokes an instinctive disgust. In the rare instances where feelings of love arise between such persons, the Gilyak regard it as the inspiration of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural not only in men, but in beasts. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a fornicating dog. The attitude toward people is entirely the same. Ordinarily lovers in the forbidden categories slay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct urging of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /185/ her elder sister called her a "bitch" for her love for her uncle, and called the latter a "devil," and how all -- her mother, father, and sisters -- urged upon her: "slay thyself, slay!" Incidentally, the object of her criminal passion, her uncle, could be of her age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the criminal pair might seem perfectly natural in our eyes.

*835

The feeling of sexual repulsion toward persons of the forbidden categories has been transformed into an instinct, like the very similar feeling toward one's mother or own sisters in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by that amazing ability of the Gilyak to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the group-husbands of his individual spouse arises. Without these instincts, or in any case the noteworthy virtues of self-control and self-restraint, the realization of the sexual norms would be impossible; unrestrained jealousy would result in the destruction of group

116, 533, 564, 762

And to-day the reproachful tones of the cruelly deceived maiden may be heard in the 'swish of the sledge and the howl of the dogs as the narta starts off'—

'You said you would kill yourself,
And you did not.
You are a deceiver!
Men are liars!' "

76

763 DYING--omens and predictions of death; notions ab approach of death; settlement of affairs; assemblin to postpone death; preparing the patient for death ( ing, dressing in mortuary garments, last rites); p ment (e.g., shroud, coffin); last words and last fa coma, cessation of breath or heart action); attempt the impact of death (e.g., wailing, flight, self-mut death; post-mortem examinations; etc. See also:

Deathbed testaments . . . . . 428 Omens . . . .
Capital punishment 681

3

/

bout dying; recognizing the g of relatives; attempts e.g., removal from dwell-reparing the funeral equipvors; criteria of death (e.g., s at revival; reaction to liation); announcement of

. 787

/327 cont./

764 facing west, is placed upon the stacked firewood -- hap, the arms folded with the palms toward the breast, and the legs bent with the knees up (the favorite position on a plank bed. Then they pre-[372] pare the wooden device for obtaining fire -- chkhach: tugur, namely, a vertical stick, lung (drill); the tinder is placed in the middle of a small stick, the fire is obtained by rubbing the lung against this latter, and the master of the house sets fire to the shavings.

Before (lighting the fire) they get up on the firewood and [152] cry over the deceased. The crying is begun by women. It is a sin for a man to cry over the deceased, except for his wife. The wife of an elder brother, but not of a younger one, goes to cry on the hap of a deceased bachelor.

The lamentations over the body of a husband: "My husband, oh woe, the gay devil (crying), the gay ones killed, above me now they go; another man now; (those who are) poorer than I will grow rich, (be) richer than I from now on. I shall now eat only my tears."

[152] When the fire is well under way and the flames begin to approach the upper part of the body, they take firewood from a prepared stack and throw it in the fire; even a small child throws some kind of little stick; others poke the body with long
• [763] sticks; this is an expression of love. If under the influence of the fire the hands of the deceased stretch out, this is an evil omen of the imminent death of some close kinsman, and the hands are restored to their original position with sticks.

At the completion of the ceremony of cremation, a dog is sacrificed, and upon killing it, its head is bent downward and toward the appropriate deity: to Pal toward the east, to Tol -- toward the sea. Some throw away (put into a pit) the dog's skin /328/ together with the meat; others boil the meat, for which a special fire is laid by the side of the hap, and the meat is partly eaten, partly scattered around. After this they set out for the yurt of the deceased, eat a spoonful of food each, smoke a little, and disperse.

/330 cont./

775 The deceased travels to Mlyvo on a dog sled. If he d not have holes in his ears for earrings, an old woman inspec him on the road and makes a hole, but if the deceased does wish this, his soul is taken away. Earrings are worn, not for ration, but for the sake of holes in the ears. The old woma makes the holes is called chivkhyty fi-mam, i.e., "the wo in the middle of the road."

Before the funeral the soul either stays or leaves for M and then returns again, but after the cremation it remains in Mlyvo. The dead convey the regards of the earth kinsmen t other world, about which they ask during lamentation. If a woman marries a second time, she will not be with her first husband in Mlyvo; the husband also takes a wife in the othe world. A good woman (widowed) does not marry.

• 763 Indyn's (1) mother, who was sick for a long time befor

[122] 1. The younger brother of Churka, Shternberg's guide.

death, lay on the ground in her small yurt; around the heart her daughters, a married one and a little one, and (her sons) Indyn and Churka. The mother, with half-closed eyes, sai
"When I die, the small children will be lost -- you will go have fun this way and that way and will not think of them." Churka looked sidewise and said gloomily: "How can that b am I not their brother?". And he left. Then (she turned) to
"Yes, I shall die, who will look after you, who will repair y clothing, who will feed you? You may freeze, drown. The Gilyak will abuse you, and who will say a word for you? I s die, my lips will not defend you." Then her speech /331/to be confused. She looked through the opening of the roof; stars had already come out. She said: "I must go, or else I be too late." The sister: "Where will you go? Don't you s that you are dying?" -- "I know I shall not die -- I have to And with these words she died. And Churka at this time wa fishing.

/744 cont./

run out on either side into two points, one of which represents a lizard, the other a snake, the similar shapes of both ends facing one another alternately. Unfortunately the specimen under discussion is somewhat worn by frequent use and is lacking the lizard at the one end.

The other amulet is an iron semicircle, from which hang figures of different significance made of the same metal, specifically: at the one end, a crude human shape and a roughly triangular piece that, according to some of the Gilyak, is supposed to represent a ptarmigan, and at the other end an identical alleged ptarmigan and a heart; in the middle, finally, a roughly human shape with two heads, which is supposed to represent the kins, the evil, destructive power, that is, the devil. According to the reports of the Gilyak themselves, they believe that sickness is nothing but the kins gnawing at a human being and finally fatally devouring him. That is the end of all who /745/ die of sickness. It is no wonder that with such a belief the Gilyak do not claim heaven for the souls of those who die of sickness, but have them wandering on earth, while the souls of all the murdered and even of suicides fly to heaven. According to Gilyak belief, the earth is the abode of countless kins or devils who hide in the forests and mountains, as well as in the water and everywhere. The kins are represented with two and three heads by the Gilyak, perhaps in order to indicate with the extra ones, in contrast to man, their power over the latter (1).

1. According to the Gilyak, one of the heads on these two or three-headed forms is a human head. This therefore indicates that the kins has seized the human being.

I do not know the significance of the alleged ptarmigans, if that is what they are. The heart, however, has reference to the purpose of the whole semicircle Namely, it is to be worn around the neck against chest ailments, coughing, and the like. The name kissj, however, which was given to me for it, seems to have a

116, 761, 776

"Death is always the result of the ma
the Gilyak's body, slowly devours hi them forcibly, enter into disagreeabl
the devil's advantage."

chinations of a devil, which, taking up its abode in
m. But sometimes devils seize people and, holding e relations with them, or force them to work for

/251 cont./

[831 [192] words signifying "my man, my woman," -- n'az'mych, n'an'kh. The Gilyak themselves consider love a normal stage of life which everyone must experience in his youth. This view is very well conveyed in a song which I noted down on the Amur, in which a girl, complaining of her mother's nagging about her passion, sings:

[539]

Mother, mother, dear mother,
Has thou forgotten thine own youth?

(Literally: "Thou hast forgotten thine own past time, let me be!")

[831 882 593] Parents, however, never reproach their children for their amorous passions. When the youth do hear the grumbling of their elders, it is most often due to purely economic considerations, since during the period of passion the young people neglect their work and become careless and inaccurate. In general it is not even permissible to react in any way to the sexual passion of the children, maidens included. If the [684] father or brother finds out about the fornication of his daughter or sister, he not only may not use force against the seducer, but it is even forbidden to summon him to a duel, and he may not even be angry with the daughter. They treat the amorous passions of the children as a perfectly natural phenomenon. The mother in particular is often even the confidante of the amorous secrets of her children. In many [533] songs which I noted down on the Amur, sons constantly address their mother, sharing with her their amorous sufferings, seeking advice as to where and how to find their beloved. Serious remonstrances by the parents, active remonstrances [835 762] going to the point of pitilessness, are encountered only in the case of love for a person of a forbidden category. In such cases, the parents themselves urge their daughter to [584 593] commit suicide. Often the pitilessness of the parents, mainly of the father, becomes manifest when love frustrates an advantageous marriage, one which has been agreed on since

/252 cont./

831 533 The importance of the role of love in the life of the Gilyak may be judged by the wealth of song material. Not every Gilyak can relate a story or poem, but everyone knows love songs. Songs play a quite exceptional role in Gilyak love. The song is the language of lovers. At their assignations lovers sing improvised songs to each other in place of conversation, and, if they find it impossible to meet, they send each other songs, composed ad hoc, through a third person. Special terms have even been made up for such songs.

831 584 593 762 An idea of the intensity of love among the Gilyak may be gained from the reaction of lovers in cases where their love encounters insuperable obstacles. In such cases the solution is suicide. Obstacles in the Gilyak environment are of a twofold nature. Most frequently the obstacle is presented by the parents, who, either from mercenary motives or from an unwillingness to violate /253/ the childhood agreement of betrothal, force a marriage, or when a

831 58 593 762 woman is violently carried away. In such cases suicides frequently take place quite a long time after the involuntary marriage. In such cases the woman first of all seeks to save herself from the unloved man by flight and, in the event of failure, ends with suicide. I remember one such characteristic instance. A girl from the village of Nyanivo was given in marriage against her will. Soon she ran away from her husband to her father, who handed her over to her lover, tempted by the idea of getting a second bride price from him. Her first husband would not reconcile himself to this and utilized a favorable moment to take her back by force. Within half a year the unfortunate woman hanged herself.

[847] There have been instances where a woman, fleeing from her unloved husband, has slain the children that she had

831 58 159 [682] by him. Men prefer to defend their rights to love by action. Ordinarily they seek to carry the woman away by force with the aid of clansmen, but they will not stop at slaying the husband of their beloved. I noted one very outstanding instance of such amorous heroism in the village of Nyanivo. The most respected and wealthiest man of the local clan at this time was a Gilyak by the name of Nyugun. At one time his beloved was forcibly given in marriage to another man. He slew his competitor, after which he was arrested and taken to Nikolaevsk. In the meantime the brother of the widow again gave her in marriage against her will to another man. Breaking out of prison, Nyugun immediately set off for the settlement of his beloved. Going up to her yurt, he stripped everything off himself, except the short pants of modesty, and naked, despite the winter season, he rushed in this state into the yurt, which was overflowing with people, and by his appearance struck such fear into those present that he was able without hindrance to take his beloved by the hand and take her to his home, after which he lived with her tranquilly for many years (his late wife had time to sew for him four fox-fur coats and four fur coats out of sable tails).

/253 cont./

The most tragic obstacle in love is the position of lovers in the forbidden degrees of kinship. Here there is no solution. The parents themselves insist on suicide. Ordinarily in such cases the lovers go to the forest and hang themselves side by side on two trees. Before taking their lives, they sing songs to each other, singing of their journey to the world beyond the grave, where no one shall hinder their love. Some of these songs have come down to us in the following way. It has happened that one of the parties, namely, the man, breaks loose and after this loses the desire to repeat the attempt. It is he who preserves for posterity /254/ his dying song. One of these tragic cases of illicit love has become a popular legend. The time was a hundred years ago. A certain maiden became attached to a younger brother of her father. Shortly after this, her sweetheart set out on a long trading trip to Manchuria. At the same time, she began to show signs of pregnancy; it was no longer possible to conceal the fact, and she took her own life by hanging. When her sweetheart returned, he burned on her grave all the goods that he had brought back, released his bear, which he was fattening up for a feast, from its cage, and hanged himself. The song which the unhappy girl sang at the moment of parting has been preserved. We present it in its entirety in the section on lyrics. Here we quote only the first lines: "Take me with thee, the board of the bottom of thy bark will I become... Now one must think only about Mlyvo (1).

/254 cont./

1. The world beyond the grave.

That you may remember me, keep the earrings hung up on the wall."

The Gilyak employ magic means against unrequited love. One of these means is the dried-up brain of the cuckoo, which they mix with tobacco and offer to the girl to smoke. Or they surreptitiously sew the feather of a cuckoo to her dress. But there are also other means that are not so harmless and lead to tragic consequences.

As they relate, one who has tasted these potions, these drugs, falls into a deep melancholy and, after a few days, dies. I knew two persons, somewhat Russified, who used to sell such drugs for a high price, and several women died of them.

Among the Gilyak, as in our country, there are timid individuals who cannot bring themselves to make a declaration of love in person. In such cases the intermediaries are old women, who, for this, must be given "tea" -- a present. Sometimes they send some present through these intermediaries, ordinarily cloth, in which they tie several knots, corresponding to the number of days until the admirer will pay his visit.

There remains to be discussed only what the stimuli of love are for the Gilyak, what individual traits comprise the attraction of the beloved. First of all, of course, there is the aesthetic side -- beauty, especially facial beauty. The word "beautiful" in the Gilyak language is expressed by the term poch urland, literally -- "of a good face."

/284 cont./

From an Amur Gilyak named Tys', 22 years old and from the settlement of Mkhyl', another Gilyak, Urgayn from Vayda, stole the wife and went with her to the missionary Moskvitin. The husband overtook them and began to beg the missionary not to marry them, but he carried out the request of the abductor for a certain bribe. Then the husband collected his clansmen and took back his wife by force. The original abductor presented his marriage certificate to the police, who, for a bribe, ordered the woman to be returned to her lawful owner. It ended with the husband's shooting his wife and himself. They return the bride price without litigation when the wife dies childless soon after her wedding, or when she runs away because her husband is poor and is not in a position to feed a wife, and, finally, when a wife betrothed in childhood dies.

/285/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Amur Gilyak
(Extracts from Notebooks and Diaries)

I.

The Tribal and Clan Composition of the Population of the Lower Amur

A legend. Long, long ago the Gilyak, the Orochi, and the Goldi were one people. They were born on one branch of an alder tree. The brother and sister did not know where to go. The sister said, "down to the earth," and was the first to descend.

Settlement of Bulava. Due (Kugi /Ainu/) -- 35 people; one finds them also in Patu, Tebakh, and Mago. When three men came, they found one house of an Ulcha khal'a. Mongol -- khala -- Djakhsul came down from the Goldi village of Chol'chi (1896).

/358 cont./

614 628 682 It is quite natural that the ransom should correspond to the condition of the murdered man and the wealth of the clan of the murderer. This explains to us the origin of the ancient punishments for murder among the Germanic and Slavic tribes, among whom there was no set amount for the fine (blood money); it depended on the rank and wealth of the murdered man. It is natural, also, that an unintentional killing entails a much smaller ransom than an intentional one. The entire khai' of the murderer 614 participates in the payment, each according to his means. A 629 murder within the clan finds its avengers among the closest 682 kinsmen of the murdered man and in the brother of his mother (i.e., a person from an alien clan, and he gets half of the ransom). An unintentional slaying within the clan among the Amur Gilyak incurs no consequences.

614 The khlay-nivukhi obtain as a reward for their labors their 629 fine costumes, arms, and a dog. In conclusion, it must be said 628 of vengeance that among the Gilyak vengeance is a sacred and [537] obligatory debt. And in life one must be indulgent toward phenomena of this sort. The Gilyak take vengeance frequently, not from any predisposition toward it, but from obligation. Re- [762] venge is also extended to cases where someone has been driven to suicide, but in such a case the affair ends with the payment of a ransom or the infliction of property damage on the guilty person.

614 One of the forms of clan vengeance is war. Wars between 628 clans came to an end with the appearance of the Russians, but 72 the recollection of them lives in the popular memory; they tell [177] of them in tales; they sing of them in songs. Women were the most frequent cause of wars. A Gilyak abducts a woman and then falls into the hands of the kinsmen of the abducted woman; they kill him -- and a cause for war is provided. And, in general, injuries inflicted by the entire clan ended in war. There was no preliminary declaration of war. Once a clan had inflicted a blood injury on another clan, it awaited the unavoidable attack. And indeed, one fine day the whole adult population of the injured clan, armed with bows, spears, and knives, set off on an expedition

/383 cont./

472 673 delicacies and edibles, and the Gilyak, like almost all barbarians, regard such transgressions indulgently. During my journeying to the north of Sakhalin, I had the opportunity to observe this characteristic of the Gilyak. They took without permission, or asked me for, dried crusts, sugar, or tobacco, but never once did they 673 try to take objects of much greater value. Theft is a sin among 762 the Gilyak, and he who commits it covers himself with disgrace. And disgrace and shame are a great punishment to the Gilyak. The Gilyak who is convicted of doing something shameful goes out into the taiga and lays hands on himself (hangs himself). Never does a Gilyak commit suicide out of fear of poverty, which, in view of the custom of mutual assistance, is a cause of fear to no one. Nor will any physical sufferings impel him to such an act, but he will yield to the feeling of shame or strong personal grief and take his life.

674 Murders among the Gilyak are very rare and never have 170 a mercenary motivation. Murders are committed principally in 576 the heat of passion and frequently under the most inconsequential 152 circumstances. For example, the Gilyak have a habit of wrestling, 273 and sometimes during the fighting the opponents grow so heated that they take to their knives. In general the Gilyak reaches for his knife at the first feeling of irritation, but he is by far not as prone to resort to weapons as the southerner. Fear of Russian justice has had a beneficent influence on him in this respect. The Gilyak youths, fearing being borne away by passion, have begun to throw down their knives before beginning to wrestle. But Russian vodka has caused frequent slayings among Amur Gilyak in an intoxicated condition. I shall not discuss the murders committed deliberately to satisfy the demands of clan vengeance or conjugal honor. Such murders are regarded by the Gilyak as lawful, although with the settlement of the Russians they have begun to disappear.

683 Insults by word or deed are also an infrequent phenomenon among the Gilyak and end in either a reconciliation or a duel. In the first case, the offending party, recognizing his guilt, atones for it, voluntarily presenting the injured party with dogs, a robe,

"Resuming our journey again, we were still casting about for a low, level, sandy bed, and the twilight was fast gathering, when my attention was called from the terrestrial to the supernatural. From out of the now dark and gloomy forest came a half moan, half cry.

It was uncanny beyond words. A cry from the unknown, a moan from the depths of undisturbed regions. Our Gilyaks ceased paddling, and we asked, 'What is it? It must be some animal. Perhaps it is in the claws of a bear.'

'Kaukray! kaukray! (1) No! no! It is no animal. It is the shade of a dead man wander-

1. A Gilyak word, meaning "no" or "nothing."

ing in the forest.'

For the Gilyaks not only believe in a future world, but their conceptions really connote immortality. The members of their race on the mainland, who live on the banks of the Amur, hold that the spirit of the departed one reaches after several days' journey a great village in the centre of the earth called Mligh-vo, where life is much the same as on earth, with this difference, that there the hunting and fishing are unstinted. In fact, it is the familiar [164] 'happy hunting ground' of the Indian. A distinction is made between those who die a natural and a violent death, for the spirits of the murdered and suicides fly to heaven (tlo) tirect, thus avoiding the long journey, and therefore not requiring food to be placed at their grave. How and plain, but the differentiation marks th murdered or suicide."

n what Mligh-vo differs from tlo they cannot ex eir conception of the sacredness of the soul of not know exactly where this place is; the soul need only descend to this opening and it can be found. In this place everything is as it is here: the same earth, the same sky, sea, rivers, and forests; only there the sun shines when we have night, and the moon when we have day. The dead come to this place and continue to live there in the same settlements as on earth; fish, kill beasts, celebrate clan festivals, marry and procreate. Only the material status changes: the poor man becomes rich and the rich man poor. As you see, even among the Gilyak there are two different worlds: one for the poor and for all possible worlds. Even in the new world, however, rich-[560] nessand death await man. From there the soul must migrate into a third world, and so on until such time as the soul regenerates and turns into ever smaller and smaller beings, a small bird, a gnat, and, finally, ashes. Sometimes souls are born again on our planet, completing again the infinite series of transformations. For the most part, however, that is the lot of women.

/80 Before entering mityo, the soul waits to be equipped with everything necessary to go to the new land comfortably and rather. And so the deceased is dressed in his best garmment and in silken robes. Everything that is put on the deceased must be new, fully embroidered, elegant, and durable. A man is dressed in one, three or five pairs, generally a number of pairs divisible by three, and women in two, four, eight, etc. pairs.

The most expensive spears, rifles, bows, and nets are taken from the storehouse -- and the souls of all these objects set off with the deceased on his journey.

Without these preparations for a long journey are going on, the deceased is constantly fed the most delicate dishes. Kettles boil from morning until late at night: people throng in the yurt. They eat and drink as during the best Kalyma, and a part of each dish is given to the deceased. When they smoke, they put their mouths to the lips of the deceased, and share with him this favorite of Gilyak pleasures. While the body of the deceased is in the house, custom dictates that ●/74 the dead man should be gay, jest, and laugh. Silence in the house of the deceased is a sin. When all the preparations are finished, the deceased is tied with thongs to a dog sled and his favorite dog is placed over him. For some time the latin soul of the deceased will live in this dog. The dog will subsequently be tied to the place where the deceased slept and will be fed the best dishes, and after several months, when the small soul is once again settled in its place, the dog is sold.

Finally, the deceased is brought to that place where his remains will stay forever. Here his last body must be awaits him -- a high, symmetrically arranged pile of wood, on which he is carefully placed with his face turned to west. For the last time the wife, the husband, the mother, if the deceased is young, the wife of the older brother, if the deceased was unmarried, climb up to him and weep, and sadness making a sacred fire by means of friction, they set fire to the platform from all sides. When the fire reaches the body of the deceased, everyone hastens to pay dear his tribute to him by throwing pieces of firewood into the fire. Even small children take part in this. Four men stand on the sides and, with long poles, push the burning pile down on the body so that it will burn faster and better. At the same time they break the sled, kettles, and spears and kill the dogs, which feed on the souls of these objects to follow the deceased... The ashes are covered with birch bark, and of the deceased there remain only ashes, in the literal sense of the word.

/81/ A tree torn up with the roots is placed over the spot where the deceased was buried.

After this the people seat themselves around the kettles containing the meat of the slain dogs, part of which it eaten and part thrown in all directions. On the way back, they stop for a short time at the place where the deceased to taste the viands placed there, and then dispense.

/82 cont./

/83/ If revenge is sanctified with respect to the bear, a living being upon whom welfare depends and who frequently plays a man, the same bestow on a man, but out of fear, and accepts him into his clan, then revenge with respect to a member of another clan is all the more obligatory.

We have already indicated in the beginning the domination of religious over emotional motives in the imperative of revenge. If vengeance is obligatory to the third generation, if it is obligatory with respect to an accidental slayer, to a friend, a cognate, it is a burden pressing down on the clan rather than an impulsive act inspired by the immediate reaction of anger.

A much more significant role, at least in the sense of the relations of people to people, is the right, sanctioned, is played by compensation for the soul of the slain man and fear of it and the clan gods, gods who keep a loving vigil and feed on the unavenged blood of a clansman. This is undoubtedly the greatest insult.

The soul of a man who died a violent death cannot migrate to the general "settlement of the dead," where it could continue the life it lived on earth. Until it is avenged, until the blood of the slayer pays for the power to raise in bones, it cannot leave the earth and is forced to circle in the air in the form of a bird-avenger, emitting terrible lamentations at night. It is not a bird, however, only rotting. It finally falls to earth "as ashes," dying forever. The Gilyak call this bird tabkch; it is a gray bird with a red beak, "very like a man." In this epithet is probably also contained the origin of the belief in the bird-avenger: among the Gilyak war is exclusively /84/ the result of revenge, and, consequently, the birds of prey, "loving war," are obviously the souls of slain clansmen. Over the grave of the slain man, at a fearful moment, they place a stump with the torn-up roots upward (1), to which they

1. Over the grave of those who have died a natural death, the roots are customarily downward.

●/85 daytime the favorite place for "catching" one's ardzel is lo-
●/86 cated in the house between the stoves (gnhanj); in the evening -- anywhere outside of the settlement, near the well. In the winter, in the yurt; in the daytime, in the absence of strangers; at ●/87 night, it will have gone to sleep. Lastly, there are two periods when the group spouses are free from any restrictions. The married men go for several weeks into the taiga to their hunting territories, while in the summer and winter they continually travel about on visits or to festivals. At these times the spouses take complete freedom for the group spouse. Only one thing is most strictly demanded: neither the participants themselves nor any stranger who have chanced to be witnesses to the relations of people to people, to speak, or, more precisely, of sinning, to tell anyone, no matter who, and especially the persons concerned, about such relation publicly. But the demands of non-publicity, established in the interests of peace between group spouses, with the aim of preventing possible fits of jealousy, have in no way diminished the publicity of group relations, but in greatness and, the publicity of the conjugal rights themselves. These rights have been nationally formulated in legal theses which have the force of a common property (the formulations are given below in the chapter on the relations of brothers to their wives) -- theses which each father and each mother consider their obligation to impart to their children with religious solicitude from very earliest childhood. Publicly, the group spouses not only behave with unconstrained familiarity, but address each other with none other than the tender words "my dear little husband," "my dear little wife." But the publicity, of group relations /170/ is manifested best of all in the case of the death of a man who is not joined in an individual marriage. In such cases, before the burning of the body, one of the group women (usually the wife of an older brother) sits down on the funeral platform and in the hearing of all mourn for ●/88 him as for her beloved, as for her husband. It is curious to note that during the negotiations between the m and the

●/89 ●/90 ●/91 ●/92 ●/93 ●/94 ●/95 ●/96 ●/97 ●/98 ●/99 ●/100 ●/101 ●/102 ●/103 ●/104 ●/105 ●/106 ●/107 ●/108 ●/109 ●/110 ●/111 ●/112 ●/113 ●/114 ●/115 ●/116 ●/117 ●/118 ●/119 ●/120 ●/121 ●/122 ●/123 ●/124 ●/125 ●/126 ●/127 ●/128 ●/129 ●/130 ●/131 ●/132 ●/133 ●/134 ●/135 ●/136 ●/137 ●/138 ●/139 ●/140 ●/141 ●/142 ●/143 ●/144 ●/145 ●/146 ●/147 ●/148 ●/149 ●/150 ●/151 ●/152 ●/153 ●/154 ●/155 ●/156 ●/157 ●/158 ●/159 ●/160 ●/161 ●/162 ●/163 ●/164 ●/165 ●/166 ●/167 ●/168 ●/169 ●/170 ●/171 ●/172 ●/173 ●/174 ●/175 ●/176 ●/177 ●/178 ●/179 ●/180 ●/181 ●/182 ●/183 ●/184 ●/185 ●/186 ●/187 ●/188 ●/189 ●/190 ●/191 ●/192 ●/193 ●/194 ●/195 ●/196 ●/197 ●/198 ●/199 ●/200 ●/201 ●/202 ●/203 ●/204 ●/205 ●/206 ●/207 ●/208 ●/209 ●/210 ●/211 ●/212 ●/213 ●/214 ●/215 ●/216 ●/217 ●/218 ●/219 ●/220 ●/221 ●/222 ●/223 ●/224 ●/225 ●/226 ●/227 ●/228 ●/229 ●/230 ●/231 ●/232 ●/233 ●/234 ●/235 ●/236 ●/237 ●/238 ●/239 ●/240 ●/241 ●/242 ●/243 ●/244 ●/245 ●/246 ●/247 ●/248 ●/249 ●/250 ●/251 ●/252 ●/253 ●/254 ●/255 ●/256 ●/257 ●/258 ●/259 ●/260 ●/261 ●/262 ●/263 ●/264 ●/265

●/266 ●/267 ●/268 ●/269 ●/270 ●/271 ●/272 ●/273 ●/274 ●/275 ●/276 ●/277 ●/278 ●/279 ●/280 ●/281 ●/282 ●/283 ●/284 ●/285 ●/286 ●/287 ●/288 ●/289 ●/290 ●/291 ●/292 ●/293 ●/294 ●/295 ●/296 ●/297 ●/298 ●/299 ●/300 ●/301 ●/302 ●/303 ●/304 ●/305 ●/306 ●/307 ●/308 ●/309 ●/310 ●/311 ●/312 ●/313 ●/314 ●/315 ●/316 ●/317 ●/318 ●/319 ●/320 ●/321 ●/322 ●/323 ●/324 ●/325 ●/326 ●/327 ●/328 ●/329 ●/330 ●/331 ●/332 ●/333 ●/334 ●/335 ●/336 ●/337 ●/338 ●/339 ●/340 ●/341 ●/342 ●/343 ●/344 ●/345 ●/346 ●/347 ●/348 ●/349 ●/350 ●/351 ●/352 ●/353 ●/354 ●/355 ●/356 ●/357 ●/358 ●/359 ●/360 ●/361 ●/362 ●/363 ●/364 ●/365

II.

A Legend about Pilavo (1)

1. Recorded in the settlement of Takhta in 1916. Pilavo is four settlements: two on Sakhalin, one Khet-Pilavo,and Tyr, the Golds settlement near Khabarovsk. The inhabitants there still burn their dead, and there is a bear festival. The terrain is identical in all four villages.

VII.

Religion

The soul and the ceremonies after the burning of the corpse. The soul is ccnghi, chenkin, yrrhh, or ttche pish as in a tree.

A man has: one mayor one -- chengh, and the shadows, amitanm. When the chengh of a shaman is wounded, the shaman dies.

If at sleep something is dreamed clearly and comes true, it is the activity of the chief soul, and if it does not come true, then of the shadows. Dreams are instinct. There are two kinds. If one sees a cow, there will be a storm; if a red berry, he will soon fall ill.

In the morning on the next day after the cremation of a dead man, his family arrives, rakes together the ashes, encloses them with wooden boards on four sides, and covers them with the boards, and on top with dust, then birch bark and wooden boards, which are then attached to the ground with wooden /307/ hooks. The skull bone (chengr nnyrr), which is picked up from the ashes, is wrapped in white, placed between two wooden boards, and fastened together with an umbilical cord ("the root from which man is born"); this is the way they make the nyrrh kaik. Some place the bone in the upper part, often -- next to the umbilical cord. A wooden board is attached to the ground at some distance from the place of the cremation of the dead man -- the ŋ̊nakh tyr. The body of the deceased is dressed in stockings, a waistband, a woman's hat of lynx; if the deceased is a man, then in a man's winter hat, while to his belt is attached, on one side, a tobacco pouch (ŋ̊nakhtyr), on the other, kanhch -- an iron chain and a needle case, and, in the front, mity -- a burn away, but if he survives, everything goes to the next child (settlement of Kal'ma).

1. Kaik -- wooden image of the deceased, a receptacle for his soul.

Temporarily a little balagan of bark, hyak-raf, is erected over him. Finally a little house, raf, is built, and the funeral repast is held.

In a day, a week, a month, the closest kinsmen arrive, drink, cry, and commemorate; they do this for a year, in some cases for two or three years, but if there is no one to do this, there for one month, depending on status. At of the end of the term of "observation" (tigr arkadr) -- "observation of the tree," the time of periodic funeral repasts at the house of the deceased, they buy vodka and dice, assemble the kinsmen and the "in-laws," and for three or four days go to the grave and commemorate; this is the last funeral repast (raf pykyrkr, tigr pykyrkr). They walk to the tur, the place of the cremation of the deceased, pour vodka there, sprinkle it from all the dishes,

/325 cont./

764 Funeral ceremonies. After closing the eyes of the deceased with a hat they stretch him out and fold his hands across his stomach; they (wife, mother) let down their hair and that of the deceased. They try to lift the head, putting garments under it, or, in the case of the poor -- straw. Sometimes the wife or the husband cuts off a piece of the braid. Tobacco and a pipe are placed on the breast, and the guests come up one by one and shove from this pipe into his mouth. The wife, or some other near relative, or, finally, /326/ an unrelated old man or old woman places at his head a small cup with food, vodka, and cold water; the relatives come up to him from time to time, eat what has been put there, and again fill up the cup.

764 The deceased should not be dressed in garments made of 764 leather or of fish skin, for a drop of fat might fall into the fire, 764 and that is a sin. Ornamented things, too, may not be given, for otherwise the deceased will lose his way. The garments for the deceased are sewed out of drel' and silk (pos'') and provided 764 in a multiple number, the rest in the singular. All the women 764 assemble for the sewing of the garments. The garments are sewed "lightly", so sew strongly it a sin -- "nigyf." The deceased should not be wabbed.

764 The deceased is dressed in the following garments:
764 1. L'atkh, shirts, but unfailingly without wadding; in bolt, 764 no modesty pants.
764 2. Pan' -- leggings.
764 3. Ki -- boots of drel', of the same shape for men and women; the top is short; the soles are also of drel'; they are put on the naked foot.
764 4. Hakr -- a hat also of drel'; the hat looks like a child's hat with the hood backwards.
764 5. Vamykh -- mittens with one finger, of any color; no sleeve coverings.
764 6. N'akh Hir -- glasses, i.e., eye patches of drel', three fingers in breadth. Earrings and bracelets are taken off.
764 7. Vigyr' -- a belt, a piece of simple drel', white in color, and with this only two pairs of scabbards (chekoshar') of drel' (for 764 a man) and one pure (mly) for tinder and flint.

/326 cont./

764 8. Hontsh -- a tobacco pouch, also of drel', for both men and 764 women; tobacco is placed in the mly and the hontsh.
764 9. A husband dresses his wife, a wife her husband, parents their children, and vice versa. The deceased is given nothing more than the things enumerated. Shagund -- valuables -- are hung around outside and inside the yurt.

764 Before the funeral guests are entertained from morning un-764 til night. Among the rich the entire village is entertained; they drink vodka and place vodka before the deceased. It is necessary to be gay, but they do not dance.

764 No news, or tales, or songs (are recited -- purind).
764 On the following day the men go to cut firewood for the 764 cremation of the deceased. They cut down larch and fir, and 764 for children -- rose-willow; to cut larch or fir for children is a sin. One must select a good tree: otherwise it is a sin. They cut down one or two trees. The firewood is cut lengthwise and unfailingly a definite length; /327/ among some, up to a sagene in length (the clan of Pletunka); among others, one sagene less one hand. The roots are not touched, and the branches are thrown away. The logs are placed in three rows, lengthwise and crosswise.

764 During the second night, too, nobody sleeps; everyone feeds 764 the deceased (mu r'kgyvyn achnind), but they do not put anything in his mouth. On the third day the yurt is cleaned: tax mud, the floor is swept, then the fire is purified -- tugur mund, mod' is prepared, and tugur amind is performed -- "they feed the fire" (the new master, or a classman)-- mod' is thrown into a fire started with the branches are of a fir, but nothing is

764 When all the preparations have been completed, they eat, 764 drink vodka, and then bring in a dog tied. The deceased is placed on the dog sled, bound to it with thongs, and four men lift the dog sled and carry it on their arms out to the place of cremation. A "pryvki" (dog) is tied to the place where its master slept. They walk around the future fire three times with the dog sled and the deceased, and they have a respite three times. After this the dogs and the dog sled are taken to the side, and the deceased,

/327 cont./

764 facing west, is placed upon the stacked firewood -- hap, the arms 764 folded with the palms toward the breast, and the legs bent with 764 the knees up (the favorite position on a plank bed. Then they pre-764 /327/ pare the wooden device for obtaining fire -- cahkach: tugur, namely, a vertical stick, lung (drill); the tinder is placed in the middle of a small stick, the fire is obtained by rubbing the lung against this latter, and the master of the house sets fire to the shavings.

764 Before (lighting the fire) they get up on the firewood and 764 cry over the deceased. The crying is begun by women. It is a 764 /152/ sin for a man to cry over the deceased, except for his wife. The wife of the deceased, or, in the absence of a younger one, goes to cry on the hap of a deceased bachelor.

764 The lamentations over the body of a husband: "My husband, 764 oh woe, the gay devil (crying), the gay ones killed, above me now they go another man now (those who are younger than I will grow rich, (be richer than I from now on. I shall now eat only my tears."

764 When the fire is well under way and the flames begin to 764 /152/ approach the upper part of the body, they take firewood from a prepared stack and throw it in the fire; even a small child throws some kind of little stick; others poke the body with long sticks; this is an expression of love. If under the influence of the 764 /152/ fire the hands of the deceased stretch out, this is an evil omen of the imminent death of some close kinsman, and the hands are restored to their original position with sticks.

764 At the completion of the ceremony of cremation, a dog is 764 sacrificed, and upon killing it, its head is bent downward and toward the appropriate deity: to Pal toward the east, to Tol -- toward the sea. Some throw away (put into a pit) the dog's skin 764 /328/ together with the meat; others boil the meat, for which a special fire is laid by the side of the hap, and the meat is partly eaten, partly scattered around. After this they set out for the yurt of the deceased, eat a spoonful of food each, smoke a little, and disperse.

/328 cont./

764 The favorite dog, "pryski" (every man has his own pryski)
764 is brought to be present at the funeral ceremony, and then it is taken away to the yurt, placed in the place where the dead man slept, and fed from his bowl for three years -- if it is a man, and four years -- if a woman. After that it is sold or given as a gift, but they cannot keep it.

764 Even where cremation is practiced, insane persons after 764 death are buried directly into the ground.

764 In July-?yr, if they suspect that a person died from magic,
764 two men with rifles are sent at night to stand guard at the place
764 of cremation. Birds appear first, then hares and foxes and then 764 the ormi-mik, rubbed with clay against arrows. He comes to eat the man, and if they do not kill him, then the others will die.

764 On the day following the cremation, when the fire has died 764 out, firewood and boards are strewn on it, and on top a dog sled deliberately broken; sometimes small pieces of it are kept (as souvenirs).

764 Where the deceased are buried and not burned, they are 764 placed in a coffin. Anyone can make a coffin of boards or from a boat -- two boxes. It is carried out through the door and placed on the dog sled, even if in both winter and summer it is carried on the arms. The required objects are placed in the coffin, some as models. Those who go along do not put on their festive clothes. The pit which they dig must accommodate the coffin up to the lid. There is no spring; kinling the deceased is a sin. It is not required that everyone throw earth into the grave. No signs are set up. Dogs are killed on the grave, but they are not fed beforehand, nor are inau put on them. The skin is immediately removed from the slain dog and hung on a stick, while the meat is boiled right there, but it is eaten by few, and others throw it away. Boats and so forth are broken over his grave. The Gilyak is not afraid of the 764 /167/ deceased. When "good food happens," the deceased are fed for about half a year.

/329 cont./

764 with embroidery, with otter fur, and so forth. A hoursh -- 764 muslin, imiky (a small sack for flint, and a knife with a scabbard 764 are tied to the belt of drel'. Vessels, food, and so forth are set 764 in place. In the corner they place an image of the myk (cuckoo) on a wooden support, and a wooden cup -- nyung, into which they put rice, is placed in front of it. During the building of a raf, all the belongings are broken, and everything that is broken is placed inside the raf, or, if it does not fit inside,next to it; all kinds of ornamented things may be put in the raf.

764 The raf, the sewing, and so forth are done on the spot.
764 /165/ They lay a fire, begin to prepare vodka, and drink and eat and vodka. First they themselves eat, and then they place the food in the 764 /231/ raf mu nig-yvyn arind. The pryski is untied in the morning, brought to the raf, and fed while they are eating. In addition to the boiled food, rice, bread, pans, and tobacco are sprinkled in the raf and around it. On the following day someone must come and eat up the remains of the boiled food.

764 /320/ After this, the mu r'kgyvyn is fed no longer, though 764 they come to look, smoke, and, frequently, to drink vodka.
764 This continues for from two days to two or three months. The 764 /231/ pryski is then returned to its original place. It may not be sacrificed or eaten; one may not make a fur coat of its skin, either for himself or for someone else. Dogs are killed.

764 After the death of a murderer, at his cremation, they set 764 up a tabkch (see below, pp.475-476), and then they make a raf 764 mlyway.

764 The sun and the world beyond the grave, Mlyvo. Every man is 764 /165/ killed by a mlik (evil spirit), who carries away his soul. The soul
764 /166/ is afraid and slides with Pal-n'gyvyn or Tol-n'gyvyn, depending on which mlik killed the person. The soul will return to Mlyvo in one three years. If an old man died, he will arrive there old, if young, then young. After death in Mlyvo, the soul goes to another Mlyvo, and the soul of a woman to still a third Mlyvo, and then is born again. The soul of a man is completely similar to the man.

/361 cont./

764 present; frequently, by special agreement with the father-in-764 law, the son-in-law moves to the clan of the former for joint 764 work with him (more detail about this below).

764 10. The khal' has a common cemetery, closed to those 764 of other clans. It is known to all that the Sakhalin Gilyak have 764 the custom of cremating their dead. Before the day of cremation 764 invitations are sent to all the clansmen of the deceased, and only 764 an extraordinary obstacle will keep a Gilyak from the performance
764 of his last duty to a clansman. When the "living" fire, obtained 764 in this solemn instance by means of friction, has destroyed the 764 remains of the deceased, they construct a low, little shed, closed
764 on all sides, over the place where the ashes and small pieces of 764 bone of the corpse remain, and at its side, a short distance away, they construct a tiny yurt, or rather a wooden box an arshin 764 square, with a roof. In this box they place the cup and dish of 764 the deceased, his pipe, a wooden doll, ornaments (if it were for a 764 woman), and other things. Then there arises a whole row of yurt-764 tombs of the clan. When the clan lives in various settlements, they bury the deceased in his village. But wherever the Gilyak 764 may die, his body must rest side by side with his clansmen. If 764 a man dies in alien territory, they immediately communicate 764 the fact to his kinsmen, who come and bear away the body for 764 cremation in his homeland. If the affair takes place in the 764 summer, they preserve the corpse in a cold place until wintertime, when they bear it away on sleds to his homeland. But even if 764 /362/ it should prove necessary to cremate a Gilyak in alien
764 territory, nevertheless they carefully pick up one small bone, tie 764 it to a piece of wood, and send it off to his homeland. There they 764 make a shed over it and construct a yurt by its side. The death 764 of a clansman calls for mourning. Men and women undo their braids for a longer or shorter time, depending on the closeness 764 of kinship and love for the deceased. Some wear mourning throughout their lives.

/387 cont./

507 In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a 763 clear conception of sin ("umgyrn"). It goes without saying that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure, 763 there are a great number of other things, according to our 763 view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to 763 heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun in a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is sent 763 by a fine to the injured man. When the "living" fire, obtained for 763 slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things 763 to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become 763 ill. Even this episode illustrates the idea of the sacrificial 764 /682/ stone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided 764 the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does 764 Always exist), but as an atonement for the sin, as a sacrifice 764 deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed 764 (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, 764 scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other 764 misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning 764 /821/ have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians;
764 /821/ is because the god has been angered by the sin of the Russians.

764 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expre-764 /715/ sses extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human 764 existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life.
764 There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another
764 where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same 764 ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man
764 Gilyak dead a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin 764 call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in 764 transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths.
764 there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak
764 had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fi 764 with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very 764 on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sa 764 Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when family in the capacity of a son or brother and is so considered in the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family, which many years ago had been adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the shores of Okhotsk, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement, which meant that it must be fed and supported until better times. At the present /360/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the number of women whom it is permissible to marry is thereby restricted for the clan (marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been said above).

/359 cont./

8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the debts of the clansmen. In the event of the insolvency of a clansman and his closest kinsmen, the clan is obliged to assume the debt of the insolvent person.

9. As a general rule, property must not leave the clan of a deceased person. Concerning inheritance in particular we shall speak elsewhere. For the present we shall say only that in this regard among the Gilyak the well-known rule of the Twelve Tables finds literal application: "Si suos heredes non habet, gentiles familiam habento" (in the absence of close kinsmen, the clan is the heir).

10. The khal' regulates the affairs of the community. We have already seen its role in affairs of clan vengeance. When a Gilyak dies, the khal'-nivukhi decide to which of the deceased man's "ruvn" his widow and children should go. Before the gathering of his clansmen, the dying Gilyak makes known his last wishes.

In general, no extraordinary event takes place without the participation of the clan. Quarrels between clansmen are settled, not by all the clansmen, but by those who are generally recognized in the clan as respected, eloquent, and wise persons (khlay-nivukh). In the event of a quarrel between individuals of different clans, a mixed gathering of khlay-nivukhi settles the affair. In this way, for instance, cases of theft are settled erected for this purpose near the house, where a small fire can also be kept going. Nevertheless, with the low winter temperatures and the severe snowstorms in the Gilyak country, this is still a harsh demand for mother and child, and I do not doubt but that the high mortality among Gilyak children and the generally small population of the Gilyak are caused in large part by this bad custom. I am unable to say what conceptions gave rise to it. It is not likely, however, that it is based upon the superstition that there is something inherently unclean about the woman during delivery, for, as Dr. Seeland (2) and Deniker (3) note, she is

/641 cont./

2. "Die Ghiliaken, eine ethnographische Skizze /The Gilyak, an Ethnographic Sketch/," (Russische Revue, edited by Carl Röttger, Vol. XXI, St. Petersburg, 1882.

3. Cf. Dr. H. Ploss, das Weib in der Natur- und Völkerkunde /Woman in Natural Science and Ethnology/, 3rd ed., edited and published by Dr. Max Bartels, Leipzig, 1891, Vol. II, p. 43.

subjected to no special purification after it, but, on the contrary, after about 8-12 days may return to the house without further ado. The first-named thinks rather that this /642/ custom may be linked with the Gilyak belief that misfortune will befall a house in which a death has occurred and therefore it has to be torn down; for this reason they also have dying persons carried out of the house and left to lie there until they are dead (1). It is possible that they have such a notion, but it still has to be substantiated that they actually tear down or at least abandon a house in which someone has died, which still seems very doubtful, particularly with respect to the large and complex Chinese

1. Dr. Seeland, op. cit., p. 223.

58 Help in need is decidedly more the order of the day than
63 it is with us civilized people. If someone has undeservedly
35 become poor, he is immediately assisted, and debts are paid for relatives. Likewise people who have become incapable of work because of illness are assured support by relatives and neighbors. The sick, in general, are eagerly nursed; only when the death agony begins, the dying person is subjected to a harsh ordeal. He is carried out of the house into the open and is left there at any time of the year, until he is dead. This custom is based on the belief that a dead person brings ill-luck to the house, and in case a person dies indoors, the house must be taken down. However, the sick person who is subjected to these measures is usually already in a comatose state. It appears, that child-bearing women are removed from the house for similar reasons.

52 In danger and suffering the Gilyak also help the non-Gilyak
66 to say nothing of their fellow-tribesmen. I must mention two
09 exceptions. I heard repeatedly from Russians that a Gilyak on the point of drowning could not count on help from his people, in fact, the Gilyak watch him going under, with fatalistic calm, and comfort themselves by saying that "he is needed above." Besides, it is said that the Sakhalin-Gilyaks take care not to help a man who has fallen into the clutches of a bear, because they see in it a divine punishment. One who is killed in this way is not cremated but must be buried together with the body of the bear, should he also be killed; at the same time they scatter about pieces of bear flesh and scraps of the dead man's clothing. The Gilyak whom I questioned about drowning persons, unanimously testified [224] that they always helped them as much as they could and they showed me several people who had been rescued because help had been sent them from the shore. Furthermore, in the case of a man who has been attacked by a bear being left to his fate, we must take into consideration the fact that the custom of two or three people going out to hunt a bear presupposes mutual aid. The question deserves to be further investigated, but nevertheless I believe that the afore-mentioned fatalism does not appear in all cases, only in certain instances where superstition was awakened for some specific reason.

The Gilyak help not only their fellow-tribesmen but also strangers in time of distress as much as they can. They repeatedly saved the lives of run-away convicts, for which they were often wretchedly rewarded besides. More of this later.

Hospitality is decidedly practised.

764

764 FUNERAL--attitude toward the corpse; mortuary toilet (e.g., dressing and decorating the body); laying out in state; preservative techniques (e.g., embalming, desiccation, mummification); determination of time, place, and mode of burial; interval between death and burial (e.g., duration, measures to prevent further deaths, manifestations of grief); vigils and wakes; place of disposal of corpse (e.g., cemetery, ossuary); receptacles (e.g., coffin, canoe, urn, tomb); method of disposal (e.g., abandonment, inhumation, cremation, sea burial, cave burial, tree or scaffold burial); preparation of grave, pyre, or scaffold; transport of corpse to place of disposal; procession to grave; disposition of corpse (e.g., posture, orientation); funerary mounds, monuments, and memorials; burial rites; mortuary sacrifices; disposition of grave goods; roles of relatives at funerals; economic obligations of participants (e.g., fees, contributions); precautions against return of the soul (e.g., silence, disguise, doors of the dead); return from the funeral; purification of participants; etc. See also:

Commemorative statues and monuments . . . 211
Dirges and laments 533
Posthumous marriages 588
Blood vengeance 628
Eschatology 775
Purification rites 783

2: Schrenck--1262 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

764
493
291
417
352

A Gilyak corpse in the yurt.

/565 cont./

article of trade with the Japanese, among whom, as the former told me, they are used to decorate the windows in the dwellings of prominent persons, thereby distinguishing them from the dwellings of ordinary people. Moreover, the Gilyak use eagle feathers to feather their arrows and to make certain articles of symbolic significance for their little burial houses. In order to obtain the rectrices of the eagle as undamaged as possible, the Gilyak take the young birds out of the nest, in connection with which they fell tall trees that are hard to climb and have nests in their tops before the young can fly. The captured young eagles are kept chained to the fish-drying racks and fed with fish scraps until they are in full feather, whereupon they are killed, but their tail feathers are carefully spread out between sheets of birch bark and in this fashion stored for trading. The number of eagles annually caught and raised by the Gilyak must be very considerable, since one can scarcely enter a Gilyak village in which he does not see several of them on fish-drying racks. In particular, however, the southern coast of the Sea of Okhotsk is regarded as the eagle region proper, because there not only the myghr-tscham is captured, but also the tscharngai-tscham, whose tail feathers are especially prized by the Japanese. Thus, it is not at all unusual for the Amur and Liman Gilyak to go to the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk for a stay of several years in order to obtain eagles' tails there. Like the Gilyak, their closer and more distant neighbors on the Amur, the Olcha and Goldi, also occupy themselves with raising young fishing eagles of the same species (Hal. albicilla, Olcha gussi, Goldi kāktscha), and, to be sure, not, as Maack thinks (1), in order to show them religious veneration or to keep

1. Putesh. na Amur", pp. 143, 170, 206.

other birds away from the fish hanging on the drying racks, but likewise only in order to sell their tails to the Japanese, which is done either directly or through the Gilyak. Finally, the same is done by the Ainu of Jesso and the Kuriles, as has been

G 778 532 539

/751 cont./

third time and ag they decided to k
the destroyer of t caught. It was a arms and legs. T
to the one erecte in this captivity f it. They took it of Patchā and Ca
But the monster b
the Gilyak returne

G 778 764

I now aske
and what its purpo figure was called
nated the place w (Bm. I, pp. 50,

23. Gilya
(on the right bank a Gilyak who had

G [126]

/Negda/. The wa extremities were than on the specin wagn reached from the head to where the Amgunj. I do
ment was the rule

G 778 825 [764] [763] G 778 825 173

24. Olcha
who die peacefull
wagn for the latte
tion of the Olcha based on the bird for its entire popul case had happened opposite Kisi (Kid of a larch tree (Ol Chala saw it, and

ain brought back two full boats. But this time eep watch during the night in order to detect heir catch. They succeeded and the culprit was strange shape with the head of a fish and human he monster was placed in a structure similar for the bear and was fed with fish. It lived or a year, and then it asked the Gilyak to free
o a cape on the Amur River between the village
e Tschchyrkrach and tied it there to a well.
t the rope in two and disappeared, so that when d it was no longer there."
d among the Gilyak what the figure represented se was. They replied unanimously that the wagn, and they explained to me that this desighere the corpse of a slain Gilyak was burned 51.)
. Standing in the brush near the village of Patt of the Amur) there was a wagn which was for been killed by an Amgunj /Amgun/ Nägda gn was old and the eyes had fallen out, but the ll there, only much less carefully /752/ worked hen acquired by me in Tschchyrkrach. The the ground up to my belt and was pointing with the murderer lived, that is, in the direction of not wish to say, however, that such an arrange-among the Gilyak. (2 S. R. I, p. 8.)
The Olcha assign an identical fate to those and those killed by human hand and erect no
, as do the Gilyak. According to the informa-Chossiambo the representation of the wagn is kóro whose appearance in any village is disastrous ation. For whoever sees it must die. Such a many years before in the village of Chala, i?). The kóro had come and perched on the tip cha sissa, Gilyak koi), where the inhabitants of all who saw it died, and only a very few escaped

/761 cont./

000 775 heaven. My informant remarked that Mlygh-wo must be a large village, considering the number of persons who die "peacefully" or from sickness, but he could not say anything more about it.

[764] The various things put over the ashes of the deceased, such as eagle wings, food provisions, etc. (), serve for a rapid and safe

 See Appendix 47 /p. 1227 /, 53 /p. 1233/.

journey to it.

775 766 The surprising answer to my further question as to what happened to the soul of a person killed by a bear ran: Such a soul assumes the shape of a bear and wanders in the forest and in the mountains.

[171] /762/ Undoubtedly among the Gilyak (as well as among the Olcha (*) this is the conception of a transmigration of souls, for

* See Appendix 45, p. 1224 .

they put the body of a person killed by a bear into a special little burial house (tschchyf-ngych) and bring it berries, supplies of fish, and the like (). Nevertheless, the dead person himself, i.e.,

 See Appendix 57, p. 1237 .

his soul, is said to go into the forest in the shape of a bear, with th skin and fur, etc.

[122] [196] Only the difficulty, with an inadequate knowledge of the language, of reaching an understanding about abstract concepts with a primitive people little inclined toward abstraction has kept me from learning the Gilyak expression for "soul." The above-

[774] mentioned views concerning the consequences of death among the Gilyak make it clear beyond any doubt that they are familiar with the concept of the "soul" as a spiritual force innate in the human being. The above-mentioned concept of the metempsychosis of a person killed by a bear also explains to a certain extent why food provisions are brought to his corpse. His soul still wanders about utksch and took him back to the village, where he died in November, 1854. Although when he was still alive, they had invited me to his cremation, this was done (three days after the death) during a violent purga, without their giving any notification (Bm. I, pp. 18, 19).

/764 cont./

47. Gilyak. Everything possible in the way of food is put beside the deceased lying in the yurt; indeed, even after the cremation of the corpse, all kinds of food, as well as liquor, are brought to the ashes for a period of one year because of the belief that the deceased takes nourishment for that long. The corpse, laid out on a sled in winter, is placed upon the funeral pyre, covered with loose branches, and the pyre is lighted. (Bm. I, p. 27.)

48. Gilyak. On May 19, 1856, we reached Chjare (with one yurt on the right bank of the Amur), where I had a stop made at noon. I inquired about fish, but was told at once that no fish had been caught, because the old owner of the yurt had died the day before and was still lying unburied in the yurt. I went there immediately and saw the corpse lying on a sled on the floor in front of the dogs' table (Plate LXII /p. 1262/). It was the same old man who the year before had gone hunting with me on the nearby small lake. The corpse was not yet disfigured, but the color of the face had grown darker and, in fact, copper-colored, and the long white hair contrasted sharply with the face. The corpse was clothed in new blue cloth and covered over the torso with a covering of gray material, on which, over the chest of the corpse, lay three folded pieces of colored cloth and two spears, a larger one and a smaller one, such as the natives use, equipped with crudely worked, short shafts. Around the head and at the sides of the face lay fir branches; over the eyes ran a string with longish pieces of alder bast, threaded on it, three for each eye; a large red bead lay at each ear, and on the neck there was a thick bundle of fine curls of wood-shavings. The legs and the feet were wrapped in the same blue cloth as the whole corpse and were /785/ tied with a string around the ankles and over the toes so that they had the shape of boots. Placed crosswise on the narte /sled/, behind the head, lay jukola (*), with several tobacco leaves wrapped in birch bark

/765 cont./

* See p. 646 of this work.

[493] and a pipe on top of it. The narte was of the ordinary kind, except that the arched or curved pieces of wood () in front and in the rear were missing, and instead of them straight short poles projected out on either side. The corpse was tied to the narte under the gray covering.

 See Plate XXXVI /p. 1016 /, Fig. 1, i.

After I had stood in front of the corpse for a few minutes, three dogs tied to a long strap, were brought into the yurt, and the strap was attached to the narte. Then several men lifted up the narte with the corpse, while another led the dogs, and thus the procession set out (Plate LXIII /p. 1263 /). It went out of the yurt, passing by the storage chambers, and into the forest behind the village, where the burial place of the dead was located marked by several raff (). The wife of the deceased immediately followed the corpse, with her hair loose, a piece of birch bark in her hand, and setting up a monotonous wail, in which, however, she was not imitated by the other Gilyak, men, women, and children. When the burial ground was reached, the narte with the corpse was placed on the ground next to the pyre already prepared. The latter consisted of a few layers of wood placed alternately lengthwise and crosswise, the first of which was the same length as the corpse. Beside this a large heap of fir branches lay ready for the cremation of the body (1).

 See Appendix 50 /p. 1232 /.

[824] 1. This was Pin. picea, as is everything else used for the cremation of the corpse and the decoration of the yurt.

/765 cont./

After the narte had been set down, the dogs were unhitched, and one of them led back to the village, while the other two were tied to a tree. Now the wife of the deceased stepped up to the corpse and removed the pieces of cloth and the spears, the gray shroud, the jukola, the tobacco, and the pipe, and put these articles aside on the ground. She also untied the eye binding and threw it away, as well as the bundle of wood shavings from the neck. Then she took from one of his hands a pinch of fine tobacco and from the other a root which had been placed between the fingers, and finally, untied the string which tied the corpse to the narte. In the meantime an old Gilyak had been busy spreading fir branches on the pyre.

When this bed was ready, the corpse was lifted from the narte and put on the pyre (Plate LXIV /p. 1264 /). On the bottom of the narte lay a board and on it a large piece of birch bark which showed traces of its use for storing berries and which had now served as the underlayer immediately under the corpse. The board and birch bark were thrown off, and the sled was pulled aside, where a Gilyak broke it in two and left the pieces lying there. In the meantime, others were busy killing the two remaining dogs, which was done in the following way. One of the Gilyak held the dog on a cord, another threw him a piece of jukola, and, while the dog was eating it, a third hit the dog's neck with a cudgel and pressed it /766/ to the ground with it, whereupon a fourth pierced the animal's heart with a small pointed stick. Both dogs were killed in this manner and laid aside (*). Meanwhile, still other

* On Plate LXIV /p. 1264 /, due to an error, all three dogs are pictured as present during this act.

Gilyak made the fire for the cremation of the corpse. According to the Gilyak view, this may not be produced in the ordinary way with flint and steel, but must be made by rubbing pieces of wood together. For this purpose a kind of spindle was carved out of dry larch wood, as well as two elongated pieces of wood with a cavity in the center of each one, into which the tip of the spindle exactly fitted. A small piece of fungus was put into these small depressions in the pieces of wood; the spindle was put into them with its tips vertical, and turned with the help of a strap, which ignited the fungus after a few moments. The fire obtained was then maintained with fungus. (Plate LXIV /p. 1264 /, left foreground.)

/766 cont./

Meanwhile the other preparations were made at the funeral pyre. After the corpse had been placed upon the layers of fir branches, as has been mentioned, it was covered up with a thick layer of fir branches, but in such a way that the forehead and the crown with the gray hair were visible in the bushwork. Now long logs, of the same dried larch wood as all the rest, were put around beside one another in the form of a pyramid, with only a small space left open at the head end, through which one could still see the gray crown. At the same time, several long logs were placed inside the pyramid on the fir branches that covered the corpse. When the pyre was ready, the place around it was cleared somewhat, in that the dry brush, the smaller roots, and the grass around the pile of wood were removed with the ax, so that the fire would not spread. Now the widow of the deceased took the glowing fungus, wrapped it in dry moss, wound a wide strip of birch bark around it and, by swinging it back and forth, made the flames which she fanned into bigger ones with another piece of birch bark. Since, out of lack of experience, she did not know where the fire must be put first, an old Gilyak gave her the necessary directions, and she now put the fire under the head part of the pyre (Plate LXV /p. 1265 /). As soon as that was done, other Gilyak came to help, took fire from the wife, and put it at corresponding places on the other side of the pyramid, under the corpse and then all around it, for which they used the birch bark that had lain under the corpse on the narte. The dry and easily inflammable material quickly caught fire, and with the moderate breeze the whole huge wooden pyramid soon stood in blazing flames. The heat streaming from it forced the bystanders to step somewhat farther back, and there a group of men, women, and children sat under a tree, watching the greedy flames which consumed their dead.

/766 cont./

Nearby was the cremation site of an old woman from the same village, who had died not long before /767/ and beside it the raff belonging to it, still quite new (*). This was now to serve as the raff for the old man, and its door was opened so that the soul of the deceased, during the cremation of his body, would move into this domicile intended for it.

* The little hut to the right on Plate LXV /p. 1265 /, between it and the pyre, the cremation site.

At the moment only the customary raff symbols, discussed below (53-55 /pp. 1233-1234 /), and a few bowls and vessels made of birch bark and wood stood in it. After the corpse is burned, however, and his soul has moved into the raff (for traveling on to Mlygh-wo), then the provisions of berries, fish, tobacco, and the like needed for it are also brought into the raff. -- When the fire had died down somewhat, the widow and a few men took long poles and pushed the burning wood closer together; they also threw on new wood in order to speed up the cremation. Soon nothing could be seen of the corpse except the charred stomach, which burned the slowest. The quantity of material burned and the fresh air of the forest prevented any unpleasant odor from being detected during the cremation of the body. The fire was maintained for a long time so that the body would burn completely to ashes, which are then scraped together and buried (on the spot). In the meantime the women, and among them the wife of the deceased, take up the slain dogs () and begin to skin

 On Plate LXV /p. 1265 /, as on Plate LXIV /p. 1264 /, three dogs are erroneously shown instead of two.

/767 cont./

them in order to sew a fur coat (for the widow) from the skins. The meat of these sacrificial animals, however, is not eaten, but left on the place of the sacrifice and naturally becomes the booty of crows and also of the other hungry dogs of the village. (2 S.R.I, pp. 10-14.)

49. Goldi. In the village of Chongar (on the right bank of the Amur), while I was passing between two yurts that were some distance apart, I was startled by human wailing that came out of the grass, which was higher than a man's height. I investigated and saw a woman who sat there hunched together and wailing, staring at the sky. I watched her for a while and then inquired as to the reason for her mourning. She said in reply, bulke, that is, "dead," then stood up and explained to me that her husband had died in the next village and she was lamenting it. She did not seem to mind the interruption, and when I left, in order not to disturb her in her grief, she likewise went off (probably calmed by the interruption), giving up her lamentation, in the other direction toward the yurt (). (S.R. IV, p. 17.)

 See Appendix 38 /p. 1219/, 48 /p. 1227/.

Tombs

50. Gilyak. I learned from Jutschin the following concerning the burial of corpses among the Gilyak. The corpses are cremated, and the ashes are buried in a vessel in the ground, /768/ over which a little burial hut (raff) is erected (*). The small points on the roof of the raff, as shown in the illustration Plate LXVIII /p. 1268 /, Fig. 1) are called kargha (the r pronounced with a burr). In the interior of the raff there is a small liner-covered or cloth-covered board, pierced in the center and equipped with a peg, as a sign that a corpse is buried under the ground.

* See the divergent statement in Appendix 48, p. 1227.

/768 cont./

the ground is likewise said to mark a place where a corpse is buri- (Bm. I, p. 18.)

51. Gilyak. In September, 1854, the Gilyak of Kulk discovered that one of their burial houses, raff, had been destroyed by Russian soldiers and the ground on which it had stood was dug up, and they came to complain about it. I then learned that the ashes of cremated corpses are under the little houses and variously colored rags, peculiar implements, and the like are deposited there. Near Kulk, in the birch forest along the Amur, four or five such small houses stood together and formed a burial place, while such structures are otherwise often found individually in the midst of the forest. The Gilyak said that in the destroyed little house the ashes of six children's corpses were in one vessel, over which the same number of sable furs had been placed. The latter was done in order to prevent a sudden dying of their children such as had taken place during the year. Now, since the house had been destroyed, they feared the return of the epidemic. (Bm. I, pp. 15, 16.)

52. Gilyak. Every spot where a corpse is deposited or a dead person's ashes are to be found is regarded by the Gilyak as sacred and inviolable to some extent. No Gilyak therefore would wantonly touch a raff. Moreover, the latter may never be transferred to another place. This would be ultsch. Therefore, though the Gilyak from Kulk bewailed and complained about the plundering and destruction of their raff, they nevertheless decided not to transport the remains to the villages to which they themselves had moved from Kulk. (Bm. I, p. 56.)

53. Gilyak. If one investigates the interior of a little burial-house he always finds in it a longish little board in an upright position: kakk, also tars. The middle of it is pierced, and the hole has a peg, kylms, stuck in it, a strip of linen is wound around the board, and sometimes the lower end, too, is wrapped in linen and decorated with various rags, kakk- or tars-raw2 (Plate LXVIII /p. 1268 /, Fig. 2). Close to the board and likewise in an upright position there is a little stick, pyk-ngir

764 /768 cont./
on the upper end of which is set a small spoon-shaped wooden bowl (Plate LXVII /p. 1268 /. Fig. 4); moreover, there is a small stick whose point is inserted into the quills of 1-3 and four eagle-feathers, tscham-ngar () (ibid., Fig. 5), and a third small stick, hook-shaped at the top, tutut or pyk, is carved out of a branch (ibid., Fig. 3). Also lying in the little house, usually crossed over one another, are a couple of arrows without points, variously colored rags, baskets of birch bark, wooden plates with carving, and the like. Sometimes several of the aforementioned boards are present, and they /769/ then do not occupy the middle of the little house. That is probably regulated by the number of corpses whose remains rest under the little house. (Bm. I, pp. 16, 51, 69.)

 Tcham-eagle.

54. Gilyak. According to Sirgin's explanation, a bit of [765] the skull and head hair from the remains of the cremated corpse is placed in the middle of the kakk where a wooden peg is driven in. The rags around the kakk signify garments which the dead person needs (on the journey of his soul). Also, various kinds of food, such as berries and fish, are set down for the deceased as long as the corpse is still in the yurt and later, after the cremation, for the ashes in the raff, therefore in every raff one finds all kinds of implements, baskets, and bowls of birch bark and the like, on which the food is placed. The little stick with the small bowl at the tip is to serve the dead for more quickly journeying on (therefore as a walking stick); the eagle feathers on the other stick are supposed to lend wings, as it were, to the soul. (Bm. I, p. 54.)

832 55. Gilyak. According to the information by Judin from Tebach, the little stick, tutut or pyk (*), which one finds in the

* Pyk occasionally alternates with pyt in the author's work.

764 /769 cont./
532 raff next to the kakk, is supposed to represent a dove (tutut) or a cuckoo (pyk). The former is for a man, the latter for a woman. On the cuckoo the author also mentions that the small stick with the bowl, in which berries and the like are placed as food for the bird, hence the designation tutut-ngir and tutut-ngit or pyk-ngir and pyk-ngit, the dove or cuckoo bowl, for these sticks. The representation is the same for both birds, for it only most crudely
764 shows a bird's head by means of a couple of notches. The word pittyssj, on the other hand, designates another item in the raff. It is a small framework of little sticks (), on which hang berries,

 According to the appended, very cursory sketch, a triangle attached to a stick, on which various articles are hung.

tobacco, etc., the purpose of which remains unknown to me. On the tscham-ngar, Judin said, six feathers are placed for a de-[832] ceased man and eight for a woman. Since these are supposed to be a means for the more rapid journeying on of the soul, perhaps this takes into account the difference in physical strength and -- according to the Gilyak view of women -- also the difference in psychic energy of the two sexes. The tutut or pyk is supposed to have almost the same purpose as the tscham-ngar, which is very probable on the basis of the explanation given by Judin concerning these objects. (Bm. I, p. 87.)

764 56. Gilyak. Near the village of Tacht (on the right bank 184 of the Amur) a newly erected raff stood very close to the bank and close to it a pittyssj, i.e., a storage chamber for the raff, which is therefore called raff-njo on Sakhalin. It consists of a small roof which rests on two poles, similar to a small dovecot. Its roof is higher than the raff. Under the roof of the pittyssj, berries, fish, and the like are hung for the deceased.

764 In Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I found an ex-
184 tremely elegant raff which a rich Gilyak, Kimrkan, had erected 556 in memory of his wife, a daughter of Judin's, and his daughter. On the outside it was provided with carvings and arabesques of various kinds. The /770/ carving, painted black, red, and white,

764 /770 cont./
184 represented various animals, bears, horses, hares, cocks, and 556 ducks (Plate LXIX /p. 1269 /).

On the inside the raff was very opulently equipped. The usual articles in it, kakk, pyk-ngir, tcham-ngar, were so luxuriously made that they could hardly be recognized. The former was completely covered with a multicolored cloth, which bore brass ornaments such as the Gilyak women have on their robes, corresponding to the purpose of the kakk, namely, to carry the clothing for the deceased. -- Do the rags on the kakk perhaps come from the garments of the deceased? Very probably, since these rags are called okch, fur. -- A small Manchurian bowl served as pyk-ngir. The floor of the raff was covered with a fine reed or straw mat. Aside from the articles mentioned, there also lay in the raff a great number of birch-bark bowls (with berries, etc.), neatly stacked up, a small box in which lay a tobacco pouch and a pipe, another pipe which was for Kimrkan's daughter, and the like, and, finally, the braids of the two deceased women, cut off at the roots and wrapped in birch bark were preserved here (*).

* See p. 615, where raff is to be read instead of rakk.

764 Kimrkan himself took out the articles and showed them to me, evidently, however, without thinking much about the dead. Moreover, he had now replaced his late wife with three of them. Near the raff there was the cremation site of a corpse and next to it stood the raff that went with it. The raff is never erected directly over the ashes of the deceased, but apart from them ().

 The reports concerning this, collected by the author in various places, differ in part from one another; cf. 47 /p. 1227/, 48 /p. 1227/, 51 /p. 1233/.

Kimrkan's deceased, for example, were cremated far in the forest, and their ashes were there, while the raff stood here near

764 /770 cont./
184 the village. The raff, then, is a memorial erected for the de-556 ceased.

[1178] The cremation site was very simply marked: the ashes heaped together, enclosed in an elongated frame formed by four boards set vertically, and this covered with boards; around the boards of the frame, however, little sticks with zach were placed (see Plate LXV /p. 1268 /, on the right in the middle distance).

There was no pittyssj in Kalm. I learned that such is set [1184] up for a deceased person only if no snow has yet fallen at the time of death; otherwise it would be uitsch to set up a pittyssj. (2 S.R. I, pp. 4-6.)

764 57. Gilyak. According to Sirgin's report, not every de-184 ceased person is given a raff. If a very small infant dies, the [1195] corpse is not cremated, but simply wrapped and buried in the ground, and no raff is erected for it, for the soul of such a child does not wander, but goes to heaven. If larger children die, the corpses are cremated, and one raff is erected for two of them. Each adult gets a raff, men and women. The corpse of a person who has drowned is cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes; rather, a stick is stuck in the ground and a boat is placed next to it. If a Gilyak dies /771/ from being wounded by a bear the corpse is not cremated, but deposited in a structure which is especially erected out of beams crossing at the ends. Such a burial house is called tschchyl(*)-ngych and usually is located in

* Tschchyl--the bear.

[1195] the forest where the deceased fell in the fight with the bear. The 764 soul of such an unfortunate person does not go to heaven. The [1222] burial house has a small opening through which all kinds of foods [1255] are deposited for the deceased, such as berries, fish, groats, etc. Inasmuch as these articles lie next to the corpse, they acquire a strong curative power against various sicknesses, and ailing Gilyak customarily go to such a burial house and eat some of the food deposited there, which cures them at once. The [1169] depositing of food in such a structure goes on for months and years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure.

/771 cont./
020 years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure. The corpse 764 of a person killed by an ate (tiger and leopard) is taken to a simi-
184 lar burial house, supplied with food, and the latter is used as a
[1195] remedy. (Bm. I, pp. 54-56.)

58. Gilyak. Between Hokk and Kalm (on the right bank of the Amur), I passed on the bank the tomb of a Gilyak who had met misfortune in the river. Here stood a small low house, in the manner of all Gilyak graves, surrounded by birch-bark baskets and bowls of various sizes, which were strung on the adjacent brush. This is the usual general custom of the Gilyak for designating the grave sites of persons and animals (bears, etc.). Next to the tomb lay a boat, probably the one in which the accident had occurred (). (1. S.R. I, p. 7.)

 Cf. Pl. LXVII /p.1267 /.

764 59. Gilyak. The inhabitants of the villages of Kuk, Hokk, 184 and Tschilvi (on the right bank of the Amur) are said to inter [1178] their corpses, but the others, including those of Taur-wo and the villages up to Chiare (incl.), cremate them and erect raff for [162] them. I personally saw many raff in Chiare. In the villages named, however, the population is in part Tunguisic. (2 S.R. I, p. 8.)

764 60. Gilyak. Near My (on the Amur-Liman) I saw a fresh 184 Gilyak grave. The raff was not yet erected, the ashes (of the [1178] cremated corpse) were covered with boards set vertically and horizontally, and at each of their two ends there was wood shaving (zach). (2 W.R. II, p. 38).

764 61. Gilyak. If a Gilyak is murdered, his corpse is likewise
184 (like all others) cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes
532 in the forest; instead, a wagn is set up (). It is made out of a tree trunk which is dug out of the soil with the roots. The various root-branches serve to represent the head, arms, and legs of the

 See Appendix 22 /p. 1206/.

G 778 /772 cont./
532 1. (cont.)
764 members of a village -- or -- as in the case
184 of a suicide -- it is automatically omitted.
823
764 Since the soul of a murdered person flies to heaven, it does 764 not need any of the articles such as are placed in the raff for the 1715 wandering soul of a person who died a natural death. (Bm. I, pp. 82-84.)

764 62. Gilyak. As the Gilyak (on the west coast of Sakhalin)
184 told me, they burn their corpses and erect wagn over the ashes
764 of murdered persons. (2 W.R. I, p. 8.)
1708 63. Gilyak. The Tymy Gilyak assembled in Ngachd-wo
764 (on the left bank of the Tymy on Sakhalin) said that they like-
184 wise usually burn their corpses, as is done along the Amur, in the Liman, and on the west coast of Sakhalin up to Arkai (excl.). A raff is erected over the ashes of the cremated corpse and, as along the Amur, has a kakk, pyk or tutut, and pyk-ngir or tutut-ngir in it. The pittyssj is present in the raff and among the Tymy Gilyak bears the designation raff-njo, that is, burial-house storage-chamber, which wholly corresponds to its significance. Only the tscham-ngar is missing (*). (2. W.R.I, p. 45.)

* See Appendix 53 /p. 1233/, 55 /p. 1234/.

64. Gilyak. From Arkai on, along the west coast of 764 Sakhalin, south to Pilja-wo, the last Gilyak village, the Gilyak
184 are said not to cremate their corpses which is regarded as uitsch, 1171 but to deposit them in a coffin in small houses, just as among the Tunguisic tribes of Manchuria and Sakhalin and the Ainu (2 W. R. I, pp. 8, 43.)

/773/ According to another report, the corpses are interred south of Arkai (2 W.R. II, p. 26).

65. Olcha. In the forest not far from the Russian village of G 764 Bogorodskoje in the vicinity of the Olcha village of Pali (Pali 531 on the map, on the right bank of the Amur), there were two very gracefully worked Olcha tombs ornamented with various paintings

Gi /776 cont./
766 fir branches were lacking, which is not permissible for a person who has been torn to pieces by a bear.

Gi The inhabitants of individual villages and localities differ 764 with respect to the position in which they put the corpse in the 823 coffin in relation to the points of the compass. The decisive 184 factor seems to be, not the sun, but, among the coastal dwellers, the sea, and, among the Amur dwellers, the river. But different customs prevail, depending on the locality. The Orochi of the coast from Naugmar to Idi are said to place the corpse in the igda-chldochs with the head toward the sea, that is, to the east. At the Orochi tomb in Pjedanj, however, the head was turned toward the Pje River, that is, to the west. The Olcha of Pjedanj, like those on the Amur River in the villages of Kidsi, Gi Dshai, etc., give their dead this same position in the chldochs.
162 In de Carries the chldochs, which are not far from the village and are said to belong to the Olcha who died there, although the entire population now consists of Orochi, have their doors toward the west, that is, toward the distant Amur River, and not toward the sea to the east. The door on the chldochs, however, is always at the head end of the burial house. Thus, these Olcha, if they actually were such, had it oriented according to the customs of their homeland. But the same custom is not found in all the villages on the Amur. In Daracha, for instance, on the left bank of the Amur, where its direction is to the north, the corpses are said to be placed on one side in the coffin, so that they are turned with the face and the chest toward the east, while the head is in upstream direction toward the south, the feet in a downstream direction toward the north. Among the Gilyak, the 764 river seems to be absolutely decisive for the position of the raff, 823 because I always saw the door of the raff turned toward the river, no matter what its direction was, for example, in Kuik, Kalgio, Tacht, Kalm, and Chjare, in the first two places, therefore, toward the south; at the latter, toward the west. (2 S.R. I, pp. 25-27)
000 /Page 777 contains a list of errata which have been corrected in the text./

Gilyak

2: Schrenck--1263 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

9: Hawes--243-244 T-3 (
116, 562, 764, 775

"Crying and loud taking fill the hu and all vie with each other in showi eschewed, pipes are broken in piec
If the deceased be a man, similar maintainer of the hearth, he [244] h only; and therefore his body requir days. As with the woman, over the have not yet gained that supernatura raiment is necessary on their long At the end of the lying-in-state, i for the man, the corpse is taken ou team of dogs. The shuba is taken o ties, the journeys have been made, gained by purification."

t. The mourners loose their hair from the pigtails, ng their abandonment of pleasure. Luxuries are es, and the tobacco is allowed to fall out.
ceremonies are gone through, but as he is not the
as to give an account of his doings to three gods es only three garments, and lies in the hut but thre other garments is worn a shuba; for their spirits
l capacity which defies the elements, and warm journeys.
.e. on the fifth day for the woman and on the fourth of the hut and laid on a narta, a sledge drawn by a f, for although the soul has not yet its divine facul-and it is no longer needed. These are now to be

9: Hawes--244-245 T-3
116, 764, 775

"At this juncture some of the f tery, which every village posses impossible for a stranger to find is built of cleanly stripped sticks the ends of the sticks projecting, sticks, moss, twigs, and larch c family hastily construct with plan two and a half feet long, broad an a hole in the side, or a little doo made, for they are anxious to fin therefore they use material whic hand.

To erect the raff for the recept tion has been given would be an i cortège is about to start. The jou soul is now ready, and only awai divine capacities.

The cortège is followed by a cr hair, loudly crying and weeping t other in enumerating the virtues of ollowers leave the crowd and run quickly to the ceme-ses in the secluded depths of the forest, in a spot quit

. There on a site chosen by the family, a funeral pyre of the height of a man. It is of diamond shape, with and eight layers in height. On the top are more dried hips. At a few feet from the pyre these friends of the nks of wood a little hut-like building called a raff, abo nd high, with a sloping roof. This little structure has r, which looks towards the pyre. Great haste has to b ish their work before the procession arrives, and h has been prepared by the friends of the dead before-tion of the soul of the deceased before the divine sancnsult to the gods; therefore the followers wait until th urneys to the gods [245] have been duly made, and the ts the purification by fire, which shall assure to it rowd of kindred and acquaintances, with dishevelled ears of sincerity or convention. They vie with each their dead comrade, hoping thereby to gain his protecti

2: Schrenck--1268 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

LXVIII.

764
532

764

1. Gilyak tomb. 2-5. Objects of symbolic significance found in the tomb.

5: Schrenck--1269 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

LXIX.

764
532

An extraordinarily elaborate Gilyak tomb.

9: Hawes--245-246 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak-1-2
116, 764, 774, 775, 825

"As the flames lick up the pyre, the soul takes refuge in the raff [LSS: a funeral hut] through the hole or opened door, thence to emerge later and begin its long journey to that other world village of Mligh-vo, which the Amur Gilyaks say is in the centre of the earth, but the Sakhalin Tro and Tim Gilyaks say is 'There'—pointing to the east—'where the sun rises.'

Since it is necessary that the spirit of the deceased shall travel as he was accustomed on earth, the spirits of the dogs, the sledge, etc., must all be released. The dogs, in number according to the wealth of the departed, are all killed, being strangled or beaten to death. The sledge is broken, and so are also his spear (kakh), his bow (punch), and his arrows (ku), and quiver (kh'm), or if the deceased [246] be a woman, then her ear-rings (mestch) [LSS: Erratum; it should read meskh] rings (koi-ba), and her fish-knife (ungu-dzhakho). All these articles will be needed by the deceased in the future life; but they must be broken in order to finish their earthly existence, and to give release to their spirits. Every object has its soul, which resembles it. This is set free in the case of inanimate objects only on being broken, and is then used by the soul of the deceased. To burn them is not to be thought of, because they cannot have that honour done them.

Camping out on the banks of the river Tim in the forest, we were casting around one night for fuel, when Mr. X. came upon a bit of shaped board which he was about to throw on the fire, when Vanka stopped him, crying out, 'No, no'. Uich, uich'. It is a piece of a Gilyak canoe.' Purification by fire is reserved only for are not shot, nor are their throats cut, for if any of them hac appear in the next world with this grave personal defect."

9: Hawes--245-246 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 764, 774, 775, 825

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

342 291
231

Feeding a bear.

the sea. Both the Nivkhi dwelling and every river had its yz', who took care 771 of man. The sky was thought to be inhabited by "sky people." The sky people—the sun and moon—had no close relations with man, but the Nivkhi 776 were always in close relations with the yz'. "Receiving" from them fish, sea animals, etc., the Nivkhi had to "give" them in return—to sacrifice to them. The cult connected with the "masters" of nature was of pronounced clan character.

The "mountain man," the "sea man" and the bear, in the Nivkhi 796 thinking, were common to the clan. And the bear festival (chkhyf-le- 614 kherno—"bear game") was a clan festival. The clan which celebrated the 231 festival assumed the expense and work of arranging it. This festival was [769] connected with the cult of the dead, since it was usually held in memory of a dead clan kinsman. A bear cub was caught in the taiga or bought and placed in a special frame building. The cub was reared by members of the given clan. On specific days it was taken out and led on a chain through the encampment. The bear was reared for several years. Before the festival, all the clan members gave the bear's master products and money. The master's family prepared food for the holiday (usually held in February), built a platform—a shooting ground with one or several pairs of trees—poles hung with ritual shavings (inau) and covered with carving. The bear was tied between them. The honorary duty of killing the bear was given the narkha—people of the clan in the relationship of "son-in-law" to the clan holding the festival. The festivities sometimes lasted several days and consisted of a complex ceremony of killing the bear with a bow and arrow, ritual feasting on the bear meat, the sacrifice of dogs, and so on. The bearskin with the head was lowered into the yurt through the smoke vent on a high pole. In the intervals between eating, there were dog races, [526] shooting matches with bow and arrow, fencing with sticks, and dancing. After the festival the head and bones of the bear, the ritual utensils et cetera were put away in the special clan storehouse. Wherever a Nivkhi lived, he retained his contact with his clan storehouse, where he always brought the skulls of the bears he killed.

The burial rites of the Nivkhi differed sharply from those of the 764 ●
Tunguso-Manchurians of the Amur regions. The Nivkhi characteristically

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

● 764 burned their dead, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burning, they broke the sled on which they had brought the corpse and killed dogs. Their meat was cooked in large cauldrons and eaten on the spot. The "sendoff of the soul" took place several days later, on the day of the "lifting the tree," as the cemetery was called. There they built a raf—a little hut for the figurine which represented the dead.

At the cemetery more dogs were killed on this day. The women sewed clothing for the figurines. Models of hunting and fishing gear were attached to the figurine, and a variety of household articles were laid with it. The real gun, kettle, teapot and other articles were broken nearby. It was held [775] that on this day the soul migrated in a sled into the world of the dead, situ- [614] ated underground. The dead were buried only by members of their clan.

A variety of taboos were connected with the fire, whose "master" 372 spirit was an old woman. The shaman's duties among the Nivkhi were 784 connected with "healing" and with the constant struggle with the evil spirits, milk and kinr, which caused illness and death. The shamans had 756 their own helping spirits (kekhn). However, shamanism was not greatly de- 779 veloped among the Nivkhi. It is interesting that the shamans did not take any [614] part in the clan cults.

538 Folk Arts

The traditional poetic works of the Nivkhi are varied. There are songs of various kinds, tales, proverbs and sayings, and also myths, reflecting the most ancient ideas about the origin of the world, of nature, of various natural phenomena, and of spirits. There are also epic and historical tales (tyl'ugd), describing hunting feats, wars between clans, etc. The Nivkhi myths also include the Tunguso-Manchurian myth about the three suns. According to one of the Nivkhi myths, people descended from trees; the Nivkhi descended from the larch, the Orochi, from the birch.

531 Among the decorative arts, the most developed were carving on wood and bone, embroidery and appliqué on robes made of fabrics and fishskins. Most of the articles of daily use—wooden troughs, spoons, dippers, birchbark boxes, knife handles, spear-tips, pillows, blankets, robes, hats and mittens—were covered with spiral-ribbon designs, executed with great taste and skill. Wood-carvings also decorated barns, burial huts and dwellings. In motif and style, the Nivkhi design is related to the design of the Ul'chi and Nanays. The principal motifs of the ornamentation of clothing and birchbark utensils were symmetrical combinations of bent lines, often almost spiral, and stylized representations of birds. Appliqués from fishskin, fabrics and birchbark were cut out according to birchbark or leather patterns, transmitted from generation to generation. Robes, birchbark boxes and hats, and other articles had standard combinations of ornamental motifs, reproduced on articles of specific groups. The main colors in appliqués of birchbark, fishskin and fabric were black, white, red and blue. Appliqué [462] on birchbark, fabric and fishskin was women's work; carving on wood and bone was done by men. Many women were famed for their skill and craftsmanship.

The origin of the Nivkhi ornamental art, as well as the art of other Amur peoples, has not yet been sufficiently established. Some of the motifs (such as roosters, dragons and monster-serpents) were unques- [177]
tionably suggested by Chinese art and mythology, but underwent considerable local transformation; others (spirals) probably date back to neolithic times.

9: Hawes--202-203 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 527, 764, 775, 782, 825

"There is one incident in the ceremonial [LSS: The bear fête] which I have not mentioned, but which possesses some special significance. This is the saving of the bear's head, which is never on any account eaten. A skin offered to me, and the fells of the dogs which I bartered for were all minus the heads.

It is noticeable that while the bear's head is not eaten, the heart is. The latter will bring success and courage to the hunters, but I gathered that the Gilyak believes the eating of the brain would render the consumer bear-like, and an enemy to his fellows. The skull is relegated at length to the Gilyak cemetery, and there, with skulls of dolphins, etc., placed on sticks. This is a habit common among the Ainus, who, however, place theirs near their huts and make offerings of sake (spirit), etc., to pacificate them and gain their protection; whereas the Gilyaks' cemeteries are in the secret recesses of the woods, and are not frequented by them. What the idea that lies at the [203] root of these golgothas, is, I do not know; but it seems probable that they think the remains of the animals whose spirits have gone back to the great Pal ni vookh should rest near those of the Gilyak; or that the spirits of these animals will come back to these spots and either guard the remains of the Gilyak or at least refrain from haunting the living."

the human being. The dogs his skin broken he would

9: Hawes--246-247 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 764, 775

"The ashes of the cremated corpse are gathered together and put into a coffin-like box (paff), and buried on the site of the fire. Sometimes, as on the mainland, the ashes are buried beneath a hole in the floor of the raff. A stick with pieces of the garments of the deceased is stuck into the ground by the raff, and serves apparently as memorial to the kindred, and perhaps as a landmark for the return of the soul of the departed.

In front of the hole or door of the raff are raised two poles and a cross-piece, an erection resembling a miniature goal-post, and on the cross-bar are hung all manner of provisions, tobacco, etc., for the use of the soul of the deceased on its long journey. I have two wooden boxes—one cylindrical and the other rectangular in shape, interestingly carved with scroll pattern, albeit very smelly—which originally hung at such a grave, [247] containing rice, fish, etc., and a pair of wooden chop-sticks. All these provisions are covered with pieces of bark to protect them from the ravages of birds and wild animals."

13: Seeland--47 E-5 (no d

527 the natives of the Amur. A 361 them gave them to his daug 534 from Kola. The daughter nity, for now they do not be are regarded as sacred. D incessantly, and on other e shamans make use of them
527 Finally, many visitors o
524 seen playing cards and che
177 have taken over from the R 777 Chinese passion for it they They do not play for money emotion. Russian as well

1. The Chinese playi centimeters long but and are decorated wi 120 cards are used in

Finally, we must add tha Gilyak, the village in which brated and consumed, has The pelt and the skull of the sent a sort of talisman.
527 Occasionally the Gilyak 782 the comsumption of a pig (i accompanied by ceremonies house through the door-but besides the pig, are placed millet porridge, berries, e the people happen to have.
to and the feast begins.
On the island of Sakhalin cheung which falls around E feast, at the beginning of wh directions, probably in orde
● 764 The burial ceremony is i

Schrenck--1264 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RY2

Gilyak funeral.

2: Schrenck--1265 E-3 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2

764
291
137

"If a Gilyak dies in the winter, it is usua is an easy matter in this frost-bound worl ceremonies may more easily be carried o

Let me describe, first, the rites observ with this, as with many other of the more ference in detail among tribes (of Gilyaks)
Where the khal has been much influenced b fication. With some of the latter, such is giving up cremation for burial."

al to wrap the body in bark and keep it, whic d, until the breaking up of winter, when the ut.

ed on the death of a woman, premising that curious customs I describe, there is a dif-
, and even between one khal (clan) and anoth
y Russian contact there is considerable mo the influence of example that the natives are

"Four garments—short-skirted froc Only the best may be selected, and in cade, I have mentioned, will be used.
reason of the four garments is this. T each of the gods or lords in turn, Tol rivers); Pal ni vookh, the lord of the f the judge of good and evil; and as her after the fire, so Tur ni vookh is her each one, and the road is long and diff suffices for a journey, and she must n course, if the family of the deceased i delicacy; but woe to the light-minded four garments on their dead. She and in the next world will be poverty-stric condition, and her kindred will suffer whose majesty has been insulted."

ks—are placed upon the corpse of the woman.
case of a 'wealthy' Gilyak the rare Chinese bro-Over all the corpse is robed in a shuba. The
'he spirit of the dead woman must appear before ni vookh, the [243] lord of the water (sea and orest; Tur ni vookh, the lord of fire; and Kiskh, duty on earth was to keep the hearth, i. e. look most intimate deity. Since she must appear befor ficult, four dresses are necessary, as one only not appear before the god in torn garments. Of s poor, the god will overlook that little want of members of a rich family, if they omit to place her kindred will indeed have a bad time; her life ken even as she has shown herself in miserable many misfortunes from the hands of those gods

"For four days the corpse of the d this time her soul pays visits to the and receives instructions for the life and not leave the hut during this peri mind and loudly recite all the virtue order to prompt her spirit, lest her vivâ voce. The lord of fire, as the j is therefore strictly kept going in al ead woman lies on the nakh of the hut, and duri four gods, renders an account of her earthly li e after death. All her kindred must come togeth iod, and with all their powers they strive to ca s of their deceased kinswoman. This is done in etherealized self should omit some of them in i unior god, serves in this case as messenger, a l his force."

alking of their departed, they neve
e. unlucky, ill-omened. Filial pi elder before us was no exception ather's funeral pyre, his father be ary for his spirit to travel with an r called them by their name. That would b ety as among the Chinese is a cardinal vir to the rule. He had killed no less than ten eing a well-to-do man, and therefore it was honourable cortège in the next world."

20: Bush--102 T-2 (1865) 1871

116, 764, 775, 825

"Their funeral rites are sometimes quite impr burned, and afterward a small wooden house or to death the soul is supposed to take up its abode in it remains until released from its confinement by its escape, it has become customary to sacrifice creature being first fattened for the occasion."

ressive. The remains are first mb is erected over the ashes. At the favorite dog of the deceased, where the death of the animal. To facilitate the dog at the tomb of its master, the 346 dent showed me several articles made by the pupils, including wooden spoons, forks, bowls, and cups, and he gave me for a souvenir a seal cut in pewter, bearing the word 'Fulyhelm' in Russian letters, and having a neatly turned handle.

The school is in operation ten months of each year. The superintendent said the children of the Russian peasants could attend if they wished, but very few did so. The teacher was a subordinate priest of the Eastern church. The expense 871 of the establishment was paid by Government, with the design of making the boys useful in educating the Gilyaks.

771 The Gilyaks of the lower Amoor are pagans, and the attempts to Christianize them have not been very successful 825 thus far. Their religion consists in the worship of idols and 964 animals, and their priests or shamans correspond to the 766 'medicine man' of the American Indians. Among animals they revere the tiger, and I was told no instance was known of their killing one. The remains of a man killed by a tiger are buried without ceremony, but in the funerals of other persons the Gilyaks follow very nearly the Chinese custom. The bear is also sacred, but his sanctity does not preserve him from being killed.

BEAR IN PROCESSION.

825 In hunting this beast they endeavor to capture him alive; once taken and securely bound he is placed in a cage in the

765

765 MOURNING--duration of the mourning period; behavior of spouse and other relatives after the funeral (e.g., seclusion, mourning garb, observance of taboos, sacrifices); treatment of relics (e.g., preservation of skull or head, wearing of bones, use of hair for artifacts); visits to the grave; mortuary feasts; exhumation, second funeral, and reburial; ceremonies terminating mourning; etc.

See also:

Mortuary cannibalism 266
Status of widows 589
Headhunting 721

/31 cont./

periods in the evolution of marriage, and, although they could have influenced one another, they basically belong, speaking in the language of geology, to different formations. It is sufficient to say that among the Tungus tribes sexual intercourse with wives of individuals of ascending generations is allowed, for example, with the wife of the father's younger brother, while among the Gilyak this is regarded as incest.

At first sight the Gilyak institution of marriage does not seem to be anything special. A Gilyak will generally buy one or rarely two or three wives, who come over into his clan and are regarded before the world as his personal wives and the mothers of his children. The children belong exclusively to the father and succeed him after his death. When a Gilyak becomes a father, he is no longer called by his former name, but is called the father of the born child. The exclusive possession of his wives expresses itself in the stern custom of blood vengeance against the disturber of marital harmony. The clan is based on the principle of agnation, and marriage is exogamous.

One can travel over the entire territory of the Gilyak, live in their yurts, and observe their family life for a long time, and not notice anything peculiar in the structure of their family. In large winter yurts the inhabitants occupy their plank beds by families, each living in relation to its own particular interests. Complete harmony and tender relations prevail among husband, wife, and their children. That is not all. One may frequently encounter instances of striking loyalty and love between spouses. When one of them dies, the other frequently lays hands on himself or dies from grief. In a word, to all appearances we are dealing with the type of family which is generally called patriarchal. Actually, however, it is not. First of all, one is struck by the strange kinship nomenclature. A whole group of women call a whole group of men their husbands (pu, ivn), and the latter call them their wives (an'gej). Likewise, a whole group of men call a group of women their mothers (ymk) and a group of men their fathers (ytk), and these call the former their children.

/81 cont./

Several days later a small toy-house with a small door and a small window is placed on the ground not far away from the place of the burning. Inside the house is placed a doll-man dressed in silk; above it are drawn cuckoo birds, the goddesses of love of Gilyak mythology, and eating and smoking utensils, cups, plates, and chumashki of birch bark with all kinds of viands, pipes, tobacco, and so forth are arranged around it.

From time to time the kinsmen come to renew their sacrifices, but in a few months the sacrifices stop because the soul of the deceased has succeeded in establishing itself in a new place and has no need of anything. The deceased will be remembered once more during the bear festival.

Such, in brief, are the religious views and customs of the Gilyak.

VI

The Clan

In the chapter on religious beliefs, we have touched on the influence of the ideas of the clan on the religious aspect of the clan -- its structure as dependent on the marriage norms. In the chapter on religious beliefs, we have touched on the influence of the ideas of the clan on religious notions.

Now let us examine it in all the totality of features, tectonic and dynamic, morphological and socio-spiritual, as one whole institution regulating all aspects of the life of the Gilyak.

For this purpose, we consider it particularly instructive in our analysis to adhere to that same system to which the Gilyak themselves adhere in formulating their notions about the clan.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

527 the natives of the Amur. An old Goldi who finally obtained
361 them gave them to his daughter when she married a Gilyak
534 from Kola. The daughter probably left them to the community, for now they do not belong to an individual, but they are regarded as sacred. During the bear festival they ring incessantly, and on other extraordinary occasions the shamans make use of them in different ways.

527 Finally, many visitors of the bear festivals are also to be 524 seen playing cards and checkers. Both games the Gilyak 177 have taken over from the Russians and Chinese, but the 777 Chinese passion for it they have fortunately not imitated. They do not play for money, and they play without great emotion. Russian as well as Chinese cards are used. (1)

1. The Chinese playing cards are about seven centimeters long but only two centimeters wide, and are decorated with various figures, About 120 cards are used in the game.

Finally, we must add that, according to the belief of the Gilyak, the village in which the most bears have been celebrated and consumed, has the greatest prospect of abundance. The pelt and the skull of the dead animal are kept and represent a sort of talisman.

527 Occasionally the Gilyak also have a pig festival, that is,
782 the comsumption of a pig (if they can get hold of one) is accompanied by ceremonies. The pig is not brought into the house through the door but through the window; on the floor, besides the pig, are placed all kinds of delicacies, such as millet porridge, berries, etc., as well as all the idols that the people happen to have. [238] Then the idols are bowed to and the feast begins.

On the island of Sakhalin there is a festival known as cheung which falls around Easter. It consists merely of a feast, at the beginning of which bits of food are thrown in all directions, probably in order to ask the gods for abundance.

764 The burial ceremony is identical with that existing among the ancient Slavs (1), that is, the corpses are burned. The

1. The Arab Ibn-Foslan who traveled through present-day Russia in the years 921 and 922 witnessed cremations among the tribes living on the banks of the Volga (called Itil by him). Spiess, Vorstellungen vom Zustande nach dem Tode. 1877.

764 dead one is brought or carried into the woods, accompanied by relatives and friends He is placed on a pyre where he is burned in three or four hours. The skull and the extremities usually burn faster than the spinal column. The mourning relatives stand around the fire. In token of their sorrow the women let their hair hang loose, the men sometimes cut theirs short. The ashes are gathered in a vessel and placed in the "death house". The latter is an ordinary yurt in design, but very small, somewhat like a large doll house. Beneath it the clothes, the pipe, and the weapons of the deceased are buried. Sometimes, however, the clothes are also burned. The favorite dog is killed but not burned; it is consumed by the mourners. On Sakhalin, if the deceased was a wealthy man, all the dogs which brought his sled to the funeral pyre are killed; poor people content themselves with burning the sled.

There is no special place for the death houses; they stand by themselves all over the woods, not too far from the village. On certain days the relatives assemble here for a funeral rite. Millet, a stuffed pipe, and such things are placed in the little house through the window, and all who are present break into loud lamentation.

764 The above-described burial ceremony is customary only 182 among the true Gilyak, that is, on the island of Sakhalin and on the mainland along the Amur up to Bogorodskoye. The Sofiyskian Gilyak lower the bodies without a coffin into a crypt. The deceased is given his best clothes for the journey besides a bowl of millet, a stuffed pipe and some spirits. At the head-and foot-end [239] stakes are driven, on which hang his weapons and other objects. For these graves there is 766 also no particular place. Sometimes, instead of being bur-
182 ied the corpses are put in open cradles made of wicker and suspended from trees. This is supposed to be done when there are epidemics, and thus the very thing that should not be done is done. However, since these death cradles are isolated and hung up at a great distance from the villages, the miasmas resulting from decomposition are probably not harmful.

XV Weltanschauung and Religion.

771 The Gilyak do not generally like to speak of transcendental matters. One is advised by some of them to ask a shaman for information, since he knows better. Others, on the contrary, answer the given questions like disinterested persons, that is, they say the shaman maintains this or that, but a certain scepticism is apparent. The Gilyak are

177, 372, 764

The corpse is placed on the pyre ready for , which must be procured in a special man thods of obtaining it, flint and steel may no her Japanese, matches. A pointed stick is ced on the ground. Four men take each an stick, and pull it. This rotates, generates ced in close proximity. The top of the stick wood, or if need be a Gilyak applies his che es his chest. Torches are lighted, and fire he deceased leave one."

cremation, and all is now ready save the nner. In memory of the earliest traditional ot be used, nor of course the Russian, or inserted in a hole made in a piece of plank end of a thong attached to and twisted round friction, and ignites the dried tinder k is steadied by pressing on it a flat piece
est. Torches are lighted, and fire is ap-is applied to the pyre, first by the widow,

ONTINUED
FROM RECEDING
FICHE

/306 cont./

778 A child's amulet -- ola bituz consists of two slender fir
824 trees -- prung, which are uprooted on the day of birth of a boy; their crowns are bound with birch bark. Then they are reinforced, encircled with simple sticks, and bunches of leaves of Ledum palustre -- the marsh tea (tykr) are attached to them, as well as the sharpened head of k:khong z'akh, the head of a pike (iut), and hooks for the boy's clothes. If the boy dies, all this is thrown away, but if he survives, everything goes to the next child (settlement of Kal'ma).

VII.

Religion

774 The soul and the ceremonies after the burning of the corpse. The soul -- chegn, chekhn, yrykh, uz'(the pith as in a tree). A man has three souls; one major one -- chegn, and its two [756] shadows, assistants. When the chegn of a shaman is wounded, the shaman dies.

774 If in sleep something is dreamed clearly and comes true,
787 it is the activity of the chief soul, and if it does not come true, then of the shadow-assistant. There are interpreters of dreams. If one sees a cow, there will be a storm; if a red berry, he will soon fall ill.

● 765 In the morning on the next day after the cremation of a [764] dead man, his family arrives, takes together the ashes, encloses them with wooden boards on four sides, and covers them with fir branches, and on top with drel', then birch bark and wooden boards, which are then attached to the ground with wooden /307/ hooks. The skull bone (chongr nynyvyn, which is picked up from the ashes, is wrapped in white; placed between two wooden boards, and fastened together with an umbilical cord ("the root from which man is born"); this is the way they make the mu n'ivukh k:ak. Some place the bone in the upper part, others --

/307 cont./

● 765 next to the umbilical cord. A wooden board is attached to the ground at some distance from the place of the cremation of the 764 dead man -- mu n'ivukh tuv. The body of the deceased is dressed in stockings, a waistband, a woman's hat of lynx; if the deceased is a man, then in a man's winter hat, while to his belt is attached, on one side, a curved knife (tig:dzeko) and, on the other, kes'kes' -- an iron chain and a needle case, and, in the front, mly -- a purse with a flint, tinder, and steel. Then alongside is placed a little stake, and on it a human hair (from the wife, sister, mother) -- mu n'ivukh kiur, which will serve the deceased as an insole for footwear upon going over into the world beyond the grave; next to this, a little stake with three horns (branches), on which is placed a small cup for a cuckoo (pyk nir); furthermore, a little stake with a wooden cuckoo -- mu n'ivukh pyk, i.e., "the cuckoo of the dead man," and finally still another little stake with an eagle feather -- chamngar.

The building of a little grave house can be postponed, but the dressed stuffed doll -- k:ak (1) must be made without fail.

[532] 1. K:ak -- wooden image of the deceased, [794] a receptacle for his soul.

Temporarily a little balagan of bark, k:ak-raf, is erected over him. Finally a little house, raf, is built, and the funeral repast is held.

765 In a day, a week, a month, the closest kinsmen arrive, drink, cry, and commemorate; they do this for a year, in some cases for two or three years, but if there is no one to do this, then for one month, depending on status. At the end of the term of "observation" (tigr az'adz: -- "observation of the tree," the time of periodic funeral repasts at the house of the deceased), they buy vodka and rice, assemble the kinsmen and the "in-laws," and for three or four days go to the grave and commemorate; this is the last funeral repast (raf pykyz'dz:, tigr pykyz'dz:).

[231] They walk to the tuv, the place of the cremation of the deceased, pour vodka there, sprinkle it from all the dishes,

/307 cont./

● 765 and bring over the favorite dog and feed it. This dog is called 231 pryski -- n:n (among the Goldi -- khan'a, i.e., south); every person, even a child, has without fail his own pryski. From childhood everyone has his favorite dog, and when a man dies, they select either his favorite dog or the best dog of those harnessed to the sled and make a pryski of it. If it dies, they 765 bury it and cover it with chocks. Each says the following to the 775 deceased: "Ning yvr: hûmnydz: kys'k:avr: tog:agân urgur vija mu-n'ivukh gudûsh mlyvo-rokh (pimlykh-tokh). Vingân, /308/ erirdzenydz:, hûin pyk tynakhanî, pyk tykê, chi jerinakhana khongan pi oz'ngan, cham narskir: pkhuukuja plyngu tengu, hokharôd vêtana khan'a nyn'gir: kiur kerajâ, hyhagyskô vetajâ kzikgir:, turi kher: tozjâ, pykn'ir: pyk chakh tanydz: pyk tekê: pernakhanî. Urgur vir: namugur humyjâ pytykhu dogia pymykhu dogia, pi ykyngudogia, vijâ.

"To live near us, there is no happiness (not fate), in such a case, fine, go to the deceased, to the settlement of the dead (to your settlement of the dead). When you go, you will cross the river; a cuckoo will cuckoo there; after the cuckoo bird cuckoos for a long time, you will wake up. When you get up, you will shake off ashes and coal with eagle feathers; then you will dress yourself, make an insole out of the hair (1), put on

1. Out of the hair of the wife, sister, or mother.

this clothing, and, having made something like a little bridge from the figure, cross; a cuckoo bird, becoming tired (2) after it

[825] 2. All during the trip to the stream the cuckoo will cry; before the stream there will be no water and no food. It will become tired and will have to drink from the cup. There are cuckoos which squeal, which means that they are tired from accompanying the deceased.

/308 cont./

● 765 has cuckooed for a long time, drinks water from a cup. Go well, 775 live well, (observe) the law of your fathers, the law of your mothers, the law of your elder brothers. Go." These words are said at the ordinary funeral repasts.

769 After a while they buy a bear, feed it for two years, and then
796 hold a bear festival. If a kinsman of the deceased does not buy a bear, 686 he is treated with contempt and reviled -- "inain khardz:." "What sort of a person are you? Another brought you up, cleaned up your excrement. A good man does not even abandon his pryski like that." One cannot be tried for such a vilification. One's clansmen always help one to hold a bear festival.

587 The woman cannot marry until the major funeral repast
768 is over.

766 They inter a baby up to a week old on a tree, up to half a year old -- in the ground. If a child who died before he was [842] three days old were cremated, his mother would not have children for a long time.

[784] On the Amur four little firs with roots are placed over the grave.

[831] During pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) the dead are not cremated, but must be buried in a grave.

Drowned persons. Uiglyf -- the place where a drowned man has been pulled out. When a man has drowned, he is cremated, and on the third day they make a toln'ir, i.e., a cup for sacrifices to the master of the water, a trough, and a kinys -- a cup for the drowned man; mos' is placed in the trough, in the cup -- red currants. They pity the man; they select two or three /309/ brave men, put the deceased in a boat on the bank there by the water, and place a kinys nich, a Chinese kettle, and one rose-willow branch standing to the height of a man. At this point one man says: "Kettle, boil, steam, rise, move upwards, you, rose-willow branch, widen, make a good covering so that the devil does not see the Gilyak."

/309 cont./

764 with embroidery, with otter fur, and so forth. A honikh -- 349 muslin, mly (a small sack for flint), and a knife with a scabbard are tied to the belt of drel'. Vessels, food, and so forth are set in place. In the corner they place an image of the pyk (cuckoo) on a wooden support, and a wooden cup -- nirng, into which they put rice, is placed in front of it. During the building of a raf, all the belongings are broken, and everything that is broken is placed inside the raf, or, if it does not fit inside, next to it; all kinds of ornamented things may be put in the raf.

764 The raf, the sewing, and so forth are done on the spot.
● 765 They lay a fire, begin to prepare various dishes, and bring vodka. First they themselves eat, and then they place the food in the [231] raf mu uigyvyn arind. The pryski is untied in the morning, brought to the raf, and fed while they are eating. In addition to the boiled food, rice, buda, peas, and tobacco are sprinkled in the raf and around it. On the following day someone must come and eat up the remains of the boiled food.

/330/ After this, the mu uigyvyn is fed no longer, though they come to look, smoke, and, frequently, to drink vodka. This continues for from two days to two or three months. The [231] pryski is then returned to its original place. It may not be sacrificed or eaten; one may not make a fur coat of its skin, either for kinsmen or for someone from the lokhal.

766 After the death of a murderer, at his cremation, they set 764 up a tabich (see below, pp. 475-476), and then they make a raf anyway.

775 The soul and the world beyond the grave. Mlyvo. Every man is [761] killed by a mlik (evil spirit), who carries away his soul. The soul
[796] is afraid and slides with Pal-n'ngyvyn or Tol-n'ngyvyn, depending on which mlik killed the person. The soul will return to Mlyvo in at most three years. If an old man died, he will arrive there old, if young, then young. After death in Mlyvo, the soul goes to another Mlyvo, and the soul of a woman to still a third-Mlyvo, and then is born again. The soul of a man is completely similar to the man.

614 /361 cont./
827 present; frequently, by special agreement with the father-in-169 law, the son-in-law moves to the clan of the former for joint 591 work with him (more detail about this below).

12. The khal' has a common cemetery, closed to those 614 of other clans. It is known to all that the Sakhalin Gilyak have 764 the custom of cremating their dead. Before the day of cremation invitations are sent to all the clansmen of the deceased, and only an extraordinary obstacle will keep a Gilyak from the performance of his last duty to a clansman. When the "living" fire, obtained in this solemn instance by means of friction, has destroyed the remains of the deceased, they construct a low, little shed, closed on all sides, over the place where the ashes and small pieces of bone of the corpse remain, and at its side, a short distance away, they construct a tiny yurt, or rather a wooden box, an arshin square, with a roof. In this box they place the cup and dish of the deceased, his pipe, a wooden doll, ornaments (if it were for a woman), and other trifles. Thus there arises a whole row of yurt-tombs of the clan. When the clan lives in various settlements, they bury the deceased in his village. But wherever the Gilyak may die, his ashes must rest side by side with his clansmen. If a man dies in alien territory, they immediately communicate
the fact to his kinsmen, who come and bear away the body for cremation in his homeland. If the affair takes place in the summer, they preserve the corpse in a cold place until wintertime, when they bear it away on sleds to his homeland. But even if /362/ it should prove necessary to cremate a Gilyak in alien territory, nevertheless they carefully pick up one small bone, tie it to a piece of wood, and send it off to his homeland. There they 614 make a shed over it and construct a yurt by its side. The death 765 of a clansman calls for mourning. Men and women undo their braids for a longer or shorter time, depending on the closeness of kinship and love for the deceased. Some wear mourning throughout their lives.

/374 cont./ YeT
562 loaded down with work as she is, sometimes profoundly unfortunate, with an aged and blind husband, purchased and sold, she is [247] nevertheless not a slave. She is not shut up, as in the East; she [593] eats at the same table with her husband and children, she participates in the conversation, and she is treated with respect as a wife and mother. The children treat her with respect. They are ready • [765] to exact vengeance for her. When she dies, they will cremate her with the same solemnity as her husband; as a sign of mourning they will undo their braids, not infrequently for life, and an occasional inconsolable husband will lay violent hands on himself out of grief for his wife. Although married, she does not sever her [574] bonds with her former family and clan. She, along with her husband and children, visits them frequently, and in a year of misfortune she and her husband and children will find assistance and a hearty welcome there. If her husband should offend her without cause, she will find protection in the family of her father, and true protection: they will return the bride price and take her back.

595 Polygamy is found to a limited extent. The causes of polygamy lie in part in the above-mentioned conjugal rights of [589] brothers. It is not by chance that there are so many bachelors among the Gilyak, /375/ frequently without special reasons, such as poverty, etc. Then, again, barren wives, as well as the desire to have a young healthy worker in his old age, impel the Gilyak to provide himself with two or three wives, whom he gradually acquires. It is noteworthy that in the settlements closest to the Aleksandrovsk post, even in such a large settlement as Arkyvvo, I did not encounter a single case of polygamy.

595 This is explained, of course, by the influence of the Rus-197 sians. Polygamy often produces quarrels between wives, and the husband, of course, most frequently takes the side of the favorite wife, yet that division into lawful wives and concubines, as in the Eastern harems, does not exist among the Gilyak.

831 Two words concerning sexual morality. In their talk the Gilyak are not very irreproachable. Young maidens allow themselves to use words and expressions that are not tolerated by the

/410 cont./
302 1. I later saw something similar among the Daur [171] in the village of Chormoldin: the hair was shaved off the boys and a tuft of hair was left standing only here and there, quite unsymmetri-
cally; either on the crown or on one side, which gave them a very comical appearance. The Chinese presumably also do this.

Adults, however
[053] never have their head or beard hair cut; indeed, among the [761] Gilyak there prevails the belief that if an adult among them had his braid cut and his hair shorn, it would bring him sickness and 302 death. After death, however, the braid may be cut off and pre-765 served by the relatives of the deceased. For instance, the Gilyak • Kimrkan in Kalm showed me the braids that he had removed from his first wife and his daughter after their deaths, and which he carefully stored, wrapped in birch bark, in the small hut erected for the manes of the deceased, the so-called rakk,* which

*/HRAF note: According to the list of errata on p. 777 of the foreign text, rakk should be raff. An asterisk on the latter word refers to a footnote which reads "Noted later": see note * on p.1236./

302 will be discussed later. In caring for their hair, the Gilyak are 515 just as untidy as in their clothing. Hence one often sees them
136 hit their heads with the palms of their hands in order to check the annoying vermin, or scratch their heads, which characteristically is always done with the thumb while the other /411/fingers rest on the head. Indeed, the Gilyak even regard the [751] presence of vermin in the head hair as a sign of good health.
Thus, during my stay at the Nikolayev post, it happened that a Gilyak boy was taken by a Russian for rearing in his house, but when the father visited the boy after a time and missed the vermin in his hair, he explained that he was worried about 515 his health and took him back again. In connection with this, 825 the bad habit of cracking vermin from the head or clothing in the mouth prevails among the Gilyak, as among so many primi-[123] tive peoples. My disgust at this, occasionally expressed to them, seemed ridiculous to them, and to my question as to why they did it, since it could be neither for food nor for a delicacy, I was given the answer that they were paying back the little animals for what the latter were doing to them.

/764 cont./
758 uitsch and took him back to the village, where he died in Novem-764 ber, 1854. Although when he was still alive, they had invited 114 me to his cremation, this was done (three days after the death) during a violent purga, without their giving any notification (Bm.
I, pp. 18, 19).

764 47. Gilyak. Everything possible in the way of food is put be-765 side the deceased lying in the yurt; indeed, even after the cre• mation of the corpse, all kinds of food, as well as liquor, are brought to the ashes for a period of one year because of the belief that the deceased takes nourishment for that long. The corpse, laid out on a sled in winter, is placed upon the funeral pyre, covered with loose branches, and the pyre is lighted. (Bm. I,
p. 27.)

764 48. Gilyak. On May 19, 1856, we reached Chjare (with one [114] yurt on the right bank of the Amur), where I had a stop made at noon. I inquired about fish, but was told at once that no fish had been caught, because the old owner of the yurt had died the day before and was still lying unburied in the yurt. I went there immediately and saw the corpse lying on a sled on the floor in front of the dogs' table (Plate LXII /p. 1262/). It was the same old man who the year before had gone hunting with me on the nearby small lake. The corpse was not yet disfigured, but the color of the face had grown darker and, in fact, copper-colored, and the long white hair contrasted sharply with the face. The corpse was clothed in new blue cloth and covered over the torso with a covering of gray material, on which, over the chest of the corpse, lay three folded pieces of colored cloth and two spears, a larger one and a smaller one, such as the natives use, equipped with crudely [824] worked, short shafts. Around the head and at the sides of the face lay fir branches; over the eyes ran a string with longish pieces of alder bast, threaded on it, three for each eye; a large red bead lay at each ear, and on the neck there was a thick bundle of fine curls of wood-shavings. The legs and the feet were wrapped in the same blue cloth as the whole corpse and were /765/ tied with a string around the ankles and over the toes so that they had the shape of boots. Placed crosswise on the narie /slec/, behind the head, on the upper end of which is set a small spoon-shaped wooden bowl (Plate LXVIII /p. 1268/, Fig. 4), moreover, there is a small stick whose point is inserted into the quills of 1-3 and four eagle-feathers, tscham-ngar () (ibid., Fig. 5), and a third small stick, hook-shaped at the top, tututu or pyk, is carved out of a branch (ibid., Fig. 3). Also lying in the little house, usually crossed over one another, are a couple of arrows without points, variously colored rags, baskets of birch bark, wooden plates with carving, and the like. Sometimes several of the aforementioned boards are present, and they /769/ then do not occupy the middle of the little house. That is probably regulated by the number of corpses whose remains rest under the little house. (Bm. I, pp. 16, 51, 69.)

764 /768 cont./

 Tcham-eagle.

54. Gilyak. According to Surgin's explanation, a bit of • [765] the skull and head hair from the remains of the cremated corpse is placed in the middle of the kakk where a wooden peg is driven in. The rags around the kakk signify garments which the dead person needs (on the journey of his soul). Also, various kinds of food, such as berries and fish, are set down for the deceased as long as the corpse is still in the yurt and later, after the cremation, for the ashes in the raff; therefore in every raff one finds all kinds of implements, baskets, and bowls of birch bark and the like, on which the food is placed. The little stick with the small bowl at the tip is to serve the dead for more quickly journeying on (therefore as a walking stick); the eagle feathers on the other stick are supposed to lend wings, as it were, to the soul. (Bm. I, p. 54.)

[832] 55. Gilyak. According to the information by Judin from Tebach, the little stick, tututu or pyk (*), which one finds in the

* Pyk occasionally alternates with pyt in the author's work.

766

766 DEVIANT MORTUARY PRACTICES--abbreviated and extended funerals; di tinctive mortuary rites in special cases of death (e.g., for an enemy, stra executed criminal, pauper, slave, child, woman dying in childbirth, chief, shaman, warrior, person dying abroad, victim of accidental death, suicide homicide, victim of epidemic or loathsome disease); ceremonies at the dea of animals; etc. See also:
Disposition of war casualties 721
Notions about loathsome diseases 153
Human sacrifice 765
Disposition of miscarriages and stillbirths . . . 84 Disposition of victims of infanticide 84

/67 cont./

796 sixth sticks a sharp stick in its rectal opening to prevent ex-
782 cretion from the intestines. When the dogs are strangled, they are laid down on the snow with the same ceremony and in the same pose as the bears. A fire is ignited; they skin the killed animals and throw the meat into a kettle.

796 All participate in the feast of dog meat, both men and [262] women, but only clansmen.

• [766] The following day the head of the bear and his bones, as well as the vessels, the arrows, the thongs, and so forth -- everything is transported to a traditional storehouse which 796 serves as a sepulcher for the remains of the sacred beast. At 774 this moment the soul of the bear finally sets out on the 825 journey to its "master." Burdened with the presents given to it and accompanied by the souls of the slain dogs friskily running alongside and by the souls of the sharpened sticks (inau), it reaches the highest mountain where its "master" lives, who is also the master of the taiga -- Pal'÷yz'.

796 What is the genesis of this strange festival which offers to many an amazing riddle.

796 In order to understand the idea of it, we must first of all
224 consider the fact that the bear festivals are celebrated not only on the occasion of killing a domestic bear, as people usually erroneously think, but every time that a Gilyak succeeds in killing a bear while hunting. True, in these instances the dimensions of the festival are less /68/ grandiose, but the essence remains the same. When the skin and the head of a bear killed in the taiga are brought into the village, a triumphal welcome is given with music and a solemn cere-
[782] monial. The head is placed on a sacred platform, is fed, and is given the same sacrificial offerings as upon the killing of a domestic bear; the narkh'i are similarly called together.
[766] Dogs are similarly sacrificed; the bones are preserved with the same ceremony and in the same place as the remains of a 796 domestic bear. Consequently the ceremonial of the great 825 winter festival is only the widespread ritual performed at every killing of a bear, logically stemming from that respectful attitude toward the bear which I mentioned earlier.

/88 cont./

*614 775 sought by the deities, were prematurely torn from life in more natural ways, /89/ for example, those who died from longing for the mountain, sea, and such people who were enamored of them.

The beloved and chosen ones of the "master" of one or another element, upon whose bounty depends the entire welfare of the Gilyak, pass immediately after death into the clan of the corresponding "master" for a fairly long time (in the case of the mountain people, for example, up to their second death, i.e., for two generations, and during all this time, of course, they especially shower benefits upon their kinsmen, sending them forest beasts (the mountain man), or fish and sea animals (the water or sea man). And when the Gilyak speaks of some "mountain" man or some such man who feeds him, he has in mind his kinsman, who, within his recollection or at the most that of his father or grandfather, found himself, in the ways indicated above, [165] among the host of the "masters." The time span of such a chosen one is not long (two generations at most) and frequently one clansman has barely joined the gods when he is followed by a second, third, etc.; cases of death from an attack by a wild beast or on the water are not rare. Thus, the bond between the living generation of clansmen and their divine clansmen-benefactors is profoundly alive and real. Many of them were known to everyone, either personally or through the vivid recollections of their contemporaries; special monuments (1) erected by their grateful

• [766]

1. The monument of a man slain by a bear is the frame of a bear hunter, in which the remains of the slain man are kept in accordance with a special ritual (see below, subsection 6 /p.551 ff./). As for those who drowned, a boat with all the appurtenances of sea and river pursuits is put on the site of their

/89 cont./

*614 775 cremation, and the oars are placed upright, facing each other, in order • [766] to be noticeable from afar.

clansmen serve as daily reminders of them.

*614 But the bond of the clan with its divine clansmen is 775 not limited to piety and grateful recollection; these ties
782 are rooted in a more practical and stronger motive force --
796 the very instinct of self-preservation. For the Gilyak there is no more indubitable truth than that all his prosperity, all that nature gives him in return for his desperate efforts in the struggle for existence, all this is but the free gift of the gods, his benefactors; without their benevolence, all the efforts of man would be fruitless. And the gods-clansmen, as we know, take part above all else in this life-giving benevolence; they are the true sustainers of the clan, and there is no weightier obligation for any clansman than to promote this benevolence to the best of his ability. That is why the clan sacrifices and festivals, held once a year according to rule, /90/ for the mountain and sea people are most important acts of clan life, in which everyone, in the name of self-preservation, considers it his most sacred obligation to take the most fervent part.

In the section on religion we dwelt in detail on these periodic sacrifices to the masters of the sea and mountains. Without exaggeration one can say that the whole social activity of the Gilyak is principally devoted to preparation for the clan sacrifices and to preoccupation with celebrating them most magnificently. Wealthy and poor man alike, according to their abilities and means, not from fear but for conscience's sake, make all possible efforts, sometimes denying themselves their last possessions, in order that the sacrifices be as ample and varied as possible and that the festivals be as magnificent as possible; this is the general interest of one and all.

/96 cont./

*614 825 672 ●766 But if they are lucky enough to overtake the bear-"murderer" or his "clansman," they wreak upon him their most extreme wrath. As their first responsibility they knock out his teeth with an ax, and, while they are skinning him, they stab him with knives from all sides and heap on him the choicest verbal abuse. Having stripped off the bear skin, they wrap the body of the murdered man in it (if his body has remained uneaten; otherwise it is replaced by a half-length representation in wood) and, seating him in a squatting position on the sled, place the bear head under his seat, and in this way, with loud howls mixed with exclamations in honor of the murdered man and in deprecation of his murderer, they bear him to the settlement. If the bear has not been found, they place under the seat of the dead man a half-length representation of a bear, while the body is arrayed in a cloak of shavings (1). Not far from the

[778]

1. Shavings are regarded by the Gilyak as sacred, as an object of magical power. The cult of the sharpened pieces of wood (inau; see the section on religion) plays an enormous role in the religion of the Gilyak. Ordinarily they bury chosen ones in cloaks of shavings. Such an honor, for example, is accorded to the mother of twins or triplets, who is regarded as a being of a higher order. Among the poor this finery takes the place of the magnificent traditional funeral garments of Chinese silk, which causes one to think that at a remote period garments of shavings were generally used and that antiquity has invested them with a halo of sanctity.

/96 cont./ Not far from the

*614 825 ●766 native village a framework in the likeness of a bear hunter is set up, with openings for the proper sacrifices. On the outside, at the corners, four sharpened saplings are set up, while it is decorated on the inside with the sacred inau. Here are also deposited the remains of the murdered man and his murderer, in the same position in which they were brought from the taiga, as we described above.

A unique funeral feast with the carcass of the slain bear is held beside this framework. On both sides of a long uninterrupted campfire sit the clansmen with large pieces of bear meat in their hands. Each one cuts the meat into thin pieces, and as each piece is cut off he throws it from his knife across the fire to the one sitting on the opposite side of the campfire. The slice, caught on a knife, is [688] slowly roasted in the fire (the greatest insult for the bear, whose meat may only be boiled), and then with a look of revulsion they each bite off a piece and scornfully throw the meat away, although ordinarily it is /97/ considered a great sin to let even the smallest piece of bone fall to the ground. [782] [769] After this procedure of "refined" revenge, a feast with sacrifices to the master of the mountains and the murdered man begins. First they throw into the fire the carcass, which has begun to be burned, then various viands. At night they place a guard of two men with spears over the framework, lest the spirit of the bear wish to take revenge. The sentries firmly assert in such instances that they heard the cries of the murdered man, "Ai, Bear!" and threw themselves with spears upon the invisible avenger. In the morning they will tell you, traces of blood are clearly visible on the points of the spears...

*614 775 782 769 766 With the end of the funeral feast, peace between the mountain men and the clan of the murdered man has been restored. The latter is accepted and will live to a ripe old age in the clan of the mountain people, while his clansmen for three generations will twice a year (summer and winter) make sacrifices: part to the master of the mountain, part to the divine clansman.

/97 cont./

*614 628 If revenge is sanctified with respect to the bear, a divine being upon whom welfare depends and who frequently slays a man, not out of malice, but out of love for him, and accepts him into his clan, then revenge with respect to a member of another clan is all the more obligatory.

We have already indicated in the beginning the domination of religious over emotional motives in the imperative of revenge. If vengeance is obligatory to the third generation, if it is obligatory with respect to an accidental slayer, to a friend, a cognate, it is a burden pressing down on the clan rather than an impulsive act inspired by the immediate reaction of anger.

A much more significant role, at least in the sense of the strengthening, so to speak, of this original reaction, is played by compassion for the soul of the slain man and fear of it and the clan gods, gods who keep a loving vigil and for whom the unavenged blood of a clansman is undoubtedly the greatest insult.

775 ●766 The soul of a man who died a violent death cannot migrate to the general "settlement of the dead," where it could continue the life it lived on earth. Until it is avenged, until the blood of the slayer gives it the power to raise its bones, it cannot leave the earth and is forced to circle in the air in the form of a bird-avenger, emitting terrible shrieks at night. Its end is frightful; gradually rotting, it finally falls to earth "as ashes," dying forever. The Gilyak call this bird takhch; it is a gray bird with a red beak, "loving war." In this epithet is probably also contained the origin of the belief in the bird-avenger: among the Gilyak war is exclusively /98/ the result of revenge, and, consequently, the birds of prey, "loving war," are obviously the souls of slain clansmen. Over the grave of the slain man, as a fearful memento, they place a stump with the torn-up roots upward (1), to which they

[764]

1. Over the graves of those who have died a natural death, the roots are customarily downward.

/54 cont./

825 [766] The Gilyak never directs his harpoon at a kosatka, and when its dead body is thrown up on the shore, they solemnly bury it in a balagan especially built for this and decorate it with "inau." It is not only these large beasts (the bear and the kosatka) that the Gilyak regards with a feeling of religion, however. Signs of the deepest respect are shown toward any animal that falls prey to the Gilyak. The heads of captured seals are decorated with "inau" and solemnly lowered into the sea. The heads of belugas are put out on poles on the seashore, and likewise the heads of other animals.

825 776 The animals whom the Gilyak worship, however, are not independent gods and not even deities in general; they are merely the subordinates of the real deities, the "masters" of this or that element, this or that animal. These "masters" in their form and likeness are those same Gilyak who, according to need, assume the form of this or that animal. These gods live in the forests, the mountains, and on the bottom of the seas and lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak themselves, have wives children, and clansmen. Like the Gilyak, they are mortal. For each of the elements one of these gods, "yz'" - master, is in command. It is these masters who send the Gilyak all that he needs each season: sables, bears, salmon, seals. The notions about these "masters" of each element, however, should not be understood in a strictly monistic sense. It is just the same among the Gilyak: in each locality there are simply rich people and among them one kind that is richest, just as, in addition to the great gods-masters, every territory, every stream, each has its own "master" who takes care of those Gilyak closest to him (see below on the clan gods). [614] The term "master" is strictly an everyday term. /55/ In each clan every man who is outstanding for his intelligence, courage, and cunning, and consequently richest, is called "yz'" (master), and the most outstanding of them is the leader of the clan.

825 776 554

/57 cont./

123 776 782 the women rushed to their sto reserved for sacrifices, in ord and thereby fulfill the will of thanks to the piece of candy, not only saved my life, but u companions and myself a dish
time.

782 The Gilyak also has live dogs. A dog is killed, by str sable hunting, during the bea long journey, during sickness, casions of life. Before it is k depending upon the circumsta [796] mission. Thus, during the be "Follow your bear to the high love you. Change this hair a [755] so that I may see you." Whe of sickness, it is asked to be before the god to which it is Thus the victim is a sim death, will reach the master

775 614 Clan gods constitute a sp matter of fact, these gods pla of the Gilyak, and it is most offers his sacrifices. In each clan gods are of particular /5 we can most clearly trace the fact of primitive religion. E
Romans the worship of clan g
The clan gods of the Gilyak ings, as among the Greeks an clansmen who, for a variety 775 614 766 of one or another god "maste bination of circumstances, if quired to attain such an hono killed by a bear, if he fell p was murdered or burned to de if, according to the shaman'

ehouse to fetch the precious buda er to feed me and my companions the Head of the earth. Thus,
I, in the opinion of the Gilyak, nexpectedly obtained for my which we had not seen for a long sacrifices, the objects of which are ngulation, before the season of festival, before departure for a and generally on the solemn ocilled, it is fed, and at that time, nces, it is given one or another ar festival, the dog will be told:

est mountain. May the master nd come down next year as a bear n a dog is killed on the occasion the intercessor for the sick man being sent.
ple envoy, whose soul, after its who lives on the highest mountain. ecial category of gods. As a y a most important role in the life often to them that the Gilyak element there is a clan god. The 58/ interest, because in this tribe e very genesis of this very common ven among the Greeks and the ods was a common phenomenon.
are not supernatural mythical bed the Romans, but their very own of reasons, have entered the clan
." A particularly fortunate com-
I may express myself thus, is re-
. If, while hunting, a Gilyak was ey to the waves on the water, if he ath through his own carelessness, explanation, a woman died from

/58 cont./

775 614 [766] a bear's love for her, etc. -- all such persons do not travel to the ordinary kingdom of the shades, but go over into the clan of the gods-masters who took a liking to them, of the mountain, water, fire, etc., and then become the smallest "masters" and protect their clansmen. In this way the clan pal'-nivukh'i -- forest people, tol'-nivukh'i -- sea people, etc. took form. It is to these gods-clansmen that the entire clan offers sacrifices. These are not mythical gods, not the fictional heroes of the Greek clans, but actual persons, authoritatively living in the imagination of their worshipers. The genesis of the clan gods of the Gilyak sheds light on another dark phenomenon of primitive religions -- totemism, the worship of a certain class of animals honored as the clansmen and even the ancestors of their worshipers. In fact, as I said earlier, the master of each element and his clansmen, although they lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak, always appear in the presence of man in the form of this or that animal, the bear (forest people), the beluga or kosatka (sea people), so that the Gilyak as well, having entered after his death the clan of this or that master, also assumes the covering of this or that animal. Therefore, that class of beasts that the chosen person entered is kindred to the clan of the one chosen and therefore becomes its totem. Since in almost every clan there are contemporaries or predecessors who fell in a battle with a bear or drowned in rivers or at sea, a system of separate totems for every clan could not develop among the Gilyak. Unfortunately I cannot consider this vast question in more detail here; I shall say only that the genesis of the clan gods among the Gilyak clearly shows that it is not totemism, i.e., not the belief in descent from this or that /59/ kind of animal, that created the clan gods, as is commonly thought, but, on the contrary, it is the clan gods who created totemism. As we shall see below, we cannot explain the prohibitions of the totemists against using the meat of the totems for food in any way other than the fear of killing some clansman who turned into a totem animal.

775 614 825

775 614

614 171

The religious system of the Gilyak provides many other interesting facts for the explanation of the origin of totemism.

/328 cont./

The favorite dog, "pryski" (every man has his own pryski) is brought to be present at the funeral ceremony, and then it is taken away to the yurt, tied to the place where the dead man slept, and fed from his bowl for three years -- if it is a man, and four years -- if a woman. After this it is sold or given as a gift, but they cannot keep it.

Even where cremation is practiced, insane persons after death are buried directly into the ground.

In Ady-Tymi, if they suspect that a person died from magic, two men with rifles are sent at night to stand guard at the place of cremation. Birds appear first, then hares and foxes and then the ormi-milk, rubbed with clay against arrows. He comes to eat the man, and if they do not kill him, then the others will die.

On the day following the cremation, when the fire has died out, firewood and boards are strewn on it, and on top a dog slied deliberately broken; sometimes small pieces of it are kept (as souvenirs).

Where the deceased are buried and not burned, they are placed in a coffin. Anyone can make a coffin of boards or from a boat -- two boats. It is carried out through the door and placed on the dog sled, which in both winter and summer is carried on the arms. The required objects are placed in the coffin, some as models. Those who go along do not put on their festive clothes. The pit which they dig must accommodate the coffin up to the lid. There is no crying; kissing the deceased is a lie. It is not required that everyone throw earth into the grave. No sacrifices are set up. Dogs are killed on the grave, but they are not fed beforehand, nor are inau put on them. The skin is immediately removed from the slain dogs and hung on a stick, while the meat is boiled right there, but it is eaten by few, and others throw it away. Boats and so forth are broken over his grave. The Gilyak is not afraid of the deceased. When "good food happens," the deceased are fed for about half a year.

/328 cont./

764 To be burned is better than to be buried.

766 The one made the first man[1] for a drowned man if not burned after death, but buried in the ground.

A drowned person, if he is of another clan, is not burned, but is inclosed in sticks.

If the deceased was murdered, he is not carried into the yurt, but is placed beside it. Near the place of the cremation of the murdered person, they place a "vagan" -- a tree with the roots /329/ upward. Those who have been killed are carried off the field of battle by both sides to their villages.

764 If a person dies in a balagan, he remains there (until the funeral.

764 A raf (a little house with a little door, over the grave) is 349 made in a month, or in two, three or four months, when there is time. A raf cannot be set up in winter or spring, for the earth is frozen, and in autumn as well. During this time the deceased is absolutely not fed. A raf is prepared by common efforts.

On the day of the preparation of a raf, as on the day of [781] cremation, all forms of work are prohibited for the clan members.
[814] It is prohibited to fish, to go hunting, to make a dog sled; it is prohibited to sew, even to "make one's head," i.e., to comb one's hair, but one can sing songs. Members of alien clans are allowed to work if they did not observe the work on the construction of the raf, but the members of the same khala, if they know that a raf is being made, even if they live in a different settlement, are forbidden to work. The master who helps in the building of the raf does not receive any reward; that is a sin.

The walls of a raf are made of boards. The roof is made as on an actual house. In the middle there is a kokhakh, a double board with a stopper which closes an aperture -- kylmyg[2] (navel). The sharp stoppers go through a round piece of birch bark which is placed over the aperture. In the upper section are stuck a spear, arrows, hooks, and a knife. The kokhakh is wrapped in a piece of drel[3] of a trapezoidal shape and fastened, tied to the navel; the upper part of the kokhakh remains bare. On top of this, in front, there is an apron of the same shape, which is decorated

/329 cont./

764 with embroidery, with otter fur, and so forth. A hontkh --
349 muslin, mly (a small sack for flint), and a knife with a scabbard are tied to the belt of drel[3]. Vessels, food, and so forth are set in place. In the corner they place an image of the pyk (cuckoo) on a wooden support, and a wooden cup -- nirng, into which they put rice, it placed in front of it. During the building of a raf, all the belongings are broken, and everything that is broken is placed inside the raf, or, if it does not fit inside, next to it; all kinds of ornamented things may be put in the raf.

764 The raf, the sewing, and so forth are done on the spot.
765 They lay a fire, begin to prepare various dishes, and bring vodka. First they themselves eat, and then they place the food in the [231] raf mu nigyvyn arind. The pryski is untied in the morning, brought to the raf, and fed while they are eating. In addition to the boiled food, rice, buda, peas, and tobacco are sprinkled in the raf and around it. On the following day someone must come and eat up the remains of the boiled food.

/330/ After this, the mu nigyvyn is fed no longer, though they come to look, smoke, and, frequently, to drink vodka. This continues for from two days to two or three months. The [231] pryski is then returned to its original place. It may not be sacrificed or eaten; one may not make a fur coat of its skin, either for kinsmen or for someone from the kokhal.

766 After the death of a murderer, at his cremation, they set 764 up a takhch (see below, pp. 475-476), and then they make a raf anyway.

775 The soul and the world beyond the grave, Mlyvo. Every man is [761] killed by a milk (evil spirit), who carries away his soul. The soul
[776] is afraid and hides with Pal-n'nigyvyn or Tol-n'igyvyn, depending on which milk killed the person. The soul will return to Mlyvo in at most three years. If an old man died, he will arrive there old, if young, then young. After death in Mlyvo, the soul goes to another Mlyvo, and the soul of a woman to still a third Mlyvo, and then is born again. The soul of a man is completely similar to the man.

/337 cont./

845 Gibel'ka's wife gave birth to twins; one of the twins was a bear.

[532] A representation of twins -- tongch: -- is placed in a little [778] storehouse. If one of the twins dies, they place one tongch, while [778] if both die, then two joined together on the sides. Chukh-chugvnd [782] is given to them at the full moon and at the new moon: Kinsmen and strangers sacrifice down to the third generation.

When a twin dies, he goes to his father, Pal-n'gyvyn, who [775] gave birth to him, appearing to his mother in a dream.
[787]

766 A dead twin is not cremated, but is buried in Turkish fashion in a specially built little house, in which a wedge is driven to support him.

He is dressed in a white shirt and trousers and is surrounded with shavings -- inau. The mother of twins is likewise not cremated after death, but is dressed in white and buried, also with inau placed around. According to B. Piliudski, the same is done with the father of twins.

778 The tongch: helps catch bears and in hunting in general.
[778] The tongch: is fed in case of sickness, especially tuberculosis
[782] (Slyavo).

Infanticide. Infanticide is committed sometimes in secret or 847 either for kinsmen or for someone from the khala.

680 A woman who was accused by a shaman of poisoning a boy, the son of another woman, was beaten, and, after they cut off her braids, she was thrown into a funeral pyre.

753 Illness. Illness is sent either by Pal-n'igyvyn or by Tol-n'igyvyn,
776 but each of them takes a milk not from his kingdom.

/338/ A milk can be of different shapes and often is red as blood and hard as stone, but when he enters a person, he becomes lively, "as if he were walking."

732 A violently insane person is imprisoned in a cage (in 758 summer) and fed; he must not be killed.

Khkmak'ind -- to be sick from not getting what one saw 753 and wanted. Either the one who did the seeing or his family becomes sick. Then it is imperative to get at least a small crumb of what one saw and to touch it, and the person gets well.

/338 cont./

752 thank you!" If they do not exchange them, then one of them
784 will drown. After this they become friends. One must rescue [570] an alien khal, and even good Russians (not the trumpe), but a [570] person from another clan is not cremated, but is sur-[623] rounded with sticks.
[766]

After the rescue and the shavynd procedure, the shaman must /339/ carry out his procedure: he sends his spirit lekhn to Tol for a small soul, which lies there on a small bed.

When a person who was drowning returns to a boat rescued from death, he and his wife should break the old chumashka and make a new one. If it is not broken, husband and wife will die.

766 A man who drowned or one who was eaten by a bear will [787] be a god.

A drowned person is placed in a boat; the kinsmen get into another boat and float without rowing; they let the first boat, with the deceased, go ahead, and the deceased is cremated where it carries him to the bank. Hooks are used for pulling the body onto the bank. Inau are placed near the place of cremation. When the Tymovok Gilyak travel to Tro, upon seeing the inau they throw chukh-chugvnd (sacrifices) into the stream.

A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacri-752 fices a dog to Pal-n'ivukh and makes chukh-chugvnd.

/367 cont./

[597] In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a [782] clear conception of sin ("umgyik"). It goes without saying /368/
[672] that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure,
[688] there are a great number of acts, indifferent from our point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person: for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by [582] the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other
[821] misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning
[821] have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

771 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses
775 his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life. There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak should live with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor. After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight
766 with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars
764 on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

/368 cont./

766 ceremony is not observed, namely, when a person falls victim to a bear. There is a whole ritual for such cases. I shall be brief. Immediately after receiving news of the Gilyak's misfortune, they set out in search of the bear, following its fresh tracks. After they find and kill the bear, they place the slain person astride it and solemnly carry the bear and its ill-starred rider to the settlement. They immediately begin to /369/ build a large balagan in which they place the bear and its rider. The balagan is enclosed on all
[782] sides; they leave only small openings in which are placed small [161] troughs with sacrifices, which are at first renewed very often and then less and less frequently (in a year). This epopee is fully completed only in the third generation, in the presence of the clansmen of the slain man, with the final sacrifice of several dogs at [182] the source of the local stream. The meaning of this whole procedure [582] is, I think, the following. The bear is killed in conformity with the principle of revenge (the kindred bones must be raised). The posture of the slain man (astride the bear) is the symbol of the triumph of revenge. Leaving the slain man in the pose of a rider and honoring his memory for generations stem from a desire to crown the brave members of one's clan with a halo of fame. It may be that all this is done for the edification of the youth. Sacrifices are made to Pal'-nivukh, in this case to propitiate him [782] so that such misfortunes will not be repeated in the future. This example shows, incidentally, that the Gilyak are very far from regarding the bear as a god. The last respects paid a person who has drowned are also accompanied by a special ritual. He is burned, it is true, but without fail on the seashore. The boat in which he drowned is no longer used. In the presence of the entire [614] clan a rich sacrifice is made to Toll'-nivukh on the shore. A new [782] yurt is built, in which the parents of the deceased or one of his brothers settle. Again in this case, the procedure is to foster contempt for danger, and, on the other hand -- to propitiate the capricious god of the sea.

797 In conclusion I must say a few words about the spread of Christianity among the Gilyak. On the entire western shore I have met only two baptized Gilyak, who took the "sacred"

Section 13 (1)

1. The table of contents for this chapter is missing in the manuscript.

(The bear festivals. Their cultural character and social significance. -- The bear festivals among the Amur Gilyak. Ceremonies and entertainments before and during the killing of the bears, as well as during the consumption of them. Burial of the bones and skulls of the bears. Modifications among the Olcha, as well as among the Gilyak on Sakhalin and the Ainu.

825 The bear plays an outstanding role in the life of all the peoples of the Amur region and Siberia up to Kamchatka. But among none of them is this the case to the extent that it is among the Gilyak. The huge size that it attains in the Amur region (2),

2. See my measurements of bear skulls in Vol. I, pp. 8 ff., of this work.

its vicious nature, which, perhaps because there it does not find anywhere near the abundance of food that it does in Kamchatka, makes it not hesitate to attack even human beings, and its frequent occurrence at all times make it the most feared beast of prey of the region. It is therefore not surprising that the imagination of the Gilyak is much occupied with it and surrounds it, in life as well as after death, with fearful superstitious ideas. For instance, there prevails among them the belief that [775] the soul of a Gilyak who was killed in a fight with a bear moves [766] into the body of this beast of prey, which may have chiefly arisen from the fact that the bear in its mode of life and its bearing reveals many a similarity with them, in that it, like them, feeds largely on the salmon ascending the river in masses, on berries, plant tubers, and the like, like them it prepares a place for itself for the winter in caves under snow-covered twigs, like them it stands upright in combat, etc.

/730 cont./

mytsching), which is illustrated on Plate II /p. 1251/, Fig. 5, from a specimen that lay on the bear rack in Judin's house during the festive period. Judging by its general shape, but especially by its handle and the way the blade is attached to it, this pickax is undoubtably a specimen from ancient times and certainly in former times had a stone blade, which was later replaced with an iron one (1). Finally, when the brain of the bear has been eaten,

1. To this day the club pictured on the same plate, Fig. 4, and used to kill surgeon and hausen has a stone end-piece (see above, p. 806). The caption on Plate II should be corrected accordingly.

the skull and the rest of the gnawed and assembled bones of the bear, together with the skin, are carried out of the house to a place not far from it in the forest -- an act which, according to the Gilyak, is likewise carried out with a certain solemnity by the oldest people of the village. All the bones, with the exception of the skulls, are buried in the ground there or simply covered with earth. The skull of the bear, however, is treated differently, in a manner about which I had no accurate knowledge until after I had had some experiences with the neighboring peoples. The above-mentioned pickax, apparently from the Stone Age, is also used for a similar purpose by the Goldi, to judge from traces of blows. They do not, however, split the skull of the bear, but content themselves, forgoing eating the brain, with beating a hole through the crown and hang it by one of the zygomatic arches on a specially selected tree. Near Buri, in the vicinity of the mouth of the Usuri, I saw such a tree with numerous bear skulls hanging on it. When I climbed it in order to bring down the best preserved specimens (2), I noticed that each of them had a large hole piercing

2. Among them was the largest (450 mm. long) of all the skulls of Ursus arctos known up to now, which has been discussed in detail in the first volume of this work (pp. 8-16).

/730 cont./

sometimes the right, sometimes the left parietal bone. In the habitation area of the Gilyak I saw trees hung with dolphin skulls, to be sure, but I never came across any with bear skulls, though the number of bears killed or captured and eaten there annually is probably much larger than among the Goldi. This definitely indicates that, unlike the Goldi, the Gilyak, aside from breaking open or splitting the bear skull, do something else to it which is scarcely less suitable than the covering of the bones for removing it from the sight of human beings. In fact at various places in the forest near Gilyak dwellings I have came across spots which, upon close inspection, proved to be sites of bear skulls: trunks of young trees were cut off several inches above the ground, the remaining piece of trunk was split into two prongs, and the bear skull, split down to its base was wedged into the split in such a way that the two prongs projected out of the zygomatic arches and held it clamped between them close to the ground. In addition, on either side a short wooden peg was driven from above through the zygomatic arches and into the ground. /731/ If grass grows over the spot, nothing is recognizable to the casual glance. This method of dealing with the bear skulls was transmitted from the Gilyak to the Olcha and from them to the Samagir, who are closely related to them and also directly adjacent to them on Lake Udyl and elsewhere. In the immediate vicinity of the village of Ngagba on the Gorin I found such bear-skull sites in two directions and in one of them, which lay in an open birch grove, counted within a circle of 30 paces, no less than nine bear skulls treated in exactly the same way as among the Gilyak. Since the rest of the bear bones presumably also lie buried in the same places, they are not merely bear-skull sites, but general bear-bone grounds.

The Goldi, who hang their bear skulls on trees, do something similar with other bear bones that are suitable for it. Near Bitschu, at the mouth of the Gorin, for example, I saw a decayed or split bear-skull lying on the stump of a broken tree a few feet high, but below it in the underbrush hung various bones of the animal, among them a shoulder blade and a number of dorsal vertebrae run out on either side into two points, one of which represents a lizard, the other a snake, the similar shapes of both ends facing one another alternately. Unfortunately the specimen under discussion is somewhat worn by frequent use and is lacking the lizard at the one end.

/744 cont./

The other amulet is an iron semicircle, from which hang figures of different significance made of the same metal, specifically: at the one end, a crude human shape and a roughly triangular piece that, according to some of the Gilyak, is supposed to represent a ptarmigan, and at the other end an identical alleged ptarmigan and a heart; in the middle, finally, a roughly human shape with two heads, which is supposed to represent the kins, the evil, destructive power, that is, the devil. According to the reports of the Gilyak themselves, they believe that sickness is nothing but the kins gnawing at a human being and finally fatally devouring him. That is the end of all who /745/ die of sickness. It is no wonder that with such a belief the Gilyak do not claim heaven for the souls of those who die of sickness, but have them wandering on earth, while the souls of all the murdered and even of suicides fly to heaven. According to Gilyak belief, the earth is the abode of countless kins or devils who hide in the forests and mountains, as well as in the water and everywhere. The kins are represented with two and three heads by the Gilyak, perhaps in order to indicate with the extra ones, in contrast to man, their power over the latter (1).

1. According to the Gilyak, one of the heads on these two or three-headed forms is a human head. This therefore indicates that the kins has seized the human being.

I do not know the significance of the alleged ptarmigans, if that is what they are. The heart, however, has reference to the purpose of the whole semicircle. Namely, it is to be worn around the neck against chest ailments, coughing, and the like. The name kisi, however, which was given to me for it, seems to have a

/761 cont./

II. Conceptions of the Amur Peoples concerning Life after Death and the Corresponding Treatment of the Dead

Fate of the Souls after Death

42. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak (according to Surgin's account) believe that the soul of anyone murdered, not excepting suicides, flies to heaven, while persons who die a natural death journey on the earth or under the earth. This flying up to heaven is most likely represented by the flying figure of the wkgin, which resembles a flying human being with the characteristic bird's or fish's head. (Bm. I, p. 53.)

43. Gilyak. The (Amur) Gilyak Jutschin dictated to me an interesting song, for which, through further questions, I obtained a most instructive commentary in part. The song had been sung by the Gilyak Orkin from Magho to his wife, Rtchyvgak, from Wsir, whom he had abducted (*). Orkin was still alive at my time,

* See the Gilyak text in the appendix to Vol. III of this work, "Linguistic Findings, Compiled by Dr. W. Grube," p. 41 /the book translated here does not contain this appendix/.

but his wife had died.

The chief content of the song seems to refer to a "village Mlygh-wo," and I therefore inquired as to what kind of a village it was and where it was located. I learned that it was the place in the interior of the earth to which the souls of all those who die of sickness migrate, while those of murdered persons () fly to heaven.

 According to another report, also the souls of suicides (see Appendix 42 above.)

/761 cont./

heaven. My informant remarked that Mlygh-wo must be a large village, considering the number of persons who die "peacefully" or from sickness, but he could not say anything more about it. The various things put over the ashes of the deceased, such as eagle wings, food provisions, etc. (), serve for a rapid and safe

 See Appendix 47 /p.1227 /, 53 /p. 1233/.

journey to it.

The surprising answer to my further question as to what happened to the soul of a person killed by a bear ran: Such a soul assumes the shape of a bear and wanders in the forest and in the mountains.

/762/ Undoubtedly among the Gilyak (as well as among the Olcha (*) this is the conception of a transmigration of souls, for

* See Appendix 45, p.1224 .

they put the body of a person killed by a bear into a special little burial house (tschchyf-mgych) and bring it berries, supplies of fish, and the like (). Nevertheless, the dead person himself, i.e.,

 See Appendix 57, p. 1237 .

his soul, is said to go into the forest in the shape of a bear, with the skin and fur, etc.

Only the difficulty, with an inadequate knowledge of the language, of reaching an understanding about abstract concepts with a primitive people little inclined toward abstraction has kept me from learning the Gilyak expression for "soul." The above-mentioned views concerning the consequences of death among the Gilyak make it clear beyond any doubt that they are familiar with the concept of the "soul" as a spiritual force innate in the human being. The above-mentioned concept of the metempsychosis of a person killed by a bear also explains to a certain extent why food provisions are brought to his corpse. His soul still wanders about

/762 cont./

on the earth, while the soul of a murdered person has flown to heaven and therefore no longer needs earthly food. Furthermore, this idea may in part also give rise to the reverence, devotion, and often very anthropomorphic treatment of the bear by the Gilyak. (Bm. II, 57-59.)

44. Gilyak. Among the Gilyak, as among the Olcha (*),

* See Appendix 45, below.

the soul of a person drowned in the river or in the sea (according to Jutschin's report) does not go to heaven or to Mlygh-wo, but goes into a seal dog, and, to be sure, into a kighitsch or pyghilangr, i.e., the adult Phoca vitulina or nautica. A number of uitsch are therefore connected with the catching of a sea dog. For example, when the sea dog is caught and before any use is made of it, a cut with the knife must always be made through each eye so that the liquid can flow out. This is caught in the hollow of the hand and thrown back into the river. Only then may the sea dog be used as needed (†).

†. See p. 881.

It is difficult to say how the Gilyak conceive of heaven (†††) where the souls of the murdered are said to go. As an answer to my question as to whether these souls go to one of the stars, which are also earths, I was told that they also went beyond these, kikr, i.e., "inland" from the stars (††). (Bm. II, pp. 62, 63.)

†† Therefore beyond them; see the star-dwellers, p. 1101.

45. Olcha. From Chosiambo I learned the following about views of the Olcha with regard to the fate of the dying and the metempsychosis into aquatic animals and bears:

3 cont./

e the appearance of a bird. Sometimes this bird is repented with iron teeth and appendages in the likeness of nan feet (2), as in some representations of the swastika.

2. An example of such a memorial, brought from the lower regions of the Amur by the late acad. L. Schrenck, is preserved in the Museum of Anthropology and Ethnography of the Academy of Sciences in Leningrad.

is frightful and at the same time unhappy bird, seeking nsolation and return to the kingdom of its departed nsmen, wails of revenge at night and, of course, is ite capable of terribly avenging itself upon its clansen who have forgotten their obligations.

Even where the affair ends with the payment of ransom, bird remains unreconciled. Still another peace offering necessary in the form of a dog, whose heart is given to bird; otherwise it will take a cruel vengeance on both es.

Since the soul of the slain man, like every other man soul, cannot exist longer than three generations, the ligations of revenge cease with the third generation. But il that time the pitiful fate of the soul of the slain man ntinues to torment the conscience of his clansmen and ghten them with the horrors of unfulfilled vengeance, ing them no rest. These same motives are predominant er the immediate instinct for repayment. That is why wrath of the avengers never reaches to the destruction the whole clan of the slayer, limiting itself to one, or or three, of his clansmen; they carefully avoid the ying of women and absolutely abstain from encroachment property.

Nevertheless the imperative of vengeance is extremely ensive.

/308 cont./

765 has cuckooed for a long time, drinks water from a cup. Go well, 775 live well, (observe) the law of your fathers, the law of your mothers, the law of your elder brothers. Go." These words are said at the ordinary funeral repasts.

769 After a while they buy a bear, feed it for two years, and then
796 hold a bear festival. If a kinsman of the deceased does not buy a bear, 626 he is treated with contempt and reviled -- "inain khardz:." "What sort of a person are you? Your mother brought you up, cleaned up your excrement. A good man does not even abandon his pryski like that." One cannot be tried for such a vilification. One's clansmen always help one to hold a bear festival.

587 The woman cannot marry until the major funeral repast
768 is over.

766 They inter a baby up to a week old on a tree, up to half a year old -- in the ground. If a child who died before he was [842] three days old were cremated, his mother would not have children for a long time.

[184] On the Amur four little firs with roots are placed over the grave.

[931] During pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) the dead are not cremated, but must be buried in a grave.

Drowned persons. Uiglyf -- the place where a drowned man has been pulled out. When a man has drowned, he is cremated, and on the third day they make a toln'ir, i.e., a cup for sacrifices to the master of the water, a trough, and a kinys -- a cup for the drowned man; mos' is placed in the trough, in the cup -- red currants. They pity the man; they select two or three /309/ brave men, put the deceased in a boat on the bank there by the water, and place a kinys nich, a Chinese kettle, and one rose-willow branch standing to the height of a man. At this point one man says: "Kettle, boil, steam, rise, move upwards, you, rose-willow branch, widen, make a good covering so that the devil does not see the Gilyak."

Amur

/309 cont./

766 Two men, friends of the deceased, sit to watch, do not
766 move, do not speak, tie up all the dogs, and wait. In the yurt
754 a shaman shamanizes, calling on the sorcerer who drowned the 787 man to eat from the kinys n'ich: "Go eat human meat!" He rushes from beyond the mountains, from beyond the valleys. Amid complete silence a wave splashes, a whirlwind rushes through, a bird swims up, a black dog runs up. Suddenly the wave has approached the very cup; the deceased either moves, makes a sound, or sits up. Now it is necessary to pierce the deceased or (to hit?) the cup with a dolphin harpoon which has been in constant use, or a spear, and it feels as if the spear has struck into the man, and there are traces of blood on it. On the following day the sorcerer has a wound or a sickness from which he dies. Then the dead man is buried, while the cup is kept for two summers and then thrown away. The cup may also be destroyed right away. They do not make it very pretty. Then they make real tolin'ir and sacrifice from them down to the third generation.

756 Shamanistic kamlanie. Shamans are 1) toldokh urly cham; 787 2) pal'dokh urly cham; 3) kurdokh urly cham; 4) pang:at n'ivukh -- fortuneteller. At home a shaman directs his questions to a stone with a hole -- tolfang. If the stone immediately gives answers, it is thrown away. The shaman queries his pal'pang:a (a wooden figure which is bound with white drel', and with shavings on the neck; it is suspended on a string). The waving of the figure is an affirmative answer. If there is no pang, they tie tobacco wrapped in white drel' to the stone. It advises the shaman about medicines, indicates what sacrifices to give and [755] to which particular pal (i.e., pal of one's own or of a different clan), and so forth. It cannot drive away the evil spirit, but it can find out what spirit is there and also give indications with regard to stealing and fish. A man receives his pang also during sickness. He may even be a shaman, but frequently bad shamans steal (tempt away) their major kekhn from them. There are shamans 756 who have pang:kh, but not each one has them. There are 776 shamans who have kitus, something like an earthworm.

XI.

Miscellanea

823 The cliff Uj-parne, in the form of an isolated stone pillar, is between Khez' and Chil'mi. Formerly one could hear how the [782] master of the cliff beat on a tambourine. Three times (a year)
[776] they made sacrifices to him and addressed to him the request: "Pkhys'kyr ururungja'! -- do good for us with your risk!"

731 During a pila-dakh (smallpox epidemic) they bring fire-
758 wood and water to the sick, but do not themselves enter the house.

731 When they learn that it is all over in all the settlements
753 (i.e., the epidemic is over), then the dead are taken out of their 766 graves and burned; they are afraid of burning them earlier for they believe that smoke spreads infection. The only thing that is allowed is the smoking with marsh tea in the yurt.

538 The Female Character. Proverbs. 1) The female character is 562 like a whirlwind, similar to the wind. 2) With just a tug you will change the female character. 3) A woman is like a fire started in a clear field: the wind blows and it is out.

158 Meryachen'e. In Charbakh two people suffer from the disease
[143] meryachen'e -- two women; this sickness is inherited in the female line. Those who suffer from meryachen'e repeat literally everything, even in a foreign language; they repeat even actions. The attacks come during a fright. The sick woman is then unconscious, but later she comes to. If attempts are made to compel her to repeat something many times, she is ready to attack with a knife. In their youth they did not suffer from meryachen'e.

There are other such sick people in Tymvo and Pronga.

764 the village. The raff, then, is a memorial erected for the deceased.

[778] The cremation site was very simply marked: the ashes scraped together, enclosed in an elongated frame formed by four boards set vertically, and this covered with boards; around the boards of the frame, however, little sticks with zach were placed (see Plate LXV /p. 1265 /, to the right in the middle distance).

[784] There was no pittyssj in Kalm. I learned that such is set up for a deceased person only if no snow has yet fallen at the time of death; otherwise it would be uitsch to set up a pittyssj. (2 S.R. I, pp. 4-6.)

764 766 [775] 57. Gilyak. According to Surgin's report, not every deceased person is given a raff. If a very small infant dies, the corpse is not cremated, but simply wrapped and buried in the ground, and no raff is erected for it, for the soul of such a child does not wander, but goes to heaven. If larger children die, the corpses are cremated, and one raff is erected for two of them. Each adult gets a raff, men and women. The corpse of a person who has drowned is cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes; rather, a stick is stuck in the ground and a boat is placed next to it. If a Gilyak dies /771/ from being wounded by a bear the corpse is not cremated, but deposited in a structure which is especially erected out of beams crossing at the ends. Such a burial house is called tschchyf(*)-ngych and usually is located in

* Tschchyf--the bear.

[775] the forest where the deceased fell in the fight with the bear. The soul of such an unfortunate person does not go to heaven. The 764 burial house has a small opening through which all kinds of foods 262 are deposited for the deceased, such as berries, fish, groats, etc. 755 Inasmuch as these these articles lie next to the corpse, they acquire a strong curative power against various sicknesses, and ailing Gilyak customarily go to such a burial house and eat some of the food deposited there, which cures them at once. The [769] depositing of food in such a structure goes on for months and years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure.

d consequently also the visits to it for a cure. The corpse on killed by an att (tiger and leopard) is taken to a simihouse, supplied with food, and the latter is used as a (Bm. I, pp. 54-56.)

Gilyak. Between Hokk and Kalm (on the right bank of ), I passed on the bank the tomb of a Gilyak who had ortune in the river. Here stood a small low house, in er of all Gilyak graves, surrounded by birch-bark nd bowls of various sizes, which were strung on the brush. This is the usual general custom of the Gilyak nating the grave sites of persons and animals (bears, ext to the tomb lay a boat, probably the one in which dent had occurred (). (1. S.R. I, p. 7.)

 Cf. Pl. LXVII /p.1267 /.

Gilyak. The inhabitants of the villages of Kuk, Hokk, ilvi (on the right bank of the Amur) are said to inter ses, but the others, including those of Taur-wo and the up to Chiare (incl.), cremate them and erect raff for personally saw many raff in Chiare. In the villages however, the population is in part Tungusic. (2 S.R.I, p.

Gilyak. Near My (on the Amur-Liman) I saw a fresh ave. The raff was not yet erected, the ashes (of the corpse) were covered with boards set vertically and lly, and at each of their two ends there was wood shav-). (2 W.R. II, p. 38).

Gilyak. If a Gilyak is murdered, his corpse is likewise others) cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes est; instead, a wagn is set up (). It is made out of a

 See Appendix 22 /p. 1206/.

which is dug out of the soil with the roots. The various hes serve to represent the head, arms, and legs of the •766 wagn (†). The trunk is chopped off several feet above the ro 778

532

† On the specimen given to the Academic Museum by the author one of the rear extremities was supplied by a piece of wood specially inserted, which subsequently fell off (see Plate LXVI /p. 1266 /, Fig. 1).

pointed (the top of the stump), /772/ and, with the pointed en is sunk into the ground at the place where the ashes of the murdered person lie, so that the root, representing the wagn, [674] projects above it. Since murder is not infrequent among the Gilyak, there are wagn in many villages on the Amur, for instance, in Wassj, Kaki, Wair, Kalgho, Tebach, and elsewhere

According to Surgin's information, a wagn is set up only for a murdered person who was killed by the hand of a Gilyak from another village. On the other hand, if one Gilyak kills another in the same village, the latter does not get a wagn.
Similarly no wagn is set up if a father or mother kills the son, and vice versa, or a brother, or in general if one relative kills another. In such cases the corpse is simply cremated. The sa is done with the corpse of a suicide; it is cremated, and no wa is set up.

778 The bird's head of the wagn is said to be patterned after 532 ugn (Colymbus arcticus). This bird is regarded as sacred by th 825 Gilyak and is kept, stuffed, in the same flying position as it ha on the wagn. Such stuffed skins of Colymb. arcticus and septe are sometimes seen hanging on high frameworks in Gilyak villa
In the representation for the wagn, the Gilyak give the head o the ugn teeth of iron, which are supposed to serve for him to t revenge on the murderer (1).

[628]
[627]

1. Perhaps the wagn, by its threatening aspect, is supposed to be a reminder of the obligatory blood revenge, and this is the reason that no wagn is set up in cases where revenge is deemed inadmissible -- as between relatives and the members of a village -- or -- as in the case of a suicide -- it is automatically omitted.

72 cont./

1. (cont.)

Since the soul of a murdered person flies to heaven, it does need any of the articles such as are placed in the raff for the ndering soul of a person who died a natural death. (Bm. I, 52-54.)

62. Gilyak. As the Gilyak (on the west coast of Sakhalin) d me, they burn their corpses and erect wagn over the ashes murdered persons. (2 W.R. I, p. 8.)

63. Gilyak. The Tymy Gilyak assembled in Ngachd-wo the left bank of the Tymy on Sakhalin) said that they like-se usually burn their corpses, as is done along the Amur, in Liman, and on the west coast of Sakhalin up to Arkai (excl.). raff is erected over the ashes of the cremated corpse and, as ng the Amur, has a kakk, pyk or tutut, and pyk-ngit or tutut-t in it. The pittyssj is present in the raff and among the Tymy lyak bears the designation raff-njo, that is, burial-house storage-amber, which wholly corresponds to its significance. Only the ham-ngar is missing (*). (2. W.R.I, p. 45.)

* See Appendix 53 /p. 1233/, 55 /p. 1234/.

64. Gilyak. From Arkai on, along the west coast of halin, south to Pilja-wo, the last Gilyak village, the Gilyak said not to cremate their corpses which is regarded as uitsch, to deposit them in wooden coffins in small houses, just as ong the Tungusic tribes of Manchuria and Sakhalin and the u (2 W. R. I, pp. 8, 45.)

/773/ According to another report, the corpses are interred th of Arkai (2 W.R. II, p. 25).

65. Olcha. In the forest not far from the Russian village of orodskoye in the vicinity of the Olcha village of Pullj (Pulu the map, on the right bank of the Amur), there were two very cefully worked Olcha tombs ornamented with various paintings

1. Grave marker of a murdered Gilyak. 2. Small wooden trough, along with 3, a pestle, from the tomb of a drowned Olcha.

9: Hawes--176 T-3 (1901) 1903
116, 539, 766, 775, 825

"Wild swans occasionally flew across high overhead, ar tap-tapping the trees. Our natives eagerly asked us to sho aloft or settled on the top of a high tree, only to fly away shot. These were the white-tailed eagles (Haliëtus albicill their tail-feathers, for which they declared the Chinese ga 6s.). The Japanese (in Yezo) are said to use them to indi of importance by placing them over his door; in any case, the feathers, which they use for arrow-heads. The wings placed at the grave of a Gilyak who has been murdered or his soul in its flight to heaven."

ıd a woodpecker could be heard oot the eagles which soared as we approached within gun-lus), prized by the natives for ave them three dollars (about cate the residence of a person the Gilyaks themselves value are also prized by them, being has committed suicide, to aid

845 who are descendents of the Ainu bury 766 their bodies in the earth.

be cremated after their death. If that were done all those present at the ceremony would be punished with the loss of their eyesight. Even the parents of twins have to be buried in the earth, because they too have become relatives of the god of the mountains. The children of twins, however, are considered to be ordinary members of the tribe, and at their funeral there is no deviation from the custom.

845 If twins stay alive and grow up they remain, for the 551 rest of their lives, the object of awe for all their 769 neighbors and friends although there may be enough proof that they lack every kind of supernatural power. At every meeting, either in friendship or in hostility, the others remind them of their unusual progenity and everybody attributes to them that mysterious innate power. Each of the twins bears the name he gave himself as a child. The custom of giving the child the name of a dead ancestor is not followed in the case of twins. The names of the twins are neither given to another child in the same family nor to another child in the tribe. Here too we see a deviation from the general custom of giving children the names of dead ancestors.

845 The greatest awe is felt for those twins who die in 766 childhood. The offspring of the spirits of the 782 mountains who, while living among ordinary human 775 beings for a short time, who did not get used to them and did not feel he was one of them, has especially the power to do harm to people; that is why they try hard to win his favor. The family who had harbored the unwelcome offspring of the mountains constructs a little model of a Gilyak yurt and puts it either on a little board inside the house or outside in the open. A little figure carved in wood which represents the dead child is put into that little hut. The members of the family consider it necessary to give some of the food they eat themselves to that little figure every day. This rule is strictly followed not only by the parents of the twins but also by the two following generations. Only the great-grandchildren, observing ceremonial rites, carry the little figure with its

845 dwelling to the top of a near-by mountain; there, for 766 the last time, choice food is offered to the figure.
782 Next to the sacrificial objects a one to two meter long
775 stick carved in curly design is dug into the ground; they call it nau. From this moment on the whole tribe is safe [762] from being haunted by the dead child, tonhr ehlian, without further prayers or sacrifices.

753 If the relatives neglect to follow these rules, which 845 are designed to appease the awe-inspiring spirits of 776 the mountains and to win their favor, they evoke their anger. Several diseases which attack the parents and relatives of the twins are considered to be symptoms of their revenge (tohr ehlian). These usually are certain diseases like deformation of the jaw-bone, squint-eyes, stiffening of the neck or any kind of convulsions. The appearance of such diseases is considered to be a consequence of the mountain spirit's dissatisfaction; in such cases one says "tonhr ehlian singrund", that is "the twin child is tormenting".

784 The Gilyak are so afraid of these dangers that 845 young women and girls are strictly forbidden to listen
777 to reports about such happenings; by these precautions, they believe, they will be able to prevent the birth of twins. Women are neither allowed to borrow household articles nor to accept gifts from friends who had given birth to twins. In this case old soft objects are considered to be the most dangerous ones. Hard objects, however, especially tools made of metal, do not transfer the bad luck of the former owner to the new one.

842 It is altogether a trait characteristic of this northern
777 tribe that they believe in the possibility of the transference of physical peculiarities from one man to another man by way of his tools. This gives us an explanation for the superstitious remedies they use for overcoming a woman's sterility. The woman who cannot bear children must ask another very fertile woman to lend her the waistband of her trousers and she has to wear it up to the moment of the desired success. A Gilyak told me that fertility can be transferred from one person to another like a contagious disease, for example by way of a vessel which had been used by the sick person.

346 dent showed me several articles made by the pupils, including wooden spoons, forks, bowls, and cups, and he gave me for a souvenir a seal cut in pewter, bearing the word 'Fulyhelm' in Russian letters, and having a neatly turned handle.

'The school is in operation ten months of each year. The superintendent said the children of the Russian peasants could attend if they wished, but very few did so. The teacher was a subordinate priest of the Eastern church. The expense 871 of the establishment was paid by Government, with the design of making the boys useful in educating the Gilyaks.

771 The Gilyaks of the lower Amoor are pagans, and the at-825 tempts to Christianize them have not been very successful 764 thus far. Their religion consists in the worship of idols and 766 animals, and their priests or shamans correspond to the 'medicine man' of the American Indians. Among animals they revere the tiger, and I was told no instance was known of their killing one. The remains of a man killed by a tiger are buried without ceremony, but in the funerals of other persons the Gilyaks follow very nearly the Chinese custom. The bear is also sacred, but his sanctity does not preserve him from being killed.

BEAR IN PROCESSION.

825 In hunting this beast they endeavor to capture him alive; once taken and securely bound he is placed in a cage in the

768

768 SOCIAL READJUSTMENTS TO DEATH--disposition of the possessions of the deceased (e.g., abandonment or relocation of dwelling, destruction or mutilation of movable possessions, redistribution of property); provision for support of spouse and children; residence changes of survivors; etc. See also:

Inheritance 428
Guardianship and administration 429
Insurance 456
Heirlooms 523
Remarriage 587
Status of widows 589
Rule of residence 591
Adoption 597
Rules of succession 59, 61, 63, 622, 643
Relief of widows and orphans 736
Social insurance 745

/84/

*614 Once the above-mentioned principle was created and became an immutable imperative of life, the natural consequence was the appearance of exogamy, and exogamy is the foundation of the clan.

But the exogamy of the Gilyak,as we have seen, is not the mere obligation to take wives from outside their clan. It gives a man a whole series of rights, which play an enormous role in his life.

We know that the acquisition of a wife is one of the most difficult problems of primitive man. There are ordinarily fewer women than men. One must pay for a woman, and to [583] [556] make matters worse each of the wealthy men snatch up many wives. For the poor man -- and such are in the majority -- acquiring a wife under such conditions is far from easy; frequently he must even resort to methods that risk his life.

The norms of Gilyak marriage give each Gilyak the right to the women of the akunal'k clan, in particular to the daughters of the brothers of his mother; this is simultaneously his religious obligation and right. The bride price in such [583] cases, if not a formality, is a burden which each one always has a right to expect his clansmen, interested, like himself, in his marriage to a woman from a certain clan, the clan of his mother, to share. In the worst of cases, until a man succeeds in setting up his own family, the families of his older brothers, with whom he shares the right to the women of the akunal'k clan, are his family, their wives are his wives, to [587] whom he has lawful conjugal rights. When a married Gilyak ●[768] dies, his wife passes without any bride price to one of his younger brothers determined by the choice of the clan.

*614 These are all advantages which play a role of the 587 first order in the eyes of primitive man. The crown of 768 these advantages is the social privilege of every clansman of not having to fear for the fate of his wife and his children after his death. His wife and children during his life are juridically, and frequently factually as well, the wife and children of his younger brothers; they will remain such after

/84 cont./

*614 his death as well. One of his brothers, according to the decision 587 of the clan, will replace him in the rights and obligations of ●768 husband and father, and even where the deceased has no younger brothers, the supporter of his family will be one of the "elders." Such is the immutable law of the clan.

*614 Such are the advantages which the clan union offers by 848 virtue of the single principle of kinship and the marriage norms which directly issue from it. It is completely natural that these blessings can be enjoyed only by those who have a right to them by virtue of kinship. The fact of being born to a clansman is the only justus /85/ titulus to being counted in the clan. Ytk-khavrnd -- a man without a father, i.e., born out of wedlock, not knowing who his father is -- is a man without a clan, a pariah, a burden to himself and others. One who does not know the identity of his father and consequently does not know to which clan he belongs, therefore does not know which women can be his wives and which are forbidden and, unbeknownst to himself and others, may violate the sacred sexual norms, incurring incalculable disasters upon all. Fortunately, there are in fact no persons who do not know their fathers. If a girl becomes pregnant out of wedlock, they compel her to name the father of the future child. Having learned who he is, they compel him to marry the seduced girl, which he is only too glad to do, because in such a situation there are fewer difficulties about paying the bride price. In the event of disavowal on the girl's part, they slay the newborn child, and the clan is saved from sin and unhappiness.

*614 The Gilyak clan, however, did not succeed in retaining 597 the principle of kinship inviolate and in perfect purity. Like the clan unions of all other peoples, it had to make a deviation and reconcile itself with the institution of adoption, with the acceptance into its bosom from time to time of individuals from other clans.

/116 cont./

156 one but on all. Any attempt to monopolize the gifts of the gods 771 must inevitably incur just punishment by the common benefactors of the clan.

*614 Everything that religion and clan wisdom prescribe for gain- 771 ing the beneficence of the gods is a blessing for each, and to 182 carry out their dictates means only to take care of one's self. It 156 is the same with all the prescriptions of clan regulations, be they 183 sexual norms, rules of revenge, or religious rites; any infraction of them on the part of one is a common "sin" and is destructive to all.

All more or less important acts of social life, even including sacrificing one's self in a battle of vengeance for one's clansman, are categorical imperatives of a religious world-outlook which neither allow hesitation nor require compulsion. All of the instincts for self-preservation are in complete harmony with the religious ideas. By an act of revenge, a man protects his own security, but he thereby also fulfills a religious duty by appeasing the spirit of the dead man, which is able to inflict punishment if it remains unavenged. And so it is in everything...

156 A healthy, integrated, comprehensively developed per- *614 sonality with an integrated religio-social world-outlook, creating 182 a perfect harmony of the personal and social interests and the driving forces of life -- such is the hidden, but mighty mainspring of the clan mechanism.

Observe how, without any regulation or organs of compulsion, but with only the desire of an individual, the complicated mechanism of clan life operates.

*614 Suppose a clansman with a family dies. It is necessary to ●768 provide for his family, to preserve his property until the heirs 182 reach maturity, and it is necessary, in order to avoid disputes, to decide to whom the widow of the deceased shall pass. There are no judges, there are no authorities, but, a short while after the deceased has been buried, the nearest clansmen assemble, have a short discussion, listen to the claimants, and the one they decide upon will be the husband of the widow and the father of the orphaned children.

Durin

*835 /184/ my residence of many years among the Gilyak, despite careful questioning, I heard of only two or three instances of clear violation of the prohibitive norms. The most outstandi of these instances took place in the settlement of Tamlevo, where a young Gilyak, after the death of his father, lived for some time with his young stepmother, purchased by his father shortly before his death. This incident shocked all Sakhalin, and he was spoken of as some kind of monster. Another commonly known incident involved the young Gilyak, Pavlinka, who married a woman from the clan of his ymgri, i.e., from the clan that took its wives from Pavlinka's clan. But Pavlink [177] was a considerably Russified Gilyak who had served in the police service and regarded the customs of his people superciliously. Another Russified Gilyak, Allykh, from the settle- 177 ment of Tamlevo, after the death of one of his younger tuvn, *835 compelled the gathering of clansmen which was deciding, 587 as was customary, to whom the widow of the deceased should ●768 pass, to award her to him, although he, as an aki (elder brother), had no rights whatever to this. But these cases are the exception and evoked an energetic reaction from the community.

684 In the first two cases the violators had to go into voluntary exile, i.e., settle outside the settlement and lead a lonely existence, with all the deprivations of clan blessings [177] associated with ostracism. But, we repeat, these were quite exceptional cases bound up with psychics changed under the influence of an alien culture (1).

*835 183 587 768 [731]

1. There are exceptional cases of another kind when the marriage norms are disrupted for the sake of upholding other norms which are considered even more important by society; this occurs during an epidemic, when a husband is not found for this or that widow according to the principles of the levirate.

Help in need is decidedly more the order of the day than is with us civilized people. If someone has undeservedly come poor, he is immediately assisted, and debts are id for relatives. Likewise people who have become in-pable of work because of illness are assured support by latives and neighbors. The sick, in general, are eagerly rsed; only when the death agony begins, the dying person subjected to a harsh ordeal. He is carried out of the use into the open and is left there at any time of the year, til he is dead. This custom is based on the belief that a ad person brings ill-luck to the house, and in case a per-n dies indoors, the house must be taken down. However, sick person who is subjected to these measures is usu-y already in a comatose state. It appears, that child-aring women are removed from the house for similar asons.

In danger and suffering the Gilyak also help the non-Gilyak say nothing of their fellow-tribesmen. I must mention two ceptions. I heard repeatedly from Russians that a Gilyak the point of drowning could not count on help from his ople, in fact, the Gilyak watch him going under, with alistic calm, and comfort themselves by saying that "he is eded above." Besides, it is said that the Sakhalin-Gilyaks e care not to help a man who has fallen into the clutches of ear, because they see in it a divine punishment. One who killed in this way is not cremated but must be buried to-her with the body of the bear, should he also be killed; at same time they scatter about pieces of bear flesh and aps of the dead man's clothing. The Gilyak whom I ques-ned about drowning persons, unanimously testified [224] t they always helped them as much as they could and they owed me several people who had been rescued because help l been sent them from the shore. Furthermore, in the case a man who has been attacked by a bear being left to his e, we must take into consideration the fact that the custom two or three people going out to hunt a bear presupposes tual aid. The question deserves to be further investigated, nevertheless I believe that the afore-mentioned fatalism s not appear in all cases, only in certain instances where erstition was awakened for some specific reason.

The Gilyak help not only their fellow-tribesmen but also stran-s in time of distress as much as they can. They repeated saved the lives of run-away convicts, for which they were en wretchedly rewarded besides. More of this later.

Hospitality is decidedly practised.

527 Sometimes the dogs also draw sleds in these races.
541 Dog racing, besides being an amusement also has a prac-437 tical significance, for the good runners find immediate buyers. In fact, the bear festival is a sort of fair, where various things are bartered.
527 The chief figure of the festival, namely the bear, is well-825 fed throughout the whole period and is repeatedly led through the village, at which time he pays a call at each house and this is done in such a way that he has to go from one house to another at an angle, by way of the adjacent section of the river. This symbolic procedure assures the house of "an abundance of fish". He is always led by several men who put up the necessary number of chains and ropes on all sides. In the houses he is treated to fish, millet, and cranberries, and sometimes he is also teased. Some Gilyak also prostrate themselves before him. This is by no means worship, however, as some have assumed. Some do it for fun, some in earnest, calling on the spirit of the bear not to seek revenge on them after he is dead. Sometimes the bear is not given such expressions of veneration.
527 When the bear's immolation nears, he is tied to a stick 782 which has been driven in the ice, and then he is shot with 766 arrows. In this procedure the archers seek to outdo themselves. At last the unfortunate bruin is given a merciful blow with a lance. He usually dies in peace and majesty, with his fore-paws resting on his wounded chest. When this happens the woman who has had charge of him is often heard to weep loudly. Finally, funeral pyres are lit and the Gilyak seat themselves around them. Pieces of bear meat are passed around and before they are eaten they are lightly [237] roasted. Eating and tea-drinking are the main activity at a bear festival. The stick music which is here offered as entertainment has been described. Special music is produced 527 in the village of Kola. This village is the northern outpost 361 of the Gilyak settlement, on the coast of the Sea of Okhotsk, 534 about 200 versts from Nikolayevsk-na-Amure. (1) Here are

1. This distance is measured according to the curves in the coast line; in a straight line it would be much shorter.

to be found - and this has only recently been discovered -two old church bells bearing Slavonic inscriptions. They were supposed to have been taken from Fort Albasin when it was destroyed by the Chinese and since then to have belonged to 764 dead one is brought or carried into the woods, accompanied by relatives and friends He is placed on a pyre where he is burned in three or four hours. The skull and the extremities usually burn faster than the spinal column. The mourning relatives stand around the fire. In token of their sorrow the women let their hair hang loose, the men sometimes cut theirs short. The ashes are gathered in a vessel and placed in the "death house". The latter is an ordinary yurt in design, but very small, somewhat like a large doll house. Beneath it the clothes, the pipe, and the weapons of the deceased are buried. Sometimes, however, the clothes are also burned. The favorite dog is killed but not burned; it is consumed by the mourners. On Sakhalin, if the deceased was a wealthy man, all the dogs which brought his sled to the funeral pyre are killed; poor people content themselves with burning the sled.

There is no special place for the death houses; they stand by themselves all over the woods, not too far from the village. On certain days the relatives assemble here for a funeral rite. Millet, a stuffed pipe, and such things are placed in the little house through the window, and all who are present break into loud lamentation.

764 The above-described burial ceremony is customary only
182 among the true Gilyak, that is, on the island of Sakhalin and on the mainland along the Amur up to Bogorodskoye. The Sofiyskian Gilyak lower the bodies without a coffin into a crypt. The deceased is given his best clothes for the journey besides a bowl of millet, a stuffed pipe and some spirits. At the head-and foot-end [239] stakes are driven, on which hang his weapons and other objects. For these graves there is 766 also no particular place. Sometimes, instead of being bur-
182 ied the corpses are put in open cradles made of wicker and suspended from trees. This is supposed to be done when there are epidemics, and thus the very thing that should not be done is done. However, since these death cradles are isolated and hung up at a great distance from the villages, the miasmas resulting from decomposition are probably not harmful.

XV Weltanschauung and Religion.

771 The Gilyak do not generally like to speak of transcendental matters. One is advised by some of them to ask a shaman for information, since he knows better. Others, on the contrary, answer the given questions like disinterested persons, that is, they say the shaman maintains this or that, but a certain scepticism is apparent. The Gilyak are 834 a way that every discussion of the fact is precluded.

864 If the baby was born in the summer, the children are told that it was taken from under the roots of a tree or trunk; if a baby was born in winter, one pretends to have found it in the snow.

845 Twin births.

163 No tribe on Sakhalin Island has reported the birth of triplets to any woman at any time. That is why there are no legends about such an event either.

Not infrequently twin births take place among the natives. They contend that in each one of these cases both children are of the same sex. I personally came to know two living twins of the Gilyak tribe who were between forty and forty-five years old. In regions rather well known to me there occurred three twin births in a population of more than 300 persons within a decade, but all these twins died immediately after birth. When I left in 1905 there were five month old twins living in the family of a Gilyak friend of 845 mine. Only in a single old Gilyak song which I wrote 539 down are twins of different sex mentioned. The 776 brother is in love with his sister and, in this song, asks her to take his heart into her hands, or else he will die.

The Gilyak are convinced that one of the twins is the son of the god of the woods and mountains, pal-ni-rookh (mountain man), a mighty deity now benevolent, now malevolent towards the poor, weak Gilyak. [761] (1) That is why the child of the pal-ni-

1. I was, however, given another explanation by a Gilyak: one of the twins is said to be an offspring of the mountains, the other one an offspring of the sea.

rookh, should be given back to his father right away. But, not being certain which of the children is not an offspring of human beings one prefers to treat them both equally.

845 It is a custom among the majority of the Gilyak to 766 cremate dead bodies (2), but twins are not allowed to

2. In general, only those Gilyak tribes

For some time after the seal-hunt at the air-holes, when the broken ice recedes from the shore, the Gilyaks get out in boats and "feed the sea" out of muurs ('scoops for scooping water of the boat'), pieces of jelly called [79] mos, (1) porridge

1. Jelly is prepared by grinding a mixture of boiled skins of Siberian salmon, seal fat and water. As soon as the grinding is done, a lot of berries are added to the jelly and it is then left on the outside to cool.

and a dried plant aγs, called puchka by the local Russians. Sometimes the feeding is followed by a seal-hunt on nearby floes.

After the first "feeding", pilgur tol-fənd (major feeding of the sea,' literally, 'major throwing into the water') is arranged. Only after this "feeding" do the hunters put out to sea on a hunt.

For the "major feeding" women prepare two kinds of jelly-mos and muvi --cook rice or millet porridge, prepare dried sarana, peas, berries, tobacco, and dried stalks of puchka (aγs). The Gilyaks believe that if the food for the dogs is not cooked--and they must be fed before daybreak-- the dogs will eat the sea offering and the latter will not reach its place of destination. To prevent this from happening, the Gilyaks specially feed the dogs of the sea spirits (according to the beliefs of the Gilyaks, spirits are human beings like themselves and have their own dogs.) For this purpose they wind puchka on fish-tail bones (mamγe) which they then throw into the sea before offering to the spirits. The Gilyaks believe that the dogs of the spirits will eat the fish bones and, having had their fill, will not touch the refreshments meant for their masters.

When all gifts are ready, a hunter carries them to the sea. Women are not present at sea offerings. On reaching the shore the Gilyak sticks two small twigs in one place, at the very edge of the water; one twig is a keγla-ŋəks twig and the other is a qosk ŋəks ('rowen twig'). A small distance away from these he sticks another pair of small twigs at the edge of the water. These peculiar gates are called ṭaγr. The offering is thrown into the sea through the ṭaγr. First to be emptied are the ůiγ-ŋir, (2) that is, troughs from which drowned men are

2. Uiγ-ŋir is made in memory of a man drowned in the sea. The first uiγ-ŋir "should be lost" quickly as the Gilyaks put it. Then they make a second one which 782 they keep for a long time. When some one is 225 drowned the Gilyaks arrange a boat race, fight, and 766 run. In this connection I wish to note that in the 415 valleys Chayvo, on the Okhotsk shore of the Sakhalin peninsula, where I studied the cult of drowned men in great detail, no felicitations are allowed when a man is drowned.

fed. (Mos for these troughs is prepared by men). Next, mos is emptied out of the tol-?ir ('sea troughs') for which it is prepared, as in all other cases, by women. The offering completed, the troughs are turned around so that their "eyes" are directed to the houses instead of to the sea. (3) Next,

3. The troughs are in the form of animals. As I observed in the village of Chayvo, drops of mos meant to be "eyes" are put on one end of a tol-ir, which apparently no longer has animal form.

pebbles, picked up from the shore are put into the troughs. At home these pebbles are thrown into the fireplace.

82 The Gilyaks regale their kinsmen with whatever is left 62 over from the offering and also eat themselves. Mos from the 25 ui - ir is eaten only by old people. Women, children, and 61 young hunters must not taste this mos.

25 It is imperative that the "feeding of the sea" be completed
82 before the departure of the hunters. Once the hunters put out to sea, "feeding of the sea" is not allowed. At present this custom is not strictly observed, and if someone happens to be late, he "feeds the sea" late in the evening when it is reasonable to assume that the hunters at sea have gone ashore; although they sometimes spend the night on floes.

After the offering the Gilyaks begin preparations for putting out to sea on a hunt.

25 The essential prerequisite for seal-hunting at sea is a large 01 spacious, many-oared boat. Not every Gilyak is the owner of 76 [80] such a boat, suitable for long voyages. In the village Kul
22 there are no more than ten such boats. (1) In the seal-hunting 66

1. Unfortunately, it did not occur to me to count the number of these boats during my stay in the village Kul.

season the hunters unite in a collective which centers around mu-ziyəd on the boat supports the assumption that at one time or another the Gilyaks, it seems, regarded a boat as a living thing. Mu-ziyəd on the boat serves, it seems, as a means of guarding the boat against and protecting it from misfortunes.

Aside from mu-ziyəd, tŋaj is performed on the boat. Tŋaj means 'image', 'figure,' 'picture.' With shavings (inau) of a branch of rowan (qosk-vəks) the pilaŋ makes two figurines. One of the figurines is placed at the prow of the boat and the other - at the stern. I once saw such a figurine on the neck of a representation of the bird ugŋ, placed by the Gilyaks at the bow of the boat. The figurine placed at the bow has its face turned to the sea. We shall come back to these tŋaj elsewhere.

There is one other ceremony performed on the boat. Before setting out on a hunt the Gilyaks expose the boat to smoke. They light fires of spruce and bogulnik on both sides of the boat and they try to build the fires so that the smoke hit the boat. The pilaŋ takes a branch of spruce or of bogulnik and, starting from the bow and going towards the stern, hits the outside and the inside of the boat as well as the rowlocks with the branches so as to elvlaf-pək-əzd --"lose bad places (evil)". Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the sea and are off.

I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from a hunt, put out to sea with the hunters a second time. Five hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an experienced pilaŋ, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the sea bird ugŋ and the figunines tŋaj. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They first go to Uiy-krə "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull

1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

the boat out of the water. The pilaŋ picks up a scoop containing the usual refreshments called for by the occasion and

25 throws them into the sea. Each of the hunters has with him
23 similar gifts which the pilaŋ throws into the sea together 66 with his own gifts. If the hunters go past Uiŋ-krə̂, then they 82 throw their offerings into the sea from the first floe at which they stop. The Gilyaks believe that on every cape (krə̂) there lives a ə̂tik- an old woman. These old women must also be given something at the time of the sea voyage. It is believed that tvax-ə̂tik, 'the old woman of the mouth of the river,' who lives in the mouth of the river Kul helps during the hunt.

25 [83] In the past the Gilyaks would go as far as T'uurf (Bay of Tugursk) during a seal hunt. They would sometimes spend the winter there and engage in fox hunting. The Gilyaks told me that their ancestors apparently did not go to kəvr-mlf (Shantar Islands) (1) At present they do not go beyond

1. According to the account of Schrenk, the Gilyaks did not hunt on the Shanter Islands (On the natives of the Amur region), v. II, p. 288.

Lo ri. In former times the Gilyaks would put out to sea when the ice began to break. They would hunt at sea until the end of the summer and then they would return to the village to fish salmon. When the ice was gone and, consequently, seal hunting on floes ceased, they would hunt seals by means of tola-k'e, 'a heavy drag net.'

At present the Gilyaks put out to sea for short periods not exceeding one or two months. Thus, for instance, Norp put out to sea with the hunters on July 8 and returned from the hunt on August 2. In 1930 two boats of hunters hunted seals off cape Litke and stayed there for two months.

11 The Gilyaks of today also hunt by means of a drag-net,
25 tola-k'e. (2) Tola-k'e is made of heavy rope called locally
83

2. Of the very old seal-hunting implements in the village Kul, a very large floating harpoon tla is completely out of use. It was made out of a few long sticks turned of the trunk of a larch. I got acquainted with its structure and I observed how it is being used in the village Chayvo. This harpoon is sometimes 18 ruchnykh sagenes long.

matauza. The rope is 45 ruchnykh (makhovykh) sagenes long.
Each of the meshes is large enough for the head of a sivuch.
Tola-k'e is set not far from the shore. The upper cord of the levirate. Then, in order that the woman remain in the house, the deceased husband, she is given, according to the law (or custom), to any clansman of an ascending or descending degree or kinship with her late husband.

/184 conc./

Officially the very idea of sexual connection with persons of the herbivorous categories evokes an instinctive disgust.

In the rare instances of sexual intercourse with such persons, the Gilyak regard it as the implantation of an evil spirit, as a phenomenon unnatural not only in man, but in beasts. We have seen that in such instances they even slay a domesticated dog. The attitude towards people is entirely the same. Ordinarily lovers in the forbidden categories stay themselves by mutual agreement or under the direct origin of their relatives. In one last song of such an unhappy pair, the woman sings of how /184/ her elder sister called her a "Mink" for her love for her uncle, and called the latter a "dog," and how all — her father, her uncle, and sister — urged together: "Stay yourself, stay!" Incidentally, the object of her unnatural passion, the uncle, is a man full of fire age, could grow up far apart from her, and the love between the cousins may rather be perfectly natural in our eyes.

The feeling of sexual shyness and reserve of the forbidden categories has been transformed into an instinct, like the very similar feeling toward one's mother or own sister in our society. The impression of an instinct is also produced on us by that amazing shyness of the Gilyaks to suppress in himself the feeling of jealousy, an ability which he manifests when the question of the giving-in-marriage of his individual spouse arises. Without these instincts, or in any case the intensity of virtues of self-control and self-restraint, the realization of the sexual norms would be impossible; uncontinued jealousy would result in the destruction of group family in the capacity of a son or brother and is considered in the clan. In one settlement on northern Sakhalin, I met a flourishing and numerous family of Tungus who had been adopted by the principal clan of the settlement. It had appeared from the stories of old people, poor and hungry, and asked to be taken into a clan of the settlement. The clan agreed to the request and supported until better times. At the present /205/ time this family is the pride of the clan which adopted it. But, in general, instances of adoption are rare, especially by families, for the simple reason that it is permissible to adopt only a member of the clan, the marriage within the clan is prohibited, as has been shown above.

/204 conc./

8. The clan constitutes a juridical unit with regard to the debts of the clansmen. In the event of a blood feud, or any such phenomenon, the clan is called upon to answer, the clan is responsible for a long time.

On the Amur four little fire with roots are placed over the graves.

During gila-dash (smallpox epidemic) the dead are not cremated, but must be buried in a grave.

Drowned persons, /206/ or those who died where a drowned man has been pulled out. When a man has drowned, he is cremated, and on the third day they make a ninkh, i.e., a cup for sacrifice to the master of the water, a trough, and a tinra — a cup for the drowned man: ninr is placed in the trough, in the cup — red curtain. They pitch the man, they select two or three /207/ brave men, put the deceased in a boat set on hack there by the water, and place a tinra stick, a Chinese kettle, and one rose-willow branch standing on the height of a man. At this point one man says: "Kettle, boil, steam, rise, move upwards, you, rose-willow branch, widen, make a good covering so that the devil does not see the Gilyak."

/128 conc./

inheritance. Only relation to the daughter does the father enjoy a special power of disposition, in order to hand down his property to his children. On the other hand, the clan organization is so constituted that it can use the property should not leave the clan of the clan. One of the reciprocal action of these principles it is that the property of the deceased, in the father, and only in their absence — the brother of the deceased, the property of the clansmen, but at the same time, women, not only in the customary and according times of kinship, but in the descending lines of kinship, but in the descending lines as well, are excluded from the right to inherit property. In the case of a woman dying, the property of the clan, and only in the case of the clan, the property of the clan, and only in the case of the clan, the property of the clan, and only in the case of the clan

/91 cont./

765 Several days later a small toy-house with a small door and a small window is placed on the ground not far away from the place of the hearing. Inside the house is placed a doll-man dressed in silk. Away in the house lives Kalim, the goddesses of love of Gilyak mythology, and eating and smoking utensils, trays, plates, and samashir of birch bark with all kinds of vinods, pipes, tobacco, and so forth are arranged around it.

From time to time the kinsmen come to renew their sacrifices, but in a few months the sacrifices top because the soul of the deceased has been established in the house in a new place and has no need of anything. The deceased will be remembered once more during the bear festival.

Such, in brief, are the religious views and customs of the Gilyak.

VI

The Clan

In the chapter on religious beliefs, we have touched on the influence of the ideas of the clan on the religious aspect of the clan -- its importance as dependent on the matriarchate. In the chapter on religious beliefs, we have touched on the influence of the ideas of the clan on religious notions.

Now let us examine it in all the totality of features, tectonic and dynamic, morphological and socio-spiritual, as one whole instrument regulating all aspects of the life of the Gilyak.

For this purpose, we consider it particularly instructive in our analysis to adhere to that same system to which the Gilyak themselves adhere in formulating their notions about the clan.

/86 cont./

766 ✱ 614 ✱ 615 ✱ 616 ✱ 617 ✱ 618 ✱ 619 ✱ 620 ✱ 621 ✱ 622 ✱ 623 ✱ 624 ✱ 625 ✱ 626 ✱ 627 ✱ 628 ✱ 629 ✱ 630 ✱ 631 ✱ 632 ✱ 633 ✱

/48 cont./

This likewise explains the custom of avoiding one's father-in-law (for he may not be one's mother's brother); this also explains why, for example, the Gilyak calls a bride who is not from the clan of his mother by the term sokh /sic: see yokh on p. 76/, a term meaning a category prohibited with regard to sex, because a woman who is not from his mother's clan originally could not be his wife; and other such phenomena.

Finally, this explains the universal custom of the bride price, the custom of a payment for one's bride. Abduction is a sin against the clan of the one abducted, a sin which demands atonement, by force or by a material fine from the abducter. Among the Gilyak this sin of atonement comes down to the third generation inclusive. The bride price, therefore, is that same blood-money, that same material form of atonement for a sin, as for the killing of a clansman. It is not a coincidence that the blood money for a slain clansman and that for an abducted woman bear the same name, tkhusind, among the Gilyak.

In conclusion I shall allow myself to make another, perhaps somewhat risky conclusion. Let us suppose that, as frequently happens after wars, the men of clan A who take wives from clan V have died out and there is no one to continue the clan. The maidens of clan V then remain /49/ without husbands, for the parents' fear of the punishment of the gods is stronger than their love for their children. From here it is one step to the killing of maidens. A considerable time must elapse for the superstitious spirit of primitive man to reconcile itself to necessity and begin to resort to the deception of his gods, arranging the comedies, sometimes cruel, of mock abduction.

V.

Religion of the Gilyak

In his world view the Gilyak, like every primitive man, is an animist. A dead, unreasoning nature does not exist for him; on the contrary, all nature is endowed with life and reason. If the Gilyak could parody the famous dictum of Hegel, he could say with greater right than the latter that all that exists is rational.

/49 cont./

771 For him, the prototype of everything that exists is, naturally, man, as the creature whom he knows and understands best. Everything reduces itself to man: everything visible in nature is a form in which is invested god-man. With such a world view, the religion of the Gilyak represents a combination of pantheism, the cult of animals, fetishism, demonism, polytheism, etc., all of them against the general background of anthropomorphism.

772 776 The Gilyak calls the universe "kurn," but with this same word he denotes the concept of a personal, man-like god. With the word "pal'" he denotes mountain and the god -- "master" of the mountain; with the word "tol'" -- the sea and the god of the sea. The universe is only the form which has been assumed by great image of the personal god, "kurn."

823 The Gilyak calls his native island "mif" (the earth). It is a living, divine creature, whose "head" (Cape Marii) and "chin," "Pytykry," lie in the Sea of Okhotsk, while its "legs" are two peninsulas in the Korsakov okrug which lie in La Pérouse Strait.

[782] I myself have made some trips across the "Chin," have seen how respectfully sacrifices were made by my companions and prayers were delivered to the earth concerning our successful journey. I made my way up to the top of the very "Head" [778] of the earth, which, according to the beliefs of the Gilyak, does not leave unpunished a sacriligeous offense against it by the feet of mortals, and saw the majestic bald spot of this divine Head, covered with sharp stone teeth instead of hair /50/ (the result of weathering), which bring superstitious terror on the Gilyak... The majestic crest of the top of the high cape looking out on the boundless sea is indeed very imposing!

Moreover, the parts, even the smallest ones, of this grandiose being -- the "mif" -- are the same kind of living independent creatures as the divine whole. Here is the majestic mountain Engel'spal', which rises alone over the northern dunes; it is the living reindeer of the god of the universe, "kurn," on which he traveled over the island, putting it into its present state, habitable for man. The valleys were

/50 cont./

825 for example, on a whale, the latter hold the flanks, while the leaders follow behind.

82 /51/ Once visible nature is only a mask and is not what it 771 appears to be, there is a natural tendency on the part of the Gilyak to seize upon the smallest sign having resemblance to the human body or a part of it, in order to discover the human shape that is concealed under it. Hence fetishism -- the psychology which discovers a supernatural human-like being in every object which has an unusual form, be it a high mountain, a petrified object, or simply a piece of stone.

825 If inanimate nature is capable of arousing in the mind of the Gilyak the imagining of live creatures which conceal themselves under the dead form, then the cult of animals should all the more not amaze us at all. It is generally believed that fear lies at the base of the cult of animals. Primus in orbe deos fecit timor. In fact this is far from the case. First of all, we must remember that primitive man not only does not recognize any sort of gulf between himself and the animal world, but, on the contrary, in many respects admits the superiority of the latter over himself. A hunter by profession, he has invested in his art of hunting all his intelligence, all his inventiveness, all his human genius. See how brilliant his snares and traps are, and nonetheless how often and maliciously the insignificant little beast -- a fox, a sable, and others -- will laugh at all his machinations! Dozens of valuable sables run past his trap, leaving their footprints quite close to it; they guessed the cleverness of man and departed unharmed! How sensitive is the elk to the smell of a human being whole versts away! Never, never would a single beast be caught by the Gilyak, but for the will of the gods, the "masters" of these animals, which care for the well-being of the Gilyak. If a god does not will this, dozens of man's crossbows remain without a catch. Therefore the Gilyak sees in animals beings in no way inferior to himself, even though a god may sometimes give

/102 cont./

*614 only one of its kind, must have worn out the 628 spirit more than the most active resistance.
562 corpus, day and night they go about the envi
looking into every bush, every blade of grass enemy in ambush. And if the attackers do n whelming number that makes it possible to fa expectant enemy, they will never succeed in of the inviolable chain of sentries, and the p tackers, worn out by boredom, the march, the of necessity breaks on the passive resistance o
the basis for peace has been established.

In order to appreciate fully the importan [784] participation of the women in the struggle of [724] be kept in mind that in many clans it is forbi on alien territory, /103/ use the water of its etc., so that, like the Biblical dwellers of Gi find it necessary to set off on an expedition lo filled with water and as much food supplies a Under such conditions every extra day of wait by famine, and thus the vigilance of the wom
conquers.

195 Here is one of the examples known to me
*614 of the settlement of Tebakh set off overland t 628 one of the clans of the settlement of Kol' for 562 clansman. After a long march, and a still lo 724 period of waiting as a result of the vigilance o poles in their hands, ceaselessly searching the in their skin-carriers finally gave out, and the depart with nothing and terminate the matter small causes often lead to important conseque

*614 Tylor was right when he asserted that exo
77 relations between clans and introduced peace, [114] ceeded from the mistaken conjecture that the brought to life the very institution of exogamy primitive man is not so sentimental, he is ma that he would sacrifice with a light heart his o ment for a breach of his blood duty to the voi oe and weakened his Utilizing their habeas ons in perfect safety in search of the t possess an over-ll openly upon the eluding the vigilance tience of the at-torment of waiting,

f the weaker sex, and ce of the passive the clans, it must dden to light a fire

ivers and springs, hunt, beon, the Gilyak
aded down with skins
a man can carry. ing threatens death
en necessarily

. In 1851, 30 men
o take vengeance on the slaying of a nger and more fruitless of the women, with locality, the water
e avengers had to peacefully ... Thus nces.
gamy weakened the although he pro-aspiration for peace
. It is true that inly too "god-fearing," wn fears of punish-ce of feeling, or

/103 cont./

*614 ●771 even to his own clear advantage, but he has, as we know, an already tested expedient, with the help of which he pacifies the gods with full observance of his own interest; he resorts, as in other cases, to pious deception of the gods, which offers him the opportunity both to fulfill his religious duty and to derive material gains from the conflict. Usually, this most important religious procedure of the institution of blood money is completely ignored, and indeed traces of religious ceremonies of reconciliation are not preserved among all peoples, among the Gilyak, as we shall recount later on, this is distinctly clear from the ritual of ransom, which demands a preliminary imitation of blood revenge in the form of a battle between representatives of the warring clans, the killing of dogs, and the feeding of the spirit of the dead man with their blood.

*614 628 771

628 539 554 *614 [192] [197] Now let us proceed to the practice of this institution.

The principal role in the procedure of reconciliation is played by the so-called khlaj-nivukh'i (1).

1. I use the term of the more widespread western dialect.

Khlaj-nivukh -- literally: the explaining man, /104/ eloquent, orator. Such a man enjoys special regard in the eyes of the Gilyak, for in his view the eloquent individual is the chosen one of a particular deity who constantly inspires him, dwells in him, and inspires in him beautiful, convincing speeches and an irresistible influence on his hearers. The very quickness of speech, the ability to speak fluently and rapidly for a prolonged time, even apart from the content of the speech, is already considered a talent of the highest order. "His tongue turns like the wings of a windmill," thus, with awe, does the Gilyak characterize outstanding orators. The latter, in turn, regard themselves as chosen ones. On the continent they always carry a wooden rod, on the head of which is carved a human face, depicting, apparently, that deity which inspires them and helps them to convince others. At pathetic moments they wave these threateningly, swearing to break them in the event of the failure of their arguments and bring the wrath of the gods upon themselves and their intractable opponent.

[532]

/107 cont./

614 Finally, if one keeps in mind that the term "sin" embraces 771 not only prohibitions in the formal sense, but also the obli-783 gation to carry out positive norms, then the formula "common sin" 784 acquires a broad general sense, becomes the expression of the 182 principle of unity of the circle of clan obligations in general.
The significance of this principle is all the greater by virtue of the fact that in the eyes of the Gilyak obligations and prohibitions are by no means formal juridical norms, observed through fear of punishment, but religious imperatives, rigorously performed out of the feeling for self-preservation. For the Gilyak there is no difference between religious, sexual, and social prohibitions; all are equally religious, and to satisfy the dictates of religion means to be concerned about the benevolence of the gods, about the elimination of the machinations of the enemies of life, etc., that is to say, to feel concern for one's self-preservation. Not to fulfill them, keeping in mind the whole clan background of the cult, means not only to destroy oneself, but the whole clan as well. Hence the great importance of this principle as a cementing agent of the clan union. Hence, 614 on /108/ the other hand, it becomes comprehensible as to 182 why norms frequently contradicting human nature, requiring 602 immense self-control, are carried out, not through compulsion, 183 but as the natural dictates of instinct. Consider, for example, with what strength the sexual norms act. In general, in matters of the sexual instinct the Gilyak, both men and women, follow their natural inclinations with complete freedom; there is no chastity either before or after marriage. Their only concern is not to become victims of jealousy. There is no question of any feeling of self-restraint. Nevertheless, despite the complete sexual license from our point of view, the Gilyak observes complete chastity with respect to persons of the prohibited categories. A adultery is unknown to him; the adulterer is a monstrosity, an exception that is 614 almost never encountered. The same is true of the prohibi-
602 tions of speech. Brothers and sisters, left face to face, will 182 go for whole days enduring the torments of silence, in the most urgent necessity exchanging rare businesslike phrases in

/108 cont./

*614 impersonal form, although by temperament these are far 602 from taciturn people. Of course such self-control is the 182 result of upbringing and training to a considerable degree, but it never would have reached such a high state of self-restraint if it were not for the general consciousness of the destructive effect of each individual infraction on the welfare of the whole clan.

*614 The religious sanction of prohibitions and obligations and 783 the lively consciousness on the part of one and all that "sin 784 is communal" explain to us the most amazing aspect of
● 771 the clan structure, the presence of the social organism and the almost complete absence of the element of compulsion, authority. But more about this later.

*614 Such are the basic features of the clan. By them one 182 can judge its all-embracing role in the life of the Gilyak. It enfolds a man from birth to death, giving life all its content. It surrounds him with intimate bonds of kinship from both the side of the father and the side of the mother. It unites with a living bond the living generation with the departed ones. It guarantees to man an individual marriage and conjugal rights outside of it, and after his death it provides for his widow and children. The clan defends his life and the inviolability of his family against encroachments by a member of another clan, ready as one man to rise to the defense of the trampled rights of a clansman and to answer for his guilt to a member of another clan. It feeds him when he is hungry, it pays the debts of the insolvent, it assists in the payment of the bride price and of blood money.

*614 /109/ In the benevolence of the clan gods, in the clan 182 sacrifices, man finds the higher protection and the strong-771 est guarantee of his welfare. The clan is the school of moral training, the school of duty, of social co-operation and abnegation, and, finally, in the clan, man finds the highest pleasures and the most valuable consolation in the most bitter miseries of life - the noisy joys of festivals and preparations for felicity in the world beyond the grave.

/115 cont./

555 and the chosen one cannot either evoke envy or pride himself on 556 his advantages (1).
156

1. The following example can serve as a good illustration of the outlook of the Gilyak on the origin of personal wealth. On the western shore of Sakhalin the wealthiest man in my time was a certain Gibl' from the village of Tangivo. He had, in effect, a fine intelligence and was an able hunter and an energetic man. Moreover, he was aided by his acquaintance with the Russian officials, whom he served in the capacity of supplier of furs and collections. But the Gilyak logic saw the cause of his extraordinary wealth in a quite special circumstance; that he once found far away in the hills under a log a piece of some kind of substance, a magic talisman, sent to him by the gods.

[789]

*614 His protectors, sending him the beasts of the taiga and the 156 fish of the water, are the common genii of the clan. To hoard [454] one's wealth, not sharing it with one's clansmen, would be [183] equivalent to appropriating for oneself that which belongs to one jointly with all, and the highest ambition of such a man is to display his benevolence and generosity to those around him.

Such are the economic relations, producing a whole personality equal to others in preparation and knowledge, /116/ excluding the possibility of mutual slavery, and creating for each person a healthy atmosphere of consciousness of his own freedom and self-determination.

156 But the greatest wholeness is given to a person by his socio-
● 771 religious world-outlook. The basic axiom of everyone is that all his existence and welfare are completely in the hands of the gods, in particular the clan gods, who shower their beneficence not on

/116 cont./

156 one but on all. Any attempt to monopolize the gifts of the gods
● 771 must inevitably incur just punishment by the common benefactors of the clan.

*614 Everything that religion and clan wisdom prescribe for gain-771 ing the beneficence of the gods is a blessing for each, and to 182 carry out their dictates means only to take care of one's self. It 156 is the same with all the prescriptions of clan regulations, be they 183 sexual norms, rules of revenge, or religious rites; any infraction of them on the part of one is a common "sin" and is destructive to all.

All more or less important acts of social life, even including sacrificing one's self in a battle of vengeance for one's clansman, are categorical imperatives of a religious world-outlook which neither allow hesitation nor require compulsion. All of the instincts for self-preservation are in complete harmony with the religious ideas. By an act of revenge, a man protects his own security, but he thereby also fulfills a religious duty by appeasing the spirit of the dead man, which is able to inflict punishment if it remains unavenged. And so it is in everything...

156 A healthy, integrated, comprehensively developed per-
*614 sonality with an integrated religio-social world-outlook, creating 182 a perfect harmony of the personal and social interests and the driving forces of life -- such is the hidden, but mighty mainspring of the clan mechanism.

Observe how, without any regulation or organs of compulsion, but with only the desire of an individual, the complicated mechanism of clan life operates.

*614 Suppose a clansman with a family dies. It is necessary to 768 provide for his family, to preserve his property until the heirs
182 reach maturity, and it is necessary, in order to avoid disputes, to decide to whom the widow of the deceased shall pass. There are no judges, there are no authorities, but, a short while after the deceased has been buried, the nearest clansmen assemble, have a short discussion, listen to the claimants, and the one they decide upon will be the husband of the widow and the father of the orphaned children.

/363 cont./

1717 deception and exploitation everywhere, but by degrees they will end up by making use of the same weapon. The Sakhalin Gilyak have a good chance of maintaining themselves longest of all since they are farthest from the center of settlement. But Russian influence makes itself felt even on them. From all the settlements 1717 they go out to work for wages and go to make their purchases at 464 Nikolayevsk, and every Gilyak who returns from work to his native [434] settlement brings back the same atmosphere as the youth who returns to a Russian village from work in the big cities. Moreover, work in the towns, with its varying fortunes, ever more /364/ and more destroys that primitive equality which constitutes the dominant feature of the simple economic life of such peoples as the [454] Gilyak. Together with the wealth that they have amassed in the new environment, people bring back the economic customs of that environment. But for the present, let us not look into the new phenomena in the life of the Gilyak; let us turn now to their still unshaken foundations.

III.

Religious Views

776 Though the dominant feature of the polytheism of the Gilyak
302 is its anthropomorphism, the worship of the powers of nature lies ● 771 at its foundation. Thus, among them, fire is a deity, "a small-small deity," it is true, but one nevertheless. To the question "why?" a Gilyak replies: "But without fire how can one live?" It is considered a sin to put out a fire in the hearth; even damaging the fence of a hearth is a sin. During the season of seal hunting, [688] or when a newborn child is in the yurt, and in many other cases, it is considered a sin to carry the fire out of the yurt. It is to fire, as to a divine element, that the Gilyak entrusts the bodies of his dead. In the hierarchy of deities, however, fire is far from occupying first place. The fact that obtaining fire is within the power of man greatly diminishes its majesty in the eyes of the

/364 cont./

[372] Gilyak. Finally, the hierarchy of the deities is based on the num-[372] ber of benefits received by man from each of them, and the sea and the taiga give the Gilyak more than fire does. Imagining the ● [771] elements and the powers of nature as divine, even often referring to them as gods, a Gilyak at the same time believes that each element has its own master -- nivukh, who is a god -- "kur." These nivukhi are real Gilyak, not only in their striking similiarity but even their dress (let us remember that "nivukh" also means "Gilyak"). These are not a product of the imagination; "one can see them." "A certain man," -- a Gilyak acquaintance told me seriously, "once met the master of the sky ("kur"). He was riding on a sled pulled by wolves, but, upon encountering the Gilyak, the wolves turned upward and disappeared into the sky with their rider." One can hear about many "nivukhi," that a Gilyak of such and such a settlement has recently seen "him" in this or that place. Like the Gilyak, the nivukhi have children, perhaps there are whole clans ("khal") of them, and, like the Gilyak, finally, they are mortal. The god of the taiga and of the mountains, the master and the father of all forest beasts, is called "Pal'-nivukh" (pal' -- moun-[782] tain, taiga). All the sacrifices /365/ at the bear festival belong to [796] him. It is he who orders the bear to bite "very hard," in case of a violation of the ritual of the festival. The god of the sea, the father and master of all inhabiting it, is called "Tolles," "Toll'-nivukh, and is just about the most powerful deity of the Gilyak; it [821] is he who sends illness and healing. The sun, the moon, and the stars are all deities of the Gilyak, and the first two are spouses; the sun is the wife; the moon, the husband; and, of course, on these heavenly bodies are gods -- masters. "Have you never seen" a Gilyak said to me with assurance, "the nivukh on the moon when it is large? He is fully a Gilyak!"

There is among them an idea of something like devils ("uchkharum"). This is a whole khal', living in the sea and dangerous for the Gilyak when they are hunting seals. They ride about in boats and when they see a boat with Gilyak killing seals, they loudly ask: "What are you doing here?" Woe if the Gilyak reply

/366 cont./

796 the god gives meat to man, and the bones are returned as the 782 creative element for future fish and seals. For the same reason [224 the Gilyak carefully buries the eyes in the sand of the shore, and [225 any undeveloped fetus found in the uterus of a seal. To the Gilyak a sacrifice is not a ritual or a routine matter, but serious business on which his welfare depends. In addition to the solemn sacrifices offered at the opening of the seal season, the Gilyak with special solemnity gives presents to his god at the beginning of the sable [342 season. He offers this sacrifice all by himself in the taiga, at the side of the same small balagan which serves as a night shelter the whole time he watches over his snares and traps. Besides his usual gifts, he sometimes sacrifices a dog for this occasion. After striking the sacrificial animal in the heart, he gives its blood to the god, but eats the meat at a solemn feast with his kinsmen.
He usually gives frequent gifts to his gods, although just a little at a time, believing that a hundred fish mean as little to a god as a handful of rice or saranka means to a Gilyak. Offerings made during a journey can be touching. I remember that once during a journey to northern Sakhalin we came to the crest of a mountain ridge unexpectedly, and suddenly there unfolded the magical panorama of the mountains. The "Head of the earth" towered majestically before us. My Gilyak companions were deeply moved. One of them took from his sled his cherished little sack with saranka, tobacco, sweet roots, and so forth, and, moving off about 30 steps to the right, he squatted down, buried a handful of each in the snow, and repeated his prayer for a long time. When he got up, he moved the same number of steps to the left and did the same.
Then, his face suffused with emotion, he returned to us and distributed the remains of his sacrifice. He had prayed that we be granted a happy journey. Later, he was able to boast that his prayers had 701 been heard... There is a tremendous difference between the religious feeling of a Gilyak and the religious feeling of not only a Christian, Jew, or Moslem, but even of a Buddhist. "Contrition," the striving of the soul toward the deity, in our meaning, all seem to be incomprehensible things to a Gilyak. For him, in religion everything is simple /367/ and clear; there are no doubts and no [781] suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy.

/367 cont./

002 suffering. He does not understand religious ecstasy. Shamanism, 756 with its ecstasy, seems to me to be a borrowed phenomenon. It • does not fit in with the religious beliefs of the Gilyak. It is true [754 that he believes the shaman, trusts him to cure the sick, superstitiously fears him, believes in his predictions and in the power of his magic, believes, for instance, that the shaman can kill any man no matter how far away from him this last may be (thus they say that the Rykovo shaman killed the Nikolayevsk one by shooting a bird that was flying past); shamanism, however, is not typical 756 of Gilyak religious views. It is perhaps appropriate to mention at this point that shamans do a great deal of harm to their worshipers.
[754 In the case of the unsuccessful outcome of their treatments, they often pass the blame onto quite innocent people, whom they subject to physical violence and to cruel persecutions if the patient [158 dies. Also, by suggesting to their patients that their illness is the result of possession by devils, they cause serious psychic disturb-[782 ances in people whose nervous state is healthy. The prayers of the Gilyak are quite characteristic, simple and clear like their beliefs.
"Kur, piongukhla!" (Oh, God, please!) -- the Gilyak limits himself to this when he asks for something from his god.

796 The Gilyak have a hazy conception, or better a feeling, about 577 a supreme deity, the father of all men and of all that exists, but for him it is just a vague feeling for which he does not have a clear formulation. The gods have a relation, not only to the material 583 life of man, but also to his moral life. Moral principles of communal living, helping one's neighbors, and respect for the life [776 and property of another enjoy divine sanction. Violating them leads to punishment in this life (sickness, premature death) and in the future life. I happened to hear such a statement from a Gilyak:
"If a rich man abuses a poor man, it is a great sin, but if a poor man abuses a rich one (in the material sense, if he borrows and does not repay, deceives him, etc.), that is not a sin!" This statement sounded all the stranger to me, because the Gilyak who made it was a very rich man himself, a big kulak, who did not hesitate to oppress the poor in any way. I do not venture to judge how much this extremely attractive belief is really the belief of the Gilyak, or whether it is the result of Russian influence, or more hypocrisy.

/367 cont./

577 In any case, it is characteristic. The Gilyak therefore have a 783 clear conception of sin ("umgysh"). It goes without saying /368/
773 that such things as stealing and murder are a sin but, to be sure, 688 there are a great number of acts, indifferent from our point of view, that are considered sins by the Gilyak, for instance: to heat seal fat on a fire and not in the sun is a sin, and, in general, to deviate from the old ways is a sin. It is curious that in many cases a sin, even when it consists in insulting a deity, is atoned for by a fine paid to one or another person; for example, for the slightest harm to the fence of the hearth, the one who caused it must pay a dog, a cup and saucer, and a few other small things to the master of the yurt; otherwise, one of the two will become ill. Even this small episode illustrates the idea of the necessity to [682 atone for a sin. The damages paid for a murder are provided by the clan of the murderer not by necessity (such necessity does not always exist), but as an atonement for the sin before an angered deity. On the other hand, the gods do not allow an evil deed (sin) of people to go unpunished. They send storms and rains, a scarcity of fish and fowl, send down diseases and various other [821 misfortunes. The Gilyak think that thunderstorms and lightning [829 have become more frequent since the arrival of the Russians; this is because the god has been angered by the sins of the Russians.

• 771 Imagining his gods as mortal, the Gilyak merely expresses 775 his extremely anthropomorphic view of them. In fact, human existence, according to his belief, does not end with this life.
There, beyond the flame of the fire, is another world, another land where a Gilyak lives again, with the same needs and the same ideas; only there the poor man will be rich and the rich man poor.
After death a Gilyak receives a different name, and it is a sin to call a deceased person by his old name. They also believe in the transmigration of souls, or, more exactly, in many rebirths. Thus, there is a legend which tells that after the death of a Gilyak who 766 had on his face distinctive scars from wounds received in a fight [764 with a bear, a boy was born to another Gilyak with the very scars on his face as the deceased had. It is well-known that the Sakhalin Gilyak burn their dead. There is, however, one case when this

/369 cont./

797 baptism exclusively for the purpose of obtaining a certificate of legal marriage to such and such a Gilyak woman, certificates which give the right and opportunity to secure governmental assistance for the return of the wife in case of her abduction. I have, moreover, met a great number of baptized Gilyak from the mainland, and from my conversations with them I have been convinced that they do not have the slightest idea of even the ritual side of Christianity, let alone its substance. Nevertheless, the Gilyak is capable of grasping the idea of the one God with His attributes as taught by the Christian religion. I could say a great many things about the methods used on the Amur to convert the natives to Christianity, but this /370/ is not the appropriate place for it. As for the Sakhalin Gilyak, an especially talented missionary could perhaps make some progress; many generations will have to pass, however, before the Gilyak breaks his ties with the gods which provide him with fish, seals, and sable. The baptized [771 Goldi and the Amur Gilyak are now pronounced skeptics in their
• [771 attitude toward religion in general, but they continue to make [778 sacrificial offerings as before. It must further be added that the Sakhalin Gilyak have no idols.

IV.

Juridical Life

581 Marriage. Despite all the remains and remnants of the old order of life of which I have spoken, the modern marriage of the Gilyak, from a juridical point of view, has a completely individualistic form. One cannot call it, in the strict sense of the word, either monogamy or polygamy, but one cannot call it communal, either.
581 In the eyes of the world every married woman is the wife of 684 a given individual, and her children are the children of that individual. Violations of fidelity on the part of the wife bring 684 bloody retribution from the husband. The Gilyak who catches his wife in flagrante delicto with a stranger kills the seducer and beats

/739 cont./ But they

796 insisted on it and went on to say that the god of the Manchu was 129 called Maü and that the Manchu have idols carved in wood, human 778 figures in various positions, with a pipe in the mouth, the arms 171 akimbo, and the like. The Manchu bowed before these idols, but the Gilyak did not do this when they went to the Manchu.

I inquired further as to whether and how the Gilyak pray, 124 but always received the answer that they do not pray. My next 982 question therefore was whether they had an evil god (or spirit) be-
• 771 side and beyond the good god, a question which seemed to surprise 776 them, and I realized that the placing together of my words "god" and "evil" seemed absurd and contradictory to them. Hence they replied in the negative. But since the Gilyak /740/ are full of superstition, I can only explain as follows the contradiction between their idea of "God" described here and the evidence for various idols and their shamanism that I found:

Among the Gilyak there is an obscure and hazy conception 796 of "God," of a supreme being, who has the attribute of the "Good 786 One" in full measure and without any admixture of evil and who is revered by human beings. But this conception is a wholly ab-[782 stract, completely empty one and does not at all fit into the life, into the customs and practices of the Gilyak; there is nothing concrete about it for them, and therefore they only know the word
"pray," but not the act itself. Also, they know nothing about "God," in view of the complete emptiness of the concept, except that he is "kingulätsch, the Good One." In the real, concrete life, 771 however, the Gilyak experience much that is bad and evil, and there are many forces of Nature which, especially in hunting and in fishing, are often obstructive, menacing, and even fatal for them, such as the often unfettered power of the elements themselves, the often fatal strength of beasts of prey, the occasional and to them inexplicable absence of fish, and the like -- forces against which man, and all the more a primitive people completely dependent upon Nature, must feel his powerlessness. He cannot always escape such forces of Nature and they do him harm; to him, therefore, they are so many evil events which he views (from the general, egoistic-teleological, primitive viewpoint of man) as

/740 cont./

• 771 powers always only directed against him and superior to him in strength, and which he more or less personifies in concrete, but crude representation. This feeling of his own helplessness in the 771 face of the forces hostile to him, and yet the inalienable wish to 812 avoid their harmful encroachment upon his life -- these causes, together with the inevitable, involuntary, and unconscious view that in the action of these powers, as in his own actions, there is a cause-and-effect, cause-and-consequence relationship, lead him to a series of conclusions through which his own acts and the action of the powers hostile to him are brought into a causal nexus 771 And this is the origin of his many-shaped superstition which gives 812 rise to customs and special performances that are intended to 532 pacify the evil forces or to keep them away, as well as to the personified representation of the evil powers in this or that crude, approximate fashion, through carving animal and human figures in wood, and to shamanism. The many wooden figures of bears, lizards, toads, snakes, and even of human beings which are found among the Gilyak may have this origin and meaning. The Gilyak does not regard them as gods and does not worship them. They are only representations or intimations of hostile powers in Nature from which he seeks to escape. The fact that human figures are also found among them should not be interpreted as though they were personified representations of divine beings, such as anthro-pomorphism has created in more spiritual fashion in other places.
771 In the view of a primitive people, and the Gilyak, too, man stand 812 wholly and exclusively within Nature; according to their superstition he stands /741/ in a close and immediate causal relationship with the events of Nature (or evil powers), and this in itself may make the representation of a human being necessary for the performance of many a shamanistic act. The conception of God, the [776 Good One, however, is much too vague and lacking in content among the Gilyak to make it possible to speak of any connection with it and thus also of anthropomorphic ideas and representations.
But though the Gilyak do not regard this superstition and shamanis etc. as divine service or prayer, but only as a practical act in the lives in order to escape all harm, nevertheless we are obliged to call this their religious consciousness. And thus we find a strange and monstrous contradiction in the religious conceptions of the Gilyak: on the hand, the idea of a single supreme and benevolent being, even though so completely empty that it precludes the worship of it, and, on the other hand, the purification of countless evil powers, along with a crude cult to ward them off and keep them away; many representations of animal and human forms in the yurts, and yet the Gilyak say that they have no representations of God; countless superstitious and shamanistic acts, and yet they deny that they pray. And, on the other hand, they speak of a supreme, wholly good being and have the word "pray" (mjágratsch) and yet do not worship this god. How is this to be explained? It seems to be that there is not a dualism of conceptions here, but rather a matter of two completely separate concepts with connection with each other and also historically distinct. -- The former is a thoroughly attenuated, obscure, and now only traditional deism which among the Gilyak consists of no more than merely a few traditional words -- God, the Good One, pray; and exerts no influence upon the rest of their so-called religious conceptions and acts (superstition, shamanism, idols) other than that those words are not carried over to these conceptions and acts. The second religious conception is probably basically identical with that of many primitive Siberian peoples and aims at keeping evil spirits and powers away from human beings by means of various superstitious observances and performances. The former deistic belief is probably the echo of an ancient conception perhaps commemorative of the cradle of the Gilyak. In fact, in the attribute of "God," kīngulātsch, and in the abstract, nihilistic character of the conception there is accord with the Central Asiatic religious systems, but the second conception may have originated at a much later time, after the Gilyak tribe had moved downstream into the wilderness of the eastern forests of the Asiatic continent (?) and therefore shows many points of contact and similarities with the religious conceptions of the neighboring Siberian peoples, and even of the Ainu. The first conception was completely lost, except for a few words, and another, a cruder and more concrete one developed, without, however, on account of the persistence of tradition, reaching any pretensious of a religious one or completely driving out and replacing that empty concept of God among the Gilyak.

/741 cont./

/741 cont./

I realized that the wooden idols of the Gilyak do not actually enjoy any very great esteem or reverence among them from the fact that the Gilyak from Kulk from whose deserted yurt /742/ I had appropriated a collection of their idols in the summer of 1854, did not seem to notice the loss upon their arrival in the village, or at least did not consider it worth mentioning. In the same village I also once saw a small boy come out of the house playing with a wooden bear figure, a sign that these things were not as inaccessible to him as they certainly would be if they enjoyed special veneration. (Bm. I, pp. 22-27.)

Idols and Amulets in Human Shape

2. Gilyak. The various idols carved in wood, sometimes human or sometimes animal in shape, which served to ward off danger, misfortune, sickness, and the like, were designated to me by the Gilyak with the general names of kīgn and tschngai (1).

1. The word mafk also seems to refer to idols in general.

In addition, however, special names for individual figures were also given to me. A crude representation of the whole human form (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig 1) or at least a bust of one is found as a rule in the yurt of the Gilyak on the crossbeam of the roof-frame, above the sleeping benches along the narrow side of the yurt away from the entrance (that is, above the place where among the Olcha and Goldi the similarly-shaped sāwa stand). Sometimes, however, the Gilyak wear similar small idols on their chests, to which they give the name pangch (Plate LIII /p. 1253/, Fig. 5). If a Gilyak is seriously ill, the shaman carves such an idol for him, or advises him to carve one and to wear it so that he will become well. But 778 771 171 favor of the religious conceptions of the Tungusic Amur peoples, whoever they are, in comparison with the Gilyak, is that the former are not nearly as apprehensively superstitious as the latter (1 W.R. II, pp. 85, 86).

Animal Idols

778 532 825 10. Gilyak. The bear plays the primary role among the animals that are represented in wood as idols by the Gilyak. The reason for this is the danger to which they are exposed in their fights with this beast of prey, for they are particularly fond of pursuing the bear (as was mentioned in connection with the bear festivals). The bear kägn or tschngai serve to prevent the injuries and fatalities which can be expected on these occasions. I have mentioned above the superstitious beliefs associated with the death of a man killed by a bear among the Gilyak (1). Hence one rarely enters a village

1. See p. 1127.

[171] near which, upon closer inspection, one does not come across a few bear idols. And this is common to both the Gilyak and the Tungusic Amur peoples.

The bear idols are usually very crudely fashioned. The animal ordinarily appears to be sitting, sometimes standing. The idol pictured on Plate LVIII /p. 1258 /, Figs. 1 and 2, from the village of Kuik, is one of the best that I have seen. It is further distinguished by the fact that a raised band runs around its body, upon which other animals sacred to the Gilyak, or, more accurately, uncanny and portentous, are represented (these are most of the reptiles produced in Gilyak country): the toad -- mipitsch (2) on [126] 2. Besides this representation I obtained two individual toad-idols of the Gilyak, carved in wood, which are illustrated on Plate LIX /p.1259 /, Figs. 7, 8.

778 /752 cont./ 825 the disaster. Since then the once large village of Chala has had 173 only a few inhabitants. (2 S.R. I, p. 39.)

Gi 25. Olcha. Among the Olcha I saw an idol-belt, a säwuchsa 778 provided with various säwa or representations of idols, to be worn 825 around the body as an amulet against sicknesses (Plate LX /p.1260 751 Fig. 3). On either side of the leather belt two snakes (dshalda), likewise of leather, were sewed on lengthwise, and between them on either side a fox carved out of wood was attached in the same direction. In front, in the middle, there was a toad of leather an on it a human figure in wood. The most interesting thing on the belt, however, was the representation of the khasj (chaż of the Gilyak) in wood hanging below the toad and the human figure, th imaginary animal with which I became acquainted among the Gil G in Chiare and which is also carved by the Olcha as protection Gi against sickness. The great similarity between the Gilyak kägn 778 and the säwa of the Olcha is very striking and leads to the con- 771 clusion that there is a similar correspondence in the religious con- 171 cepts and ideas of these peoples. (2 S.R. I, pp. 32-33.)

Shamans

G 756 184 [171] 26. Gilyak. Among the Gilyak the shaman is employed muc less than among the Tungusic Amur peoples, the Olcha, Goldi, Kile, and others, and therefore the shaman's implements are muc less frequently found among them. Just as among the Amur peoples in general, so also among the Gilyak in particular, shamanisr is found more and more rarely downstream toward the Liman or toward Sakhalin. One scarcely comes across shamans and shaman implements from Wassj on and anywhere along the Liman. After repeated inquiries about them, I did not see any or hear of any. Thus shamanism seems to have moved downstream and to have had its origin farther inland. (Bm. I, p. 75.)

G 756 /753/ 27. Gilyak. In the whole area of the Amur Gilyak ther are only a few shamans who have a reputation among their country men. I was told that the most famous of them "a great shaman,"

/49 cont./

771 For him, the prototype of everything that exists is, naturally, man, as the creature whom he knows and understands best. Everything reduces itself to man: everything visible in nature is a form in which is invested god-man. With such a world view, the religion of the Gilyak represents a combination of pantheism, the cult of animals, fetishism, demonism, polytheism, etc., all of them against the general background of anthropomorphism.

772 The Gilyak calls the universe "kum," but with this same 776 word he denotes the concept of a personal, man-like god. With the word "pal'" he denotes mountain and the god -- "master" of the mountain; with the word "tol'" -- the sea and the god of the sea. The universe is only the form which has been assumed by great image of the personal god, "kum."

823 The Gilyak calls his native island "mif" (the earth). It is a living, divine creature, whose "head" (Cape Marii) and "chin," "Pytykry," lie in the Sea of Okhotsk, while its "legs" are two peninsulas in the Korsakov okrug which lie in La Pérouse Strait.

[782] I myself have made some trips across the "Chin," have seen how respectfully sacrifices were made by my companions and prayers were delivered to the earth concerning our successful journey. I made my way up to the top of the very "Head"
[798] of the earth, which, according to the beliefs of the Gilyak, does not leave unpunished a sacrilegious offense against it by the feet of mortals, and saw the majestic bald spot of this divine Head, covered with sharp stone teeth instead of hair /50/ (the result of weathering), which bring superstitious terror on the Gilyak... The majestic crest of the top of the high cape looking out on the boundless sea is indeed very imposing!

Moreover, the parts, even the smallest ones, of this grandiose being -- the "mif" -- are the same kind of living independent creatures as the divine whole. Here is the majestic mountain Engel'spal', which rises alone over the northern dunes; it is the living reindeer of the god of the universe, "kurn," on which he traveled over the island, putting it into its present state, habitable for man. The valleys were

/78 cont./

765 island, his young son, Koynyt, had two souls already, even 774 though he was as poor as Job.

774 The difference in the number of souls according to rank applies only to the so-called large souls, i.e., souls equal to a man's body in size and during his life pervading the entire organism. But, in addition to these large souls, each man also has small souls located in the head of the large soul, after whose death the small soul turns into a large one and becomes a duplicate of the deceased one. It is of extreme interest that the Gilyak visualizes the small souls in the shape of an egg, an idea which is so characteristic of the psychology of primitive man /79/ for whom the mysterious processes of embryology lead to the idea of the immortality of the soul just as inevitably as the speculation on the fact of the growth of a plant from a seed thrown into the soil led the Christian thinker to it.

During the life of a man, this small egg-like soul
[787] plays an enormous role. It is this small soul that appears to the Gilyak in his dreams, all that the Gilyak sees in the course of his dreams and that is accepted by him as living reality, all this is performed by this little soul.

[562] But shamans, no matter how many souls they have,
765 are not omnipotent... There is a time when the mightiest
766 shamans together with all their kekhn are powerless to help [765] man in his struggle against the evil spirits that reside in him. This occurs most often when a man's tormentors are the evil genii of the mountain or the sea. After destroying the body, these lords frequently carry away even the soul of the dead man. Freed of its corporal burden, however, the soul can take care of itself; it learns to escape from its pursuer and hide nearby among the friendly mountain or sea people. After some time the soul-twin, having assumed human form, travels into a new land, mysterious to us, but well-known to the Gilyak -- mlyvo (literally, "settlement of the dead"). Normally, however, the evil spirits, having killed the body, leave the soul in peace, and it may set out for the new world unhin-775 dered. It is very easy to get to the mlyvo. Somewhere on 772 the surface of the earth there is an opening (mortal men do

/79 cont./

775 not know exactly where this place is); the soul need only
772 descend into this opening and it reaches its goal. There everything is as it is here: the same earth, the same sky, sea, rivers, and forests; only there the sun shines when we have night, and the moon when we have day. The dead come to life and continue to live there in the same settlements as on earth, fish, kill beasts, celebrate clan festivals, marry and procreate. Only the material status changes: the poor man becomes rich and the rich man poor. As you see, even among the Gilyak the poor men find their consolation not in this best of all possible worlds. Even in the new world, however, sickness and death await man. From there the soul must migrate into a third world, and so on until such time as the soul degenerates and turns into ever smaller and smaller beings, a small bird, a gnat, and, finally, ashes. Sometimes souls are born again on our planet, completing again the infinite series of transformations. For the most part, however, that is the lot of women.

764 /80/ Before entering mlyvo, the soul waits to be
775 equipped with everything necessary to go to the new land comfortably and richer. And so the deceased is dressed in his best garments and in silken robes. Everything that is put on the deceased must be new, fully embroidered, elegant, and durable. A man is dressed in one, three, or six pairs, generally a number of pairs divisible by three, and women in two, four, eight, etc. pairs.

The most expensive spears, rifles, bows, and nets are taken from the storehouse -- and the souls of all these objects set off with the deceased on his journey.

764 While these preparations for a long journey are going on, the deceased is constantly fed the most delicate dishes. Kettles boil from morning until late at night; people throng in the yurt. They eat and drink as during the bear festival, and a part of each dish is given to the deceased. When they smoke, they put their mouths to the lips of the deceased, and share with him this favorite of Gilyak pleasures. While the body of the deceased is in the house, custom dictates that

/320/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Sakhalin Gilyak

I.

Religion

773 Cosmogony and the spirits-masters. Kurn, the master of the uni-
[776] verse, created everything; in the past everything was water; he "made the earth, the stream, and the rene." "Working" the earth, Kurn lost his reindeer, which turned into Lavro-pal. The large rivers are the tracks of his reindeer, while the small streams (were formed) as he waved his lash at the reindeer -- tlangi-z'ach;.

821 The sky -- tly -- is like our earth, but it moves, turns first [772] with one end, then with the other. When the sky moves away from us with its sunny end, night falls.

The stars: the largest are as large as a yurt. They are white, and therefore they cannot be seen during the daytime; in the light of the sun they become pale.

The sun: shines at night in Mlyvo (the world beyond the grave).

773 People descended from a tree: the Orok from a birch, the 824 Gilyak from a larch, the Ainu from a fir.

The master of the mountains and of the taiga, Pal' n'ngyvyn, 776 614 looks like an Ainu. Each clan has its own Pal n'ngyvyn.

Thunder lives in the water in winter, and Pal'-nivukh pierces 821 him in the eye through the water; in summer thunder attempts to avenge this. Since Pal'-nivukh has the ability to turn himself into the most minuscule creatures and to get under the skin (?) (1)

1. Illegible. S. Sh.

of a person, a Gilyak, when his finger itches during a thunderstorm, immediately lets some blood; otherwise thunder will kill the man in order to kill Pal'-n'lvukh who has gotten into the finger (a story by Gibel'ka, heard by him in Nyyde).

773

773 MYTHOLOGY--cosmogony (e.g., theories and accounts of the creation of the world and of man); mythical epochs (e.g., golden age, age of the gods, age of animals); cataclysms (e.g., mythical floods and conflagrations); culture myths (e.g., accounts of a culture hero, mythical explanations of culture traits); myths about the origin of evil and death; nature myths; totemic myths; theogonic myths; ancestor myths; etc. For texts of myths see 539. See also [Ritual] traditions 179

422 /278 cont./
583 iron, served as objects in the shagynd (1).
[794]

[793] 1. The following splendid legend gives evidence concerning this. In the central section of Sakhalin there is a mountain, Kryus' pal, and along side of it another, somewhat smaller mountain, the "wife" of the latter, who has run away from him and hidden her shagynd. Three riverside rocks represent the different objects of the shagynd. One bears the designation Wa-ul-s'if, meaning "place where the Japanese saber is buried," another Wyn-ul-af -- "place where the kettle is buried," and the third, Kys'okhty -- the butt of the ax.

583 These are objects which are unalienable, extra commercium.
422 Only in exceptional cases of extreme poverty or the absence of 556 clansmen is the alienation of objects of the shagynd category
735 allowed, and even then only a part of them. A poor widow in the 554 settlement of Pilavo, who had sold her only daughter, answered my question as to what she was going to do with the shagynd in this way: "Part of it I shall sell, and the remainder will go with me to Mlyvo -- to the world beyond the grave." They are preserved for only exceptional cases in the life of the owner -- for the payment of blood money on account of a slaying, or when one must marry off one's sons and pay a bride price or give a dowry to one's daughters, and, after the death of the owner -- to accompany him to the world beyond the grave. Only such objects figure in the bride price of rich persons. But among persons of lesser means, the bride price is made up of valuable utilitarian objects -- boats, guns, dogs, and so forth.

554 Rich people, seeking a large bride price, are guided mainly
583 by ambition, for obtaining a rich bride price is the best evidence 735 of one's own wealth. For a poor man the bride price is his only [556]

/286 cont./
117 went to the Amgun and left a sharpened stick (chjakh-varadz:, 103 Gilyak gesams'a, geskha narni); the second party did not /287/
193 notice and traveled to Chkharbakh (Turkhung), while the third party did not like the fast current of the Amgun and it settled in Gok.

After the Chinese, Tyr was inhabited by the Kojma-fing
• [193] /see Koyma above/. This was at the time when "the pike lived on land and the snake in the water; the pike used to bite, and war was declared on it with a net, arrows, and so forth. Then the god decided that the pike should live in the water and the snake under the stones." After this the Kojma-fing left for Koyma.

117 Settlement of De, one kilometer from Tyr. 1) Khal 103 Ajumka. 2) Khal Samakhaji. 3) Khal N'askhaji.
361 Settlement of Khok (one and a half kilometers from Tyr). 1) Kalm-fing -- Gilyak. 2) The Udan clan (Khan'gan -- forty years of age) -- Negda; moved from the Amgun, and it had come to the Amgun from Udyli.

Settlement of Kal'ma at seven and a half kilometers from [162] Tyr. Three Chinese; one of them married to a Gilyak woman One Kugi from Kosunaya has already lived here 20 years; he is not married, "no money to buy a wife."

117 A khal living here is a mixture of the Chokchagil and the 582 Ainu khal'a of Dmitriya in Tyr. They make chędzigr (see below) and select their wives from the Olcha and the Gilyak; there are women from the Amgun as well. At the present time they may not take women from the Chokchagil. They can take two sisters. They may not exchange women between clans. Here they may take widows as well. The daughter is given to the wife of the brother in order to be sold, but he cannot demand this. At the bear festival anyone can shoot at the bear (1910).

Settlement of Dal'dzha. -- A Negidal clan. Originally 117 the Ry-Negda lived in Dal'dzha, 30 kilometers from here. They 103 all died (only one girl remained). They lived at a winter en-193 campment. Once upon a time, in summer, a tiger appeared [539] before the entrance. They attempted to get out of the yurt, but could not. Finally they got out by stepping over the tiger. Then

/314 cont./

IX.

Ideas about Animals

825 Choramladz: (chkhoramland) -- like a cat or a polecat, even smaller than a cat; black lip. They move in herds; their footprints have been seen. They are considered most dangerous animals. If you come upon them, you must climb a tree; they surround the tree, but cannot climb it. The man ties his hat to a twig and lowers it down, the animals jump up; the man back, they fall, chew the hat, etc. Finally he saves himself: he waves a long pole around, and they run from the noise.

825 The oldest of all the land animals are pal-miv-kmyg:
• 773 myginga igagŭ syktymu yz'mudz:gu. They are of the human race. Once the lion, the tiger, and the bear were human beings. They "did it through the rear" with their wives. Kur, by accident, saw this. He said to them: "Since you have intercourse like beasts, so remain beasts in the future." Then they became beasts. Therefore they are considered to be of the human race. The bear was also a human being, but he used to walk on all fours. Kur saw this: "Since you walk like a beast, so walk like a beast." But he does not have intercourse through the rear.

839 There is no bestiality. -- On Sakhalin there was once
732 born a boy with a tail.

825 The lark makes thunder, and therefore one must not kill it.
821 It is a sin to approach its nest with baby birds -- there will be thunder.

The thunder bird -- tet lyj zevrk: -- makes thunder and, opening its mouth -- lightning.

825 /315/ The loon is the principal water bird. The oldest loon, ugn, with a tail, cries in a thin, humanlike voice, "o-o-o!" The second -- kakhtr, agŭnĭ, is smaller, cries "ka, ka, ka," or "vakh, vakh!" The third loon -- arn' is the smallest and cries in an almost human voice "a-a-a!"

/320/

Separate Materials on the Ethnography of the Sakhalin Gilyak

I.

Religion

• 773 Cosmogony and the spirits-masters. Kurn, the master of the uni-
[776] verse, created everything; in the past everything was water; he "made the earth, the stream, and the tree." "Working" the earth, Kurn lost his reindeer, which turned into Lavro-pal. The large rivers are the tracks of his reindeer, while the small streams (were formed) as he waved his lash at the reindeer -- tlangi-z'ach:.

821 The sky -- tly -- is like our earth, but it moves, turns first [872] with one end, then with the other. When the sky moves away from us with its sunny end, night falls.

The stars: the largest are as large as a yurt. They are white, and therefore they cannot be seen during the daytime; in the light of the sun they become pale.

The sun: shines at night in Mlyvo (the world beyond the grave).

773 People descended from a tree: the Orok from a birch, the 824 Gilyak from a larch, the Ainu from a fir.

776 The master of the mountains and of the taiga, Pal' n'gyvyn, 614 looks like an Ainu. Each clan has its own Pal n'gyvyn.

821 Thunder lives in the water in winter, and Pal'-nivukh pierces him in the eye through the water; in summer thunder attempts to avenge this. Since Pal'-nivukh has the ability to turn himself into the most minuscule creatures and to get under the skin (?) (1)

1. Illegible. S. Sh.

of a person, a Gilyak, when his finger itches during a thunderstorm, immediately lets some blood; otherwise thunder will kill the man in order to kill Pal'-n'ivukh who has gotten into the finger (a story by Gibel'ka, heard by him in Nyyde).

/320 cont./
821 The god of the wind -- Layzn (the evil wind -- Lamangnd), [982] no chukh-chugnd (sacrifices) are made to him. He is shot at with bows; he is not shot at with rifles for fear of evoking thunder and a storm. The wind comes about thus: "Layzn, just like man, blows from his mouth."

• 773 The bear, the sable, the fox, the otter, and the squirrel 825 were created by Pal yz'n (the master of the mountains).

Tuurmam -- the god of the hearth, the mistress of fire, 776 the old woman -- is one among all the clansmen. The head of Tuurmam is curly, the snout red, /321/ the hair short (there is no braid), the height that of a man, the clothing -- fish skin, lives in the fire.

Tajrnandz: the only one who sends fish; he is a large and [821] robust man. All his dogs are white. He rides through the air, along the Milky Way (Tairnandz: -- tif); he lives there. He also makes thunder. Each k:khal has its own Pal-n'ivukh, its own Tol-n'ivukh, even its own milk'i, but there is one Tairnandz:. They set up three trees for Tol-n'ivukh: a fir, an ashberry, and a rose willow. Strips of bark are cut out of these trees and their branches are bound with sedge. One chkhnaj has saranka attached to it.

Oskyz'n master of the hare, big like a cow, long nose.
They throw the head of a hare, with puchka tied to it. Tlangi-yz'n -- master of the reindeer, looks like a reindeer. Mekvon'-gi -- master of the kabarga.

Evil spirit -- Ge-n'ivukh. His yurt is an earthen mound near Tekhrvo. He comes to the Gilyak, opens a window (kugutŷ), extends two fingers, and asks for something. If something is given to him he leaves. If one gives him a hot coal, he does not understand what is happening, throws the coal back and forth from one hand to the other, and says: "as' kavkhaj, khavrkhaj, avgujà" -- "it is hot, if you do not have (anything), do not give!" Ge-n'ivukh likes to kidnap people, especially children. The only way -- is to inflict a wound upon oneself, for Ge-n'ivukh is afraid of blood. Pumkin's brother sat in his balagan guarding reindeer and suddenly saw two ge-n'ivukh. He began to shout and inflicted a wound

/342 cont./
197 The Tymovsk and the Okhotsk Gilyak have one language.

/343/
823 A legend about three brothers-cliffs in Aleksandrovsk on Sakhalin.
• 773 Three Heng brothers went with a bear to look at a cast-up whale (kem), and then all of them turned into stone. Two jags -- mother and daughter -- look after them.

825 A rat must not be killed with an ax; a stick is necessary.
761 Nakhvun's wife is dying because her father killed a rat with an ax; his son died for the same reason, and now his daughter is dying.

825 The attitude toward incest among dogs. According to the words of the Gilyak, among dogs a brother and sister do not copulate; exceptions are rare and are attributed to the milk. Dogs are killed for this; otherwise this heavy sin falls on the master; he will be punished with sickness and so forth. Father and daughter among dogs frequently have intercourse, but they are not killed for this.

302 Hair may be thrown away in any place.

759 A person who has been rescued from death by a bear sacri-
825 fices chukh-chugynd -- a dog -- to Pal-n'igyvyn. No one may [982] look at a person wounded by a bear; only an old man or an old woman binds his wounds. His bed is curtained off with a sall.

994 In need they sometimes eat a bear that has died, and 825 they treat him like a killed one. When they set off some-[281] where (hunting) or in general on important business, they always take along their favorite ymgi (son-in-law).

773 In Mil'kvo one Gilyak had two women. Once his daughter with the grandchildren came to visit him. She went to gather berries while the men went out to hunt seals. Then

/343 cont./
• 773 the women boiled the grandchildren, ate them, ran into the taiga, and disappeared.

708 Chnyr-chkhnaj. If a loss has occurred, they make chn 776 chkhnaj, a figure of grass, and beat it (thresh it); if the chkh 787 is good, the lost thing will be found on the following day. If it is not known what milk caused the harm, chnyr-chkhnaj is hung up over the plank bed and fed.

685 For stealing bear meat or a fishing rod, the face is mai

158 Kleptomania. There are thieves-kleptomaniacs, for e ample, Sentukh from Ady-Tymi. After his brothers threaten to kill him, he ran away to /344/ Lungvo. There he and his [994] wife continued doing the same. He has one soul -- a rat sitti in his belly. The things that tempt him shine in the dark for him. The Gilyak confined themselves to depriving him of th things.

756 The shaman Koynyt's father, from Tro, once noticed t
994 his trousers had disappeared. He began to shamanize, found rat in the belly of a woman, killed it, and on the following d the woman died.

683 Over an insult it is necessary to fight with sticks (chkha or pay tikhsind, or take something by force. Frequently they kill over an insult.

787 Fortunetelling with a stone parnkhasind, with a kettle.
The parnkhasind replies thanks to the chekhn. If the kettle straight, one has hit the mark; if to the side -- one has not h
If one has hit the mark, he must make a wooden chkhnaj, ha around his neck, and feed it.

8 These were deciphered by Klaproth and the Archimandrite
2 Avvakum. One inscription reads: "Temple of eternal peace",
7 the other is a Tibetan translation of the Sanskrit sacred formula: "Om mani padme hum", i. e., "O jewel in the lotos! Amen!" The temple was supposed to have existed in the time of G nghis Kahn. Neighboring Gilyak come to these pillars and offer sacrifices, that is, they decorate them with wood chips, pour millet or spirits on the earth, etc. Thereupon they promise themselves an abundant yield of fish.

Near the village of Vaida high above the water is to be seen a thin, dry tree trunk parallel to the water level and jutting out of the steep rock wall, with branches radiating out in a circle. This tree trunk is held to be sacred by the Vaida-Gilyak. It is also often decorated with wood chips and above its roots, on the edge of the river bank, the bear festival is held. The above-mentioned church bells also belong to the sacred objects. [RCH: see category 116, p. 237] [242]

5 Almost all Gilyak believe in a future life, which may be
1 gathered from the customs relating to the burial ceremony. Life in the hereafter is pictured exactly like the present life, except that it has neither age nor death. A deceased aged person regains his youth there, a married couple is united anew. There is neither hell nor paradise. (1) The fate of evil persons differs from that of good ones only in the fact that the souls of the former do not immediately reach that world, but must roam about on the earth for a while, usually in the form of an animal, particularly a dog. This is the Gilyak purgatory which certainly cannot be called the most absurd idea of purgatory. "The beyond" is put not below, but above somewhere in heaven.

1. A similar belief is said to exist among the natives of Kamchatka.

However, even among these savages there are sceptics, or rather unbelievers. Thus a Sakhalin-Gilyak, after a pause, told a visiting Russian priest who sounded him out on religious matters: "What business of ours is God! If we have enough sable and fish we shall live, if not, we must go hungry." Another Gilyak in the vicinity of Sofiyskoye positively denied immortality in speaking to Russian peasants, pointing to a fish and saying: "just as this fish will disappear if I put it to death, so also man disappears."

● 771 More frequently one finds those who recognize a supreme being and immortality, but do not bother much about them. Some do not even believe in the idols, and these may already reflect the opinions of those of other beliefs. Thus the little village of Kula near Nikolayevsk has for some time already had neither idols nor shamans. I was visited by two brothers who were born there and who were both wide-awake and good-natured chaps; they confessed to me that they believe in god, but regard the idols as foolishness.

756 The shamans are the mediators between the visible and 789 invisible world; they always excel in experience and 782 perspicacity, whereby they know how to predict many things, for instance, changes in the weather, and thus they exert their influence. Their chief function consists of driving out sickness which is mainly the work of evil spirits. Incidentally they are [243] also consulted on other occasions. For instance, there may be few fish at one place or another; the shaman is consulted and orders a dog of such and such color to be killed and offered up in the river at the designated place. The sacrificial gifts are generally made according to the shaman's prescriptions. A competent shaman knows how to "drive away the rain" by threatening the clouds and denouncing them loudly. Likewise, of course, he understands how to make rain and thunderstorms. "As soon as he begins his magic song, rain clouds immediately appear", a Gilyak believer told me. His magic practices can also bring harm. For instance, he can cause a human somewhere far off in some village to die of a fish or a drink which does not harm others. He can flood a village, and so forth. Occasionally the magic practices are feared, but the magician is never persecuted. However, the shamans are usually merciful enough to stick to threats only, if someone irritates them; and besides, not everybody believes in them.

755 If a shaman is invited to visit a sick person he appears
534 in his official costume. He wears a girdle on which hang numerous clinking tin objects. In his hand he carries his drum and his staff. The drum is about two-thirds meters long and consists of a wooden ring on which is stretched a pig skin or the skin of a stag, and on which hang a number of little bells. He alternately beats his drum and sings

22: Knox T-2 (1866) 1870 Gilyak

346 dent showed me several articles made by the pupils, including wooden spoons, forks, bowls, and cups, and he gave me for a souvenir a seal cut in pewter, bearing the word 'Fulyhelm' in Russian letters, and having a neatly turned handle.

The school is in operation ten months of each year. The superintendent said the children of the Russian peasants could attend if they wished, but very few did so. The teacher was a subordinate priest of the Eastern church. The expense 871 of the establishment was paid by Government, with the design of making the boys useful in educating the Gilyaks.

771 The Gilyaks of the lower Amoor are pagans, and the attempts to Christianize them have not been very successful 825 thus far. Their religion consists in the worship of idols and 964 animals, and their priests or shamans correspond to the 766 'medicine man' of the American Indians. Among animals they revere the tiger, and I was told no instance was known of their killing one. The remains of a man killed by a tiger are buried without ceremony, but in the funerals of other persons the Gilyaks follow very nearly the Chinese custom. The bear is also sacred, but his sanctity does not preserve him from being killed.

BEAR IN PROCESSION.

825 In hunting this beast they endeavor to capture him alive; once taken and securely bound he is placed in a cage in the

772

772 COSMOLOGY--conception of the universe; cosmological systems (e.g., heavens and hells); universal categories (e.g., dualism of nature); etc. See also:
Realm of the dead . . . . . 775 Ideas about cosmic phenomena 821
Conception of a moral order of the universe . . 812

4 dead one is brought or carried into the woods, accompanied by relatives and friends. He is placed on a pyre where he is burned in three or four hours. The skull and the extremities usually burn faster than the spinal column. The mourning relatives stand around the fire. In token of their sorrow the women let their hair hang loose, the men sometimes cut theirs short. The ashes are gathered in a vessel and placed in the "death house". The latter is an ordinary yurt in design, but very small, somewhat like a large doll house. Beneath it the clothes, the pipe, and the weapons of the deceased are buried. Sometimes, however, the clothes are also burned. The favorite dog is killed but not burned; it is consumed by the mourners. On Sakhalin, if the deceased was a wealthy man, all the dogs which brought his sled to the funeral pyre are killed; poor people content themselves with burning the sled.

There is no special place for the death houses; they stand by themselves all over the woods, not too far from the village. On certain days the relatives assemble here for a funeral rite. Millet, a stuffed pipe, and such things are placed in the little house through the window, and all who are present break into loud lamentation.

4 The above-described burial ceremony is customary only
2 among the true Gilyak, that is, on the island of Sakhalin and on the mainland along the Amur up to Bogorodskoye. The Sofiyskian Gilyak lower the bodies without a coffin into a crypt. The deceased is given his best clothes for the journey besides a bowl of millet, a stuffed pipe and some spirits. At the head-and foot-end [239] stakes are driven, on which hang his weapons and other objects. For these graves there is
6 also no particular place. Sometimes, instead of being bur-
2 ied the corpses are put in open cradles made of wicker and suspended from trees. This is supposed to be done when there are epidemics, and thus the very thing that should not be done is done. However, since these death cradles are isolated and hung up at a great distance from the villages, the miasmas resulting from decomposition are probably not harmful.

XV Weltanschauung and Religion.

1 The Gilyak do not generally like to speak of transcendental matters. One is advised by some of them to ask a shaman for information, since he knows better. Others, on the contrary, answer the given questions like disinterested persons, that is, they say the shaman maintains this or that, but a certain scepticism is apparent. The Gilyak are 771 predominantly of a practical disposition and are not fond of rumination. Moreover, they do not yet have firm beliefs and their prophets, the shamans, often misuse their imagination so boldly that their assertions contradict those of other shamans or of everyday experience. From conversations, from customs and actions, we may conclude that the Gilyak believe in a supreme being, in many lesser spirits, both good and bad, and in immortality, but they have not emerged from fetishism.

776 God (kush or kur) made everything, he lives in heaven and 782 never appears. He is held to be good, but otherwise nothing is said of his characteristics. In one village, however, I heard that God is very angry if a shaman is put to death. In this we may already see something like priestly self-glorification. Kush is not worshipped, in fact, one does not bother much about him, only now and then something is sacrificed to him, but it is questionable whether this is meant for him or for his subordinate spirits. For instance, when a Gilyak crosses a dangerous passage on his journey, he pours a bowl of spirits on the earth or in the waters: this is the sacrifice to God. Sometimes one of the best dogs is sacrificed to him, whereupon it is eaten. Near a village a stake is sometimes rammed into the earth and beneath it millet or fish are buried, or tobacco and such things [240] are tied on top, - all this is meant to be for the supreme being. Such a stake remains standing until it rots.

825 The bear usually appears as the executor of divine 783 ordinances, and he punishes the bad people during their lifetime. As a matter of fact, there are a number of superstitious ideas connected with the bear, and thus he may be regarded as a "sacred" animal, but nobody regards him as a god or demigod.

825 The Gilyak do not bother much about the tiger, for they 789 seldom encounter him. But the Goldi and Manchurians re-
278 gard him as much more than a wild animal. He is regarded as having some mysterious power, he is spoken of with a certain caution and referred to as "the honorable colored one". (1) It is also said of him that he only attacks bad

1. Barabach, Journey on the Sungari. 1874. (Published in Russian).

people. However, if the tiger creates too much havoc and kills the cattle of the Manchurians, they set traps for him parties to agree. When agreement was reached, the khlay-nivkh came to the offending clan with men of the victim clan, fully armed, and a duel was enacted between the representatives of the two clans. Then each clan representative killed a dog, and peace was considered established. After that, the ransom was paid. It consisted of coats of mail, spears, silk materials and other valuable objects.

The Nivkhi had a classificatory system of kinship. But, in distinction to the Tunguso-Manchurian system, the specific term of kinship among them applied always to persons of one, rather than different generations. As Shternberg showed, the classificatory system of the Nivkhi reflected even in his time the existing marriage norms. The Nivkhi retained until the end of the 19th century some remnants of group marriage. These relations were possible only for persons of the same generation, and were categorically forbidden among persons of different generations.

All the members of a clan were divided into four age groups: 1) grandfathers and great-grandfather (atak); 2) fathers (ytyk), their brothers (tuvng), the husbands of the mother's sisters and the brothers of the husbands of the mother's sisters; 3) brothers and sisters (tuvng); and 4) children (ola).

Trade ties with China and the transformation of fur-hunting, and later of fishing, into economic activities directed to commercial ends stimulated the disintegration of the clan order among the Nivkhi, which occurred first among the Amur Nivkhi. The latter had early begun to trade with the Manchus. Nivkhi merchants sailed up the Sungari to San-hsing, and bartered furs and beluga backbones for tea, tobacco, fabrics and metal articles. They also bartered with the Ainu, the Japanese and with other neighbors. Members of the Tvabing clan, for instance, were for a long time the middlemen between the Sakhalin Nivkhi and the Ainu. Thus, long before Russian colonization, the Nivkhi began to be divided into rich and poor. The rich could have several wives and 3-5 slaves. The rich man's bride-price always included large quantities of imported valuables. But commodity relations developed slowly, since exchange was only in the medium of furs and, to a lesser extent, fish. The mass of the Nivkhi continued in a subsistence economy.

Slaves did only housework. They could set up their own households and marry free women. The slave's descendants of the fifth generation were considered free. On the whole, slavery was not widespread among the Nivkhi and was of a patriarchal character.

At the end of the 17th and in the 18th centuries, the Manchus established among the Nivkhi, as well as the Nanays, the posts of khalada— clan elders, and gasyanda—village elders.

After the middle of the last century, the disintegration of the Nivkhi subsistence economy proceeded more rapidly. After the Nivkhi had finally become a part of Russia, slavery disappeared; a new form of exploitation appeared, in the institution of "half-shares." Nivkhi who lacked the implements of production fell into the position of "half-sharers." The catch was divided according to the number of participants, but those who used the implements of others had to yield half of their share to the owner.

Before the Revolution, the Nivkhi were officially considered Orthodox Christians, but their views remained animistic. They thought of the island of Sakhalin as an anthropomorphic creature; similar ideas were held about trees, mountains, rivers, water, earth and cliffs. The killer whale was in their thinking an yz'—a "master" of other animals. Almost every natural phenomenon had its yz'. The chief of these were Pal-yz'—the "master" of the mountains and the taiga, and Tayrnadz, or Tol'yz'—the "master" of 231

342
291

Feeding a bear.

the sea. Both the Nivkhi dwelling and every river had its yz', ~~who took care~~ 771 of man. The sky was thought to be inhabited by "sky people." The sky 776 people—the sun and moon—had no close relations with man, but the Nivkhi were always in close relations with the yz'. "Receiving" from them fish, sea animals, etc., the Nivkhi had to "give" them in return—to sacrifice to them. The cult connected with the "masters" of nature was of pronounced clan character.

The "mountain man," the "sea man" and the bear, in the Nivkhi 796 thinking, were common to the clan. And the bear festival (chkhyf-le- 614 kherno—"bear game") was a clan festival. The clan which celebrated the 231 festival assumed the expense and work of arranging it. This festival was [769] connected with the cult of the dead, since it was usually held in memory of a dead clan kinsman. A bear cub was caught in the taiga or bought and placed in a special frame building. The cub was reared by members of the given clan. On specific days it was taken out and led on a chain through the encampment. The bear was reared for several years. Before the festival, all the clan members gave the bear's master products and money. The master's family prepared food for the holiday (usually held in February), built a platform—a shooting ground with one or several pairs of trees—poles hung with ritual shavings (inau) and covered with carving. The bear was tied between them. The honorary duty of killing the bear was given the narkha—people of the clan in the relationship of "son-in-law" to the clan holding the festival. The festivities sometimes lasted several days and consisted of a complex ceremony of killing the bear with a bow and arrow, ritual feasting on the bear meat, the sacrifice of dogs, and so on. The bearskin with the head was lowered into the yurt through the smoke vent on a high pole. In the intervals between eating, there were dog races, [526] shooting matches with bow and arrow, fencing with sticks, and dancing. After the festival the head and bones of the bear, the ritual utensils et cetera were put away in the special clan storehouse. Wherever a Nivkhi lived, he retained his contact with his clan storehouse, where he always brought the skulls of the bears he killed.

The burial rites of the Nivkhi differed sharply from those of the 764
Tunguso-Manchurians of the Amur regions. The Nivkhi characteristically

/50 cont./

823 formed where his sacred feet stepped; from the lashes of his whip appeared the rivers... Here is Kryuspal', a marvelous cone, one of the highest peaks of Sakhalin, which impresses everyone approaching the island from the sea with its grandeur, a lonely, stern demon of the sea, who, in a fit of anger, killed his children and compelled his wife to run hundreds of versts away from him and form another cape in a new place. And even the lonely cliffs sticking out of the water all along the shore of the island -- all of this is alive, gods who ran away from their clans under the influence of internecine wars.

82 All the rest of nature is equally alive: the menacing "tol'" (the sea), the somber forests of the mountainous island, the 774 776 fast mountain rivers, etc. When cutting down a tree, the Gilyak is afraid to destroy its soul and places upon its stump a special being, the "inau" (chekhn-kun-inau), soul-creating "inau" (1), which returns soul and life to it. The mountains,

[777] [778]

1. A sharpened stick. The cult of "inau" has been borrowed from the Ainu, and I shall discuss it separately /in an untranslated section/.

the ocean, cliffs, trees, animals -- this is only a mask under which the gods conceal themselves from the curiosity of man. The peculiar profundity of this sort of metaphysical analysis by 825 the Gilyak is striking. Once when a Gilyak began to explain to me that the small kosatka (Orca gladiator) accompanying a large one in the sea constitutes in fact only the sword of the big kosatka, and I expressed my bewilderment at this, he began to prove that it only seemed to me that that is a kosatka, but in fact it is the sword of the large kosatka-"master," just as that the latter in reality has the form of a real Gilyak, and that which seems to us to be a sea animal is only the boat of this Gilyak-kosatka (2).

2. Kosatki travel in the sea in packs, within which are distinguished the older -- leaders, and the younger -- soldiers. In an attack,

/64 cont./

796 cutting up /65/ the bones, and so forth -- everything is done in conformity with permanently established rules. The first moment of this procedure, immediately following the removal of the skin, presents a very imposing sight for the Gilyak. The white (from the heavy layer of fat), soft body, stretched out on its back, those front paws with long and even fingers, resembling, to the point of illusion, human hands, amid the gloom of night, must irresistibly evoke in the savage the notion that he is not in the presence of a dead beast, but of a man of a particular nature, who has taken off his hairy skin and now majestically rests, following the least movement of his knife. The entire, detached skin of the bear, together with the head, is carried into the yurt, not through the door, but through the smoke opening, and down the high pole with the crown of coniferous needles, which still rises above the earth yurt. The clan elder carefully takes hold of the skin and, striking it lightly with a stick, says: "Remember that you were fed by such and such old man and by such and such old woman." Meanwhile the women greet the sacred head with a solemn [534] march played on a most original instrument. This is a dry log of larch hung on a frame, on which several people in turn beat out in rhythm relatively monotonous sounds. To the sounds of this charming music the clan elder installs the head of the bear on the plank bed of honor, covered with coniferous needles. Under the head there is a quiver with arrows and, by its side, tobacco, sugar, and other viands. [774] The bear takes along the souls of all these things. The carcasses of meat stay outside on a special wooden platform, and parts are brought in through the smoke opening. The day ends with eating, conversations, games of the youth, dances, and fencing with sticks. The next day is called the day of the feeding of the head. From morning until night kettles boil inside the yurt, and all kinds of dishes of the Gilyak cuisine are prepared. A portion of each dish is put in a separate vessel and placed next to the bear's head. This, then, means "to feed the head." [372] On the same day the boiling of the bear meat begins. The meat is boiled outside in a special kettle; the fire is ignited with the sacred steel, which is not used on any other occasion.

/67 cont./

796 sixth sticks a sharp stick in its rectal opening to prevent ex-
782 cretion from the intestines. When the dogs are strangled, they are laid down on the snow with the same ceremony and in the same pose as the bears. A fire is ignited; they skin the killed animals and throw the meat into a kettle.

796 All participate in the feast of dog meat, both men and [262] women, but only clansmen.

[766] The following day the head of the bear and his bones, as well as the vessels, the arrows, the thongs, and so forth -- everything is transported to a traditional storehouse which 796 serves as a sepulcher for the remains of the sacred beast. At
● 774 this moment the soul of the bear finally sets out on the 825 journey to its "master." Burdened with the presents given to it and accompanied by the souls of the slain dogs friskily running alongside and by the souls of the sharpened sticks (inau), it reaches the highest mountain where its "master" lives, who is also the master of the taiga -- Pal'-yz'.

796 What is the genesis of this strange festival which offers to many an amazing riddle.

796 In order to understand the idea of it, we must first of all
224 consider the fact that the bear festivals are celebrated not only on the occasion of killing a domestic bear, as people usually erroneously think, but every time that a Gilyak succeeds in killing a bear while hunting. True, in these instances the dimensions of the festival are less /68/ grandiose, but the essence remains the same. When the skin and the head of a bear killed in the taiga are brought into the village, a triumphal welcome is given with music and a solemn cere-
[782] monial. The head is placed on a sacred platform, is fed, and is given the same sacrificial offerings as upon the killing of a domestic bear; the narkh'i are similarly called together.
[766] Dogs are similarly sacrificed; the bones are preserved with the same ceremony and in the same place as the remains of a 796 domestic bear. Consequently the ceremonial of the great
825 winter festival is only the widespread ritual performed at every killing of a bear, logically stemming from that respectful attitude toward the bear which I mentioned earlier.

/69 cont./

796 accident that the death of a relative, i.e., the fact of the 825 extraordinarily malicious designs of an evil spirit, forces him to catch or buy a bear cub, whatever the cost. That a bear
[787] by its mere presence drives away evil spirits may be seen
[755] from the single fact that during the bear festival the shaman
[756] is forbidden to consult in his dreams his kekhn (see below) about curing a sick man, i.e., driving out the evil spirits residing in him, for the bear will be offended; he himself can drive them away with his own strength. Analogies to
[171] such beliefs in the purifying influence of the bear and of many other animals are to be found in vestiges of our own survivals and ceremonies. As is well known, in Little Russia /Ukraine/ there existed the custom of leading a bear through the village on certain holidays for purification... In our grand stables the custom of keeping goats, who are supposed to protect the horses and the grooms from evil power, has
[614] been preserved up to the present. And so, similarly, the clan that feeds a bear performs an important social function, securing all their own against the evil designs of their strongest, though invisible enemies. Unique religious sanitation, but the only kind available to primitive man!

Let us consider the meaning of those ceremonies that accompany every case of bear killing. First of all we should say that the Gilyak does not consider the killing of a bear a sin. In spite of all his respect for it, he is convinced that in the first place those bears that fall prey to him are sent to him by the "master" of the taiga, for whom the bears play the same role that dogs do for the Gilyak. "The bear is the dog of the master of the mountain," such is the formula of the ● [774] Gilyak. In addition, the bear loses nothing by its violent death, for death to it is only leaving its body to the Gilyak, while its soul -- that living duplicate -- then gaily runs to its master as if nothing had happened. Therefore no expiation whatever is required here. But the bear, even though only the dog of a forest man, is nevertheless a creature of a higher order, of a higher rank, than man. From the point of view of primitive man, there is nothing derogatory to the sacred

/78 cont./

756 island, his young son, Koynyt, had two souls already, even
• 774 though he was as poor as Job.

774 The difference in the number of souls according to rank applies only to the so-called large souls, i.e., souls equal to a man's body in size and during his life pervading the entire organism. But, in addition to these large souls, each man also has small souls located in the head of the large soul, after whose death the small soul turns into a large one and becomes a duplicate of the deceased one. It is of extreme interest that the Gilyak visualizes the small souls in the shape of an egg, an idea which is so characteristic of the psychology of primitive man /79/ for whom the mysterious processes of embryology lead to the idea of the immortality of the soul just as inevitably as the speculation on the fact of the growth of a plant from a seed thrown into the soil led the Christian thinker to it.

During the life of a man, this small egg-like soul
[787] plays an enormous role. It is this small soul that appears to the Gilyak in his dreams, all that the Gilyak sees in the course of his dreams and that is accepted by him as living reality, all this is performed by this little soul.

775 But shamans, no matter how many souls they have,
776 are not omnipotent... There is a time when the mightiest
[756] shamans together with all their kekhn are powerless to help man in his struggle against the evil spirits that reside in him. This occurs most often when a man's tormentors are the evil genii of the mountain or the sea. After destroying the body, these lords frequently carry away even the soul of the dead man. Freed of its corporal burden, however, the soul can take care of itself; it learns to escape from its pursuer and hide nearby among the friendly mountain or sea people. After some time the soul-twin, having assumed human form, travels into a new land, mysterious to us, but well-known to the Gilyak -- mlyvo (literally, "settlement of the dead"). Normally, however, the evil spirits, having killed the body, leave the soul in peace, and it may set out for the new world unhin-
775 dered. It is very easy to get to the mlyvo. Somewhere on 772 the surface of the earth there is an opening (mortal men do

/80 cont./

764 those around him should be gay, jest, and laugh. Silence in the house of the deceased is a sin. When all the preparations are finished, the deceased is tied with thongs to a dog sled and his favorite dog is placed over him. For some time the little soul of the deceased will live in this dog. The dog will subsequently be tied to the place where the deceased slept and will be fed the best dishes, and after several months, when the small soul is once again settled in its place, the dog is sold.

Finally, the deceased is brought to that place where his remains will stay forever. Here his last bed on earth awaits him -- a high, symmetrically arranged pile of wood, on which he is carefully placed with his face toward the west. For the last time the wife, the husband, the mother, if the deceased is young, the wife of the elder brother, if the deceased was unmarried, climb up to him and weep, and then, making a sacred fire by means of friction, they set fire to the platform from all sides. When the fire reaches the body of the deceased, everyone hastens to pay their last tribute to him by throwing pieces of firewood into the fire. Even small children take part in this. Four men stand on the sides and, with long poles, readjust the firewood and poke the body so • [774] that it will burn faster and better. At the same time they break the sled, kettles, and spears and kill the dogs, which frees the souls of these objects to follow the deceased... The ashes are covered with birch bark, and of the deceased there remains only ashes, in the literal sense of the word.

[824] /81/ A tree torn up with the roots is placed over the spot where the deceased was burned.

[262] After this the people seat themselves around the kettles containing the meat of the slain dogs, part of which is eaten and part thrown in all directions. On the way back, they drop in for only a short time at the yurt of the deceased to taste the viands placed there, and then disperse.

Amur

/306 cont./

778 824 A child's amulet -- ola bituz consists of two slender fir trees -- prung, which are uprooted on the day of birth of a boy; their crowns are bound with birch bark. Then they are reinforced, encircled with simple sticks, and bunches of leaves of Ledum palustre -- the marsh tea (tykr) are attached to them, as well as the sharpened head of k:khong z'ákh, the head of a pike (ius), and hooks for the boy's clothes. If the boy dies, all this is thrown away, but if he survives, everything goes to the next child (settlement of Kal'ma).

VII.

Religion

• 774 The soul and the ceremonies after the burning of the corpse. The soul -- cheg:n, chekhn, yrykh, uz'(the pith as in a tree). A man has three souls: one major one -- cheg:n, and its two [756] shadows, assistants. When the cheg:n of a shaman is wounded, the shaman dies.

774 If in sleep something is dreamed clearly and comes true,
787 it is the activity of the chief soul, and if it does not come true, then of the shadow-assistant. There are interpreters of dreams. If one sees a cow, there will be a storm; if a red berry, he will soon fall ill.

765 In the morning on the next day after the cremation of a [764] dead man, his family arrives, rakes together the ashes, encloses them with wooden boards on four sides, and covers them with fir branches, and on top with drel', then birch bark and wooden boards, which are then attached to the ground with wooden /307/ hooks. The skull bone (chongr nynyv), which is picked up from the ashes, is wrapped in white, placed between two wooden boards, and fastened together with an umbilical cord ("the root from which man is born"); this is the way they make the mu n'ivukh k:ak. Some place the bone in the upper part, others --

/307 cont./

765 next to the umbilical cord. A wooden board is attached to the ground at some distance from the place of the cremation of the 764 dead man -- mu n'ivukh tuv. The body of the deceased is dressed in stockings, a waistband, a woman's hat of lynx; if the deceased is a man, then in a man's winter hat, while to his belt is attached, on one side, a curved knife (ig:dzeko) and, on the other, kes'kes' -- an iron chain and a needle case, and, in the front, mly -- a purse with a flint, tinder, and steel. Then alongside is placed a little stake, and on it a human hair (from the wife, sister, mother) -- mu n'ivukh kiur, which will serve the deceased as an insole for footwear upon going over into the world beyond the grave; next to this, a little stake with three horns (branches), on which is placed a small cup for a cuckoo (pyk nir); furthermore, a little stake with a wooden cuckoo -- mu n'ivukh pyk, i.e., "the cuckoo of the dead man," and finally still another little stake with an eagle feather -- chamngar.

The building of a little grave house can be postponed, but the dressed stuffed doll -- k:ak (1) must be made without fail.

• [532] [774] 1. K:ak -- wooden image of the deceased, a receptacle for his soul.

Temporarily a little balagan of bark, k:ak-raf, is erected over him. Finally a little house, raf, is built, and the funeral repast is held.

765 In a day, a week, a month, the closest kinsmen arrive, drink, cry, and commemorate; they do this for a year, in some cases for two or three years, but if there is no one to do this, then for one month, depending on status. At the end of the term of "observation" (tigr az'adz; -- "observation of the tree," the time of periodic funeral repasts at the house of the deceased), they buy vodka and rice, assemble the kinsmen and the "in-laws," and for three or four days go to the grave and commemorate; this is the last funeral repast (raf pykyz'dz:, tigr pykyz'dz:).
[231] They walk to the tuv, the place of the cremation of the deceased, pour vodka there, sprinkle it from all the dishes,

Amur

/311 cont./

756 Before becoming a shaman -- pokhtyrdz:-cham -- a shaman who can lead a soul into the next world (from pokhtyrdz: -- to lead a soul into the next world), he is ill and tormented until out of his mouth come pulk (Goldi tulin) -- a shaman's copper mirror, tovz (Goldi pûn'chû) -- a piece of copper for a shaman's fumigating smoke, then horns -- murki', and, finally, a lakhch -- a knife of palm /pal'my/. The lakhch of the Gilyak shaman is his own work, but he does not have horn, and he buys [776] pulk. Uz'mu kekhn -- the spirit protector of the shaman, ajami
• [774] among the Goldi, lives in the uz' of the shaman. Uz' -- one of the three souls of the shaman, literally, the pith of a tree.

VIII.

778 824 Beliefs and Rites Connected with Hunting and Fishing

[782] Chédzigr-turi, toigo. Chédzigr -- tree (a larch) which is placed in the taiga beside the hunters' balagan and before which they sacrifice to the master of the sky. Every year they place a new chédzigr, but the old one cannot be touched, not even touched with one's hands. /312/ If it falls down by itself, it will be carried to a storage place -- chédzigr nan'gof (1). In the settlement of Kal'vo on the chédzigr, on its crossbar -- two figur yzikh -- peasant man and woman. A chédzigr is fed on the first 778 782 824 day of the month anlong (December) and a second time in July. Everyone sits in a circle, and an old man takes a small amount of food from each, makes chukh-chugind -- a sacrifice -- and places inau. The inau are made out of mountain ash.

[184] 1. In another place it is said that the chédzigr is not repaired until it falls down.

G /322 cont./

756 Chamkh, the father of Koynyt, my storyteller, was a
● 774 shaman in Ady-Tymi. He had four souls: one from Pal, another from Tol, a third from Tly, and a fourth from Mly-yz'n.

G Shamans make chkhnaj (a wooden image of pal-n'igyvyn), 756 inspired during a seance, and feed them. The feeding consists 798 of giving sugar, saranka, and so forth, but they are eaten by the 782 shaman; it only appears to those around as if he eats it; however, while it is eaten by the kekhn himself. The chkhnaj must be fed or else it will gnaw a person.

G When one is dangerously ill, then the yurt begins to shake 755 and becomes full of openings and through the openings, like 796 mosquitoes, many kekhn fly and shout: "Believe me, me!" And then the shaman falls down as if he were drunk. Then he eats marsh tea and drinks sea water -- he gives this to his kekhn. He swallows fire. Kekhn love songs.

G If a person is near death and a milk has carried his soul to 755 Mlyvo, a kekhn kills him, and the shaman sets out for there for the 756 soul, and, if he succeeds in getting the soul, the sick man will 796 live. The kekhn shows the shaman the road (to Mlyvo). The 794 shaman gets to Mlyvo directly through an apperture; the same earth as here, the same sky, and many villages are there. If the soul is outside, it can still be obtained; if it is in the yurt, all is lost. If the shaman himself enters the yurt, he will die. In Mlyvo the soul of the shaman is like a bird and flies around the subterranean world.

G Parnkhasind (an Orok word) is done only by the Ornyr, i.e., 755 by the Orok. They ask the chkhnaj whether the sick man will recuperate or not. If the chkhnaj rocks from side to side, he will recuperate; if not -- he will die. All this is done under the smoke of marsh tea. When the shaman beats his drum, the kekhn advises the making of chkhnaj, and if somebody's soul comes into it, then the sick man will live. If he will live, the chkhnaj is fed; then when in the shaman's opinion it is time /323/ to lose him, he comes and arranges for the milk to go from the sick man into the chkhnaj, and the sick man then recovers. (see "Fortunetelling with a Stone").

/323 cont./

756 When shamans fight, the one who has more souls wins. The
● 774 killing of one shaman by another is accompanied by the acquisition
776 of the kekhn of the opponent. During his supposed death, the soul
[578] of the shaman travels over islands of the sea (tol). On these islands, which are of various colors, the houses are of stone tol-kekhn. Sometimes his soul goes into the mountains to the abode of pal-kekhn. The shaman kekhn fears only Pal milk and Tol milk, but not the milk of sables, foxes, otters, and rats (1).

1. Concerning the rat, see Chapter VII, "Miscellanea." S. Sh.

Among the kekhn there are variously colored eared seals, iron trout, and tigers.

756 How the shaman Chomkx resurrected a woman (the settlement of 539 Rykovskoye). A husband and a wife were fishing. The wife fell sick and died before morning. The husband said: "All you shamans are deceiving me. Now my wife is dead. Well, make her live!" The shaman became angry and said: "I shall shamanize all night; if before morning she moves her left little finger, she will live." That is what happened.

756 A shaman stabbed himself and shot himself in the mouth, and "nothing."

756 A female shaman has more spirits than a male shaman.
841 She kills her shaman competitor, sending her kekhn to rub her 854 competitor's eyes with the menstrual blood of shankh-chokh. A
[562] feature of this blood is that a drop in food makes a person waste [578] away. Copulation during the menstrual flow also leads to local [835] ataxia.

756 The kamlanie of a female shaman, who, according to her 796 own words, was milkternd (mad) after the birth of her first daughter.
[158] She first made inau and then rubbed her face, breast, and so forth with marsh tea, lighted it on the hearth, and warmed her tambourine... Then she bound her legs and arms with shavings and girdled herself with shavings.. She yawned. Moderate blows... The sounds grew stronger. She sighed loudly and whispered. She

/331 cont./

795 The dead come in a dream. Thus Indyn's mother came to 787 him several times. The last time she said to him, "Your father took me again," and she did not appear any more.

● 794 The big soul inhabits the entire body, and in the head of this
[231] large soul live small souls -- tarn. After the death of a person, a small soul lives in his pryski' (dog), which is tied to his plank bed. Small souls resemble eggs and are white in color. During sleep the small soul goes everywhere, talks, sees, and so forth.

[735] A poor person "still has one tiny little soul." If a person dies away from home or drowns, his soul comes home. The soul of a dog which died accidentally roams all over.

Every body has a soul, and its shape corresponds to the body. Therefore, if the body is given a certain shape, it will acquire a corresponding soul, and therefore if a throat is sore, they make [825] a tongue, and his soul lives in that tongue. A captured bird with which children have been playing must not be let loose, for it will carry away the soul.

795 The fate of the soul depends on the kind of death. 1. A person who has been eaten by a bear lives to a ripe old age with Pal-n'igyvyn (the master of the forest), while a person who drowned -- with Tol-n'igyvyn, and then they go to Mlyvo.

2. A suicide (who hung himself) goes directly to Mlyvo.

3. Those who died from an epidemic (an epidemic is caused by the bloodshed during the wars of the Japanese, the Chinese, and the Russians) also go straight to Mlyvo.

4. One who died a wound (by a knife, a bow, or a rifle) lives, like a bird, in the air. The souls of such unfortunates shriek at night from the trees.

5. Until a tkhusind (ransom) is received, one who was killed by a person will also fly in the sky. If blood vengeance is taken for the dead person, both souls go to Mlyvo together.

795 The night bird rakhch is of the size of the crow and just as 825 black, but its beak is red. If its cry is heard at night, one must not call it by name, but must say ark.

When a person is killed, a great number of these birds fly together into the village.

/348 cont./

793 the women boiled the grandchildren, ate them, ran into the taiga, and disappeared.

798 Chnyr-chkhnaj. If a loss has occurred, they make chnyr-
796 chkhnaj, a figure of grass, and beat it (thresh it); if the chkhna 789 is good, the lost thing will be found on the following day. If it is not known what milk caused the harm, chnyr-chkhnaj is hung up over the plank bed and fed.

685 For stealing bear meat or a fishing rod, the face is maim

158 Kleptomania. There are thieves-kleptomaniacs, for example, Sentukh from Ady-Tymi. After his brothers threatened to kill him, he ran away to /344/ Lungvo. There he and his ● [794] wife continued doing the same. He has one soul -- a rat sittin in his belly. The things that tempt him shine in the dark for him. The Gilyak confined themselves to depriving him of the things.

756 The shaman Koynyt's father, from Tro, once noticed tha
794 his trousers had disappeared. He began to shamanize, found a rat in the belly of a woman, killed it, and on the following da the woman died.

683 Over an insult it is necessary to fight with sticks (chkhark or pay tkhusind, or take something by force. Frequently they kill over an insult.

787 Fortunetelling with a stone parnkhasind, with a kettle. The parnkhasind replies thanks to the chekhn. If the kettle sw straight, one has hit the mark; if to the side -- one has not hi If one has hit the mark, he must make a wooden chkhnaj, han around his neck, and feed it.

t is interesting to note, in regard to the re in historical times, that the Gilyak native
e isthmus which is said to have united ther uriously prevalent.

ne story tells how, 'In the good old times n r land (mainland at the mouth of Amur), fo once there came water from the sea—much of the mountains. During that flood many self, by chance, on the top of a mountain, no harm, and even allowed him to sit upon r mountains, where more refugees from th rs receded and [101] life went on as usual, had come, to sell the furs they had saved;
sthmus was gone, swept away by the flood h remains to this day. At the time of this flowed, and large numbers of our brethren asked them where this mountain was, and t h of Alexandrovsk, called Ktaüsi pal (pal-p ouse, 'Pic la Martinière,' after the botanis rench from LaPérouse's account has not be ported connexion of the island and mains have a legend telling of the destruction

n. It is one of the deluge stories that are o boat was needed to go to and from the or then dry land united it with Sakhalin,

, much water—then only were seen the Gilyak hunters perished, but one found sharing it with a bear. The beast did its back while he swam to the tops of ne flood were congregated. When the the Gilyaks wanted to return whence
; but on arrival at the familiar spot, lo!
, and in its place was the narrow strait, catastrophe,' they added, 'the river Amur n on its banks perished.'
they indicated a peak about forty miles peak or mountain), and named by La st of his expedition. . . [LSS: A footnote een reproduced.] When the natives see peak, my Gilyak informant said, they always make a ntain.

ave wondered whether the following had anything to a coincidence. I happened to be passing down the St ian cargo steamer, and talking to the captain about he said, 'There are frequent fogs here, and you kn here is always one guide. In the thickest of fogs can ummit, of a mountain in Sakhalin.' Is this the moun ls, the clouds and fog, on which the Gilyak and bear nother legend bearing on the point is told by their old randfathers [102] remembered the time when on the it was very hot. The Russians came, and brought wi re this, grapes ripened on the island, and now only are very sour, and not really ripe. In the north the s no fruit.' "

n offering to the god of the do with the Gilyak story, or was aits of Tartary on a small the weather encountered there, ow how difficult navigation is, always be seen the top, just tain, towering above the heavenly found themselves?

l men, who say that 'their fathers sland there were no Russians,
th them the cold and snowstorms.
in the south, and even there re is only the plant, and it

774

ANIMISM--conception of the soul; number of souls; location in the body; characteristics (e.g., shape, visibility, separability); relation of the soul to the body, to the name, to the breath, to dreams, to shadows and reflections, and to life and death; notions of the temporary departure of the soul from the body; attribution of souls to animals and inanimate objects; etc. See also:

Personality 15
Names 551
Conception of conscience 577
Theories of disease and death 753, 761
Concepts of soul-stuff and animated fetishes . . 778
Spirit possession and dream interpretation . . . 787
Interpretation of shadows and reflections . . . 822
Ethnozoology 825
Ideas about breathing 827
Ideas about abnormal mental states 828

/70 cont./

796 slain bear, but the head is always respectfully divided among 825 the clansmen to whom the bear belongs. This eating must 261 be looked upon, not as a simple act of eating, but as taking [562] into one's body the mighty qualities of the bear. A woman, for instance, cannot partake of the heart of the bear, which imparts courage, a quality completely useless to her, and therefore such eating, as aimless, must be offensive to the bear.

796 Thus the religious significance of the bear festival amounts
825 to the following: 1) feeding the bear gives /71/ the settlement
182 security and protection from evil spirits -- a very important
775 matter if we take into account the views of the Gilyak with 774 regard to the origin of sickness and of death (see below); 2) eating the "deity" imparts strength; 3) the soul of the slain animal, pleased by the honors, may independently and through its "master" do good things for man; 4) it -- and this is of the utmost importance -- is an envoy, a transmitter of all kinds of gifts to the "master of the mountains," on whom 796 the welfare of the Gilyak depends. With regard to the last
825 point, it is important to remember what we said about clan
614 gods. Every clan has clansmen among the "mountain people,"
775 i.e., clansmen who sometime in the past fell in a fight with a bear and were then taken into the clan of the "master of the bear." Every such clansman in turn becomes a small "master," a god-protector of his clan. Actually, every clan receives its catch, not directly from the "master of the mountains" himself but from this, his clan god, who specifically resides in the hunting territory of his clan. Thus, the presents sent through the bear are actually sent, not to the supreme "master," but to the nearest "master of the mountains" -- clansman.

796 That is why the celebration of the festival is purely a clan
614 affair. This also perhaps explains two extremely characteristic, but puzzling facts concerning the bear festival. In the first place, not only is no member of the clan arranging the festival allowed to kill the bear, but even the clansmen of women who are wives of the members of that clan are not allowed to, in a word, none of the agnates in either the male

/77 cont./

756 the furies and all the frenzied shrieks of the shamans. When the paroxysm was over, the face of the poor boy was terribly exhausted /78/ and seemed like the face of an old man. In a dream two kekhn appeared to him, one a man, the other a woman; they were the kekhn of his deceased father. They said to him: "We used to play with your father, now let us play with you." Another Gilyak boy, Indyn, also present there, observed the phenomenon of the paroxysm with profound amazement. "Well, now Koynyt will not be a man," he said "The kekhn want to force him to conform to their law."

In this remark is clearly expressed the Gilyak view of the shaman as a special being, as one chosen by the gods. But, as we see, even among the Gilyak selection is not easily attained.

756 158 Thus, the shaman is a chosen one, a person who believes in his power and selection. This conviction could not correspond more to his entire physical make-up, for real shamans are almost always people who suffer from various kinds of hysteria, acquired or inherited. And, as is well known, hysteria is that fertile soil which produces the gift of clairvoyance, hallucination, delirium, and obsessions. They are the individuals who most easily yield to hypnosis and autohypnosis. From childhood, the future shaman is hypnotized by the idea of the protection of the kekhn, and during seances of kamlaniye he uses any means necessary for autosuggestion. The study of the psychics of shamanism, in my opinion, amounts to the study of autohypnosis due to hysteria, and, of course, against a general background of an animistic world-view. Apart from the 756 774 gift of being chosen, the shaman has another enviable advantage over the common mortal. An ordinary mortal has only one soul, a rich man has two, while a shaman may have twice as many as they. Thus, the Ady-Tymovskiy shaman, Chamkh, the father of the boy-shaman, Koynyt, about whom I spoke earlier, had all of four souls. One of these souls was given to him by the mountain, another by the sea, a third by the sky, a fourth by the underground kingdom. During my stay on the

/74 cont./

755 the disgusting bitter root of that plant, eats hot coal, etc. Even such strong measures, however, do not always prove effective. Sometimes the evil spirit does not give in to any human terrorizing, and not only that, but sometimes he even carries off the soul of the sick man into the kingdom of the shades. Then the aid of the higher beings is indispensable.

[756] Such aid can be proffered only by specially chosen men, by specialists-expellers, i.e., shamans.

756 776 Among the Gilyak, shamans do not constitute a class, as among more cultured barbarians. Among the Gilyak, the shamans are chosen ones, who in night visions or in a trance receive a revelation from the god-protector about their high calling. From that moment the shaman has gods-assistants, executors of his commands. These gods-assistants are of two kinds: the kekhn and the kenchkh. The first perform his most important tasks. By force or trick it is they who pull the devil out of the organism of a sick man. They also carry the [774] shaman's soul in search of the stolen soul of a sick man, making their way with it even into the kingdom of the shades. As for the assistants, they are happy spirits who play with the shaman and help him only in tricks. The kekhn are creatures of the most varied breeds: there are kekhn-wolves, eared seals, eagle owls, reindeer, hares, celestial creatures, etc. Each kekhn has his master, who himself personally, very rarely comes to assist, sending his subordinates. The kekhn are capable of assuming any form and consequently can go anywhere necessary to save the sick man.

755 The shamans have three main methods of curing. One consists of hearing the patient out, falling asleep, and then, combining the dreams he has had, giving this or that advice. Having, for instance, seen a skewbald dog in his dream, he decides that for a cure it is necessary to sacrifice a dog, etc. Another method is the ordinary method of kamlanive normally described by ethnographers, namely, expelling the devil by means of frenzied shrieks, beating the tambourine, in a word -- [776] terror. Since, however, you frequently can do nothing with

/761 cont./
heaven. My informant remarked that Mlygh-wo must be a large village, considering the number of persons who die "peacefully" or from sickness, but he could not say anything more about it. The various things put over the ashes of the deceased, such as eagle wings, food provisions, etc. (), serve for a rapid and safe

 See Appendix 47 /p. 1227 /, 53 /p. 1233/.

journey to it.

The surprising answer to my further question as to what happened to the soul of a person killed by a bear ran: Such a soul assumes the shape of a bear and wanders in the forest and in the mountains.

/762/ Undoubtedly among the Gilyak (as well as among the Olcha (*) this is the conception of a transmigration of souls, for

* See Appendix 45, p. 1224 .

they put the body of a person killed by a bear into a special little burial house (tschchyf-ngych) and bring it berries, supplies of fish, and the like (). Nevertheless, the dead person himself, i.e.,

 See Appendix 57, p. 1237 .

his soul, is said to go into the forest in the shape of a bear, with the skin and fur, etc.

Only the difficulty, with an inadequate knowledge of the language, of reaching an understanding about abstract concepts with a primitive people little inclined toward abstraction has kept me from learning the Gilyak expression for "soul." The above-mentioned views concerning the consequences of death among the Gilyak make it clear beyond any doubt that they are familiar with the concept of the "soul" as a spiritual force innate in the human being. The above-mentioned concept of the metempsychosis of a person killed by a bear also explains to a certain extent why food provisions are brought to his corpse. His soul still wanders about

225 but the better one among them sits at the bow. The hunters
476 must often get out on the floes for it is not always conven-554 ient to get within shooting distance of the seals in a boat.
561

If there is an extra man in the boat, if, for instance, there
225 are five oarsmen, one pila and one other man, then the pila
476 -if he is the oldest man in the boat - sits at the stern without 561 doing anything, and his junior takes over the rudder. The 885 Gilyaks illustrated this point to me by the following example: if Xitkun and Kaun are among the hunters in the boat and if both are older than the rest of the hunters, than Xitkun, as the oldest, would sit at the stern and do nothing except for giving orders and Kaun, who is Xitkun's junior, would take over the rudder. If, on the other hand, Tujun, Xitkun, Pl skuk and Kaun and younger hunters set out in a boat then Pl skuk and Kaun, who are younger than Tujun and Xitkun, are at the oars, Xitkun takes over the rudder and Tujun, as the oldest of them all sits at the stern. It happens that the pila is younger than the extra man in the boat. In that case the pila tends the rudder and the extra man sits at the stern. I personally know of such a case. Pila Norp took along with him in the boat old man Onkan who sat at the stern and did nothing while Norp tended the rudder. When Norp was at the bow shooting at the seals and t, to whom Norp had turned over the steering oar, tended the rudder, Onkan again sat at the stern. Jesting about his work Onkan said to me: "I was simply sitting without doing a thing, but I got my share." I found out from others that during the hunt he helped build the campfire and prepare food. He also seems to have helped with some other things; which is why he was taken along. Unfortunately, I was unable to clarify this point to any great extent. I simply had no time in which to do that. It seems that Onkan performed a number of functions which did not tax his strength and, in this manner, he made the rather heavy work of the hunters easier.

Incidentally, the facts given above illustrate with a sufficient degree of clarity the role of older people among the Gilyaks.

225 [82] As mentioned above the pila performs mu-zi d 789 and t aj.
774 Mu-zi d is performed at the stern of the boat. Two short 751 sticks, the thickness of a match are driven into the stern board. The distance between them is approximately two fingers. Then they tie a thin thread made of nettle fibres around the sticks. The Gilyaks usually perform zi d on hands of children. They believe that a thread made of hair of a dog and nettle fibre and tied around a child's hand protects the child from illness. The fact that the Gilyaks perform mu-ziyed on the boat supports the assumption that at one time or another the Gilyaks, it seems, regarded a boat as a living thing. Mu-ziyed on the boat serves, it seems, as a means of guarding the boat against and protecting it from misfortunes.

Aside from mu-ziyed, t'aj is performed on the boat. T'aj means 'image', 'figure,' 'picture.' With shavings (inau) of a branch of rowan (qosk-ŋks) the pilaŋ makes two figurines. One of the figurines is placed at the prow of the boat and the other - at the stern. I once saw such a figurine on the neck of a representation of the bird ugŋ, placed by the Gilyaks at the bow of the boat. The figurine placed at the bow has its face turned to the sea. We shall come back to these t'aj elsewhere.

There is one other ceremony performed on the boat. Before setting out on a hunt the Gilyaks expose the boat to smoke. They light fires of spruce and bogulnik on both sides of the boat and they try to build the fires so that the smoke hit the boat. The pilaŋ takes a branch of spruce or of bogulnik and, starting from the bow and going towards the stern, hits the outside and the inside of the boat as well as the rowlocks with the branches so as to elvlaf-p-k-ezd --"lose bad places (evil)". Then the hunters push the boat past the fire into the sea and are off.

I watched Gilyak Xitkun who, having already returned from a hunt, put out to sea with the hunters a second time. Five hunters were at the oars. Propelled by strong and simultaneous strokes of five pair of oars the boat took lightly and quickly to sea. Xitkun, firmly gripping the rudder, set the bow of the boat northward, towards the cape barely visible in the distance. The Gilyaks rowed calmly and quietly. They need fear nothing. At the stern of their boat sits an experienced pilaŋ, tested in trips. At the bow are placed a representation of the sea bird ugŋ and the figunines t'aj. They will vigilantly look out for and protect their course.

When the boat became a tiny spot in the distance and its outlines blended with the water, the women who saw off the hunters left the shore for home.

After leaving the village the hunters turn northward. They first go to Ui-kr "sacred cape." (1) Once there, they pull

1. It seems that there are "tombstones" in memory of drowned men on the cape.

the boat out of the water. The pilaŋ picks up a scoop containing the usual refreshments called for by the occasion and

9: Hawes--243 T-3 (1901) 1903 Gilyak
116, 764, 774, 775

"For four days the corpse of the dead woman lies on the nakh of the hut, and during this time her soul pays visits to the four gods, renders an account of her earthly life, and receives instructions for the life after death. All her kindred must come together and not leave the hut during this period, and with all their powers they strive to call to mind and loudly recite all the virtues of their deceased kinswoman. This is done in order to prompt her spirit, lest her etherealized self should omit some of them in its vivâ voce. The lord of fire, as the junior god, serves in this case as messenger, and is therefore strictly kept going in all his force."

6, 764, 774, 775, 825

"As the flames lick up the pyre, the soul rough the hole or opened door, thence to e at other world village of Mligh-vo, which arth, but the Sakhalin Tro and Tim Gilyaks e sun rises.'

Since it is necessary that the spirit of the earth, the spirits of the dogs, the sledge, umber according to the wealth of the depart death. The sledge is broken, and so are a s arrows (ku), and quiver (kh'm), or if the ngs (mestch) [LSS: Erratum; it should rea ngu-dzhakho). All these articles will be ne ey must be broken in order to finish their eir spirits. Every object has its soul, whi inanimate objects only on being broken, a o burn them is not to be thought of, becaus

Camping out on the banks of the river Tim ght for fuel, when Mr. X. came upon a bit the fire, when Vanka stopped him, crying

akes refuge in the raff [LSS: a funeral hut] merge later and begin its long journey to he Amur Gilyaks say is in the centre of the say is 'There'—pointing to the east—'where deceased shall travel as he was accustomed etc., must all be released. The dogs, in ed, are all killed, being strangled or beaten lso his spear (kakh), his bow (punch), and deceased [246] be a woman, then her ear-d meskh] rings (koi-ba), and her fish-knife eeded by the deceased in the future life; but earthly existence, and to give release to ch resembles it. This is set free in the case nd is then used by the soul of the deceased.

e they cannot have that honour done them.
in the forest, we were casting around one of shaped board which he was about to throw out, 'No, no'. Uich, uich'. It is a piece

764, 774, 775, 825

Gilyak canoe.' Purification by fire not shot, nor are their throats cut, ar in the next world with this grave is reserved only for the human being. The c for if any of them had his skin broken he wou personal defect."

4, 782, 825

ong the Gilyaks, all natural objects have a life o le to the 'owners', if violence has been done. An and the bear is superior to man in both mind a
'owners' of the forest, the mountains, the sea,

6. Czaplicka, quoting Sternberg, p. 271.

m certain leaves and roots [42] intended for a s r purpose, he makes the dog a victim. Periodic the spirits of clansmen who have been killed by

1. Idem., p. 272."

of their own; and sacrifice must nimals are, in reality, human and body. Sacrifices are offered and fire. (6) The Gilyak carries sacrifice, and, moved by a al offerings are made to the bear bears. (1)

775

775 ESCHATOLOGY--conception of the survival of the soul; career of the soul after death (e.g., mode of departure from the body, temporary sojourn near place of death, indefinite sojourn as a disembodied soul or ghost, journey to a realm of the dead); notions about ghosts, specters, apparitions, and phantoms (e.g., shape, substance, propensities); behavior of departed souls or ghosts (e.g., haunting of houses and cemeteries, visitations); spiritualistic beliefs; conception of a realm of the dead (e.g., place, mode of life, rewards and punishment); duration of afterlife; belief in immortality; ideas of transmigration and reincarnation; conception of the survival of the body (e.g., resurrection); etc. See also:

Belief in witches, vampires, and werewolves. . 784
Cult of the dead 769
Communication with spirits. 787
Notion of death and rebirth in initiation ceremonies 881

/57 cont./

123 the women rushed to their storehouse to fetch the precious buda
776 reserved for sacrifices, in order to feed me and my companions
782 and thereby fulfill the will of the Head of the earth. Thus, thanks to the piece of candy, I, in the opinion of the Gilyak, not only saved my life, but unexpectedly obtained for my companions and myself a dish which we had not seen for a long time.

782 The Gilyak also has live sacrifices, the objects of which are dogs. A dog is killed, by strangulation, before the season of sable hunting, during the bear festival, before departure for a long journey, during sickness, and generally on the solemn occasions of life. Before it is killed, it is fed, and at that time, depending upon the circumstances, it is given one or another
[796] mission. Thus, during the bear festival, the dog will be told: "Follow your bear to the highest mountain. May the master love you. Change this hair and come down next year as a bear [755] so that I may see you." When a dog is killed on the occasion of sickness, it is asked to be the intercessor for the sick man before the god to which it is being sent.

Thus the victim is a simple envoy, whose soul, after its death, will reach the master who lives on the highest mountain.

● 775 Clan gods constitute a special category of gods. As a
614 matter of fact, these gods play a most important role in the life of the Gilyak, and it is most often to them that the Gilyak offers his sacrifices. In each element there is a clan god. The clan gods are of particular /58/ interest, because in this tribe we can most clearly trace the very genesis of this very common fact of primitive religion. Even among the Greeks and the Romans the worship of clan gods was a common phenomenon. The clan gods of the Gilyak are not supernatural mythical beings, as among the Greeks and the Romans, but their very own clansmen who, for a variety of reasons, have entered the clan
775 of one or another god "master." A particularly fortunate com-
614 bination of circumstances, if I may express myself thus, is re-796 quired to attain such an honor. If, while hunting, a Gilyak was killed by a bear, if he fell prey to the waves on the water, if he was murdered or burned to death through his own carelessness, if, according to the shaman's explanation, a woman died from

/58 cont./

●775 a bear's love for her, etc. -- all such persons do not travel to
614 the ordinary kingdom of the shades, but go over into the clan of [166] the gods-masters who took a liking to them, of the mountain, water, fire, etc., and then become the smallest "masters" and protect their clansmen. In this way the clan pal'-nivukh'i -- forest people, tol'-nivukh'i -- sea people, etc. took form. It is to these gods-clansmen that the entire clan offers sacrifices. These are not mythical gods, not the fictional heroes of the Greek clans, but actual persons, authoritatively living in the 775 imagination of their worshipers. The genesis of the clan gods
614 of the Gilyak sheds light on another dark phenomenon of 825 primitive religions -- totemism, the worship of a certain class of animals honored as the clansmen and even the ancestors of their worshipers. In fact, as I said earlier, the master of each element and his clansmen, although they lead the same kind of life as the Gilyak, always appear in the presence of man in the form of this or that animal, the bear (forest people), the beluga or kosatka (sea people), so that the Gilyak as well, having entered after his death the clan of this or that master, also assumes the covering of this or that animal. Therefore, that class of beasts that the chosen person entered is kindred to the clan of the one chosen and therefore becomes its totem.
775 Since in almost every clan there are contemporaries or pre-
614 decessors who fell in a battle with a bear or drowned in rivers or at sea, a system of separate totems for every clan could not develop among the Gilyak. Unfortunately I cannot consider this vast question in more detail here; I shall say only that the genesis of the clan gods among the Gilyak clearly shows that it is not totemism, i.e., not the belief in descent from this or that /59/ kind of animal, that created the clan gods, as is commonly thought, but, on the contrary, it is the clan gods who created totemism. As we shall see below, we cannot explain the prohibitions of the totemists against using the meat of the totems for food in any way other than the fear of killing some clansman who turned into a totem animal.

614 The religious system of the Gilyak provides many other
171 interesting facts for the explanation of the origin of totemism.

/70 cont./

796 slain bear, but the head is always respectfully divided among 825 the clansmen to whom the bear belongs. This eating must 261 be looked upon, not as a simple act of eating, but as taking into one's body the mighty qualities of the bear. A woman, [562] for instance, cannot partake of the heart of the bear, which imparts courage, a quality completely useless to her, and therefore such eating, as aimless, must be offensive to the bear.

796 Thus the religious significance of the bear festival amounts
825 to the following: 1) feeding the bear gives /71/ the settlement
182 security and protection from evil spirits -- a very important
●775 matter if we take into account the views of the Gilyak with 774 regard to the origin of sickness and of death (see below); 2) eating the "deity" imparts strength; 3) the soul of the slain animal, pleased by the honors, may independently and through its "master" do good things for man; 4) it -- and this is of the utmost importance -- is an envoy, a transmitter of all kinds of gifts to the "master of the mountains," on whom 796 the welfare of the Gilyak depends. With regard to the last
825 point, it is important to remember what we said about clan
614 gods. Every clan has clansmen among the "mountain people,"
775 i.e., clansmen who sometime in the past fell in a fight with a bear and were then taken into the clan of the "master of the bear." Every such clansman in turn becomes a small "master," a god-protector of his clan. Actually, every clan receives its catch, not directly from the "master of the mountains" himself but from this, his clan god, who specifically resides in the hunting territory of his clan. Thus, the presents sent through the bear are actually sent, not to the supreme "master," but to the nearest "master of the mountains" -- clansman.

796 That is why the celebration of the festival is purely a clan
614 affair. This also perhaps explains two extremely characteristic, but puzzling facts concerning the bear festival. In the first place, not only is no member of the clan arranging the festival allowed to kill the bear, but even the clansmen of women who are wives of the members of that clan are not allowed to, in a word, none of the agnates in either the male

/78 cont./

756 island, his young son, Koynyt, had two souls already, even 774 though he was as poor as Job.

774 The difference in the number of souls according to rank applies only to the so-called large souls, i.e., souls equal to a man's body in size and during his life pervading the entire organism. But, in addition to these large souls, each man also has small souls located in the head of the large soul, after whose death the small soul turns into a large one and becomes a duplicate of the deceased one. It is of extreme interest that the Gilyak visualizes the small souls in the shape of an egg, an idea which is so characteristic of the psychology of primitive man /79/ for whom the mysterious processes of embryology lead to the idea of the immortality of the soul just as inevitably as the speculation on the fact of the growth of a plant from a seed thrown into the soil led the Christian thinker to it.

During the life of a man, this small egg-like soul
[787] plays an enormous role. It is this small soul that appears to the Gilyak in his dreams, all that the Gilyak sees in the course of his dreams and that is accepted by him as living reality, all this is performed by this little soul.

●775 But shamans, no matter how many souls they have,
776 are not omnipotent... There is a time when the mightiest
[756] shamans together with all their kekhn are powerless to help man in his struggle against the evil spirits that reside in him. This occurs most often when a man's tormentors are the evil genii of the mountain or the sea. After destroying the body, these lords frequently carry away even the soul of the dead man. Freed of its corporal burden, however, the soul can take care of itself; it learns to escape from its pursuer and hide nearby among the friendly mountain or sea people. After some time the soul-twin, having assumed human form, travels into a new land, mysterious to us, but well-known to the Gilyak -- mlyvo (literally, "settlement of the dead"). Normally, however, the evil spirits, having killed the body, leave the soul in peace, and it may set out for the new world unhin-
775 dered. It is very easy to get to the mlyvo. Somewhere on 772 the surface of the earth there is an opening (mortal men do

/79 cont./

●775 not know exactly where this place is); the soul need only
772 descend into this opening and it reaches its goal. There everything is as it is here: the same earth, the same sky, sea, rivers, and forests; only there the sun shines when we have night, and the moon when we have day. The dead come to life and continue to live there in the same settlements as on earth, fish, kill beasts, celebrate clan festivals, marry and procreate. Only the material status changes: the poor man becomes rich and the rich man poor. As you see, even among the Gilyak the poor men find their consolation not in this best of all possible worlds. Even in the new world, however, sickness and death await man. From there the soul must migrate into a third world, and so on until such time as the soul degenerates and turns into ever smaller and smaller beings, a small bird, a gnat; and, finally, ashes. Sometimes souls are born again on our planet, completing again the infinite [562] series of transformations. For the most part, however, that is the lot of women.

764 /80/ Before entering mlyvo, the soul waits to be
775 equipped with everything necessary to go to the new land comfortably and richer. And so the deceased is dressed in his best garments and in silken robes. Everything that is put on the deceased must be new, fully embroidered, elegant, and durable. A man is dressed in one, three, or six pairs, generally a number of pairs divisible by three, and women in two, four, eight, etc. pairs.

The most expensive spears, rifles, bows, and nets are taken from the storehouse -- and the souls of all these objects set off with the deceased on his journey.

764 While these preparations for a long journey are going on, the deceased is constantly fed the most delicate dishes. Kettles boil from morning until late at night; people throng in the yurt. They eat and drink as during the bear festival, and a part of each dish is given to the deceased. When they smoke, they put their mouths to the lips of the deceased, and share with him this favorite of Gilyak pleasures. While the body of the deceased is in the house, custom dictates that

/87 cont./

*614 On all the important occasions of life; in case of sick-372 ness, on the hunt, before setting out on a dangerous journey,
776 etc. -- the clansman throws into the fire his modest sacri-
782 fices -- a leaf of tobacco, sweet root, a drop of arrack -- and asks the old woman of the fire to fulfill his request. And she knows all the means necessary to insure that a petition to one or another clan deity -- if they are outside the sphere of her immediate influence -- reaches its destination.

*614 In order to understand the real basis of the "clan"
372 attitude toward the master of the fire and his functions, it 776 is necessary to keep in mind the following: 1) the deceased
● 775 are given to burning, i.e., to the common master of the fire, who can receive his favorites into his clan, so that these latter in turn become "masters" of the clan fire; 2) in particular all those who perish by fire and lightning (2) become such masters; 3) the concept of /88/ an "old woman" (mistress) of the clan fire, instead of a "master," is a faint echo of the maternal clan; 4) the "universality" of fire, its ability to spread quickly, its many tongues (tongues of flame), which all primitive people (compare the Rig-Veda) understand in the most realistic sense -- give the "fire" special advantages over the other "masters" -- namely, the rapid and eloquent transmission of messages and petitions; finally, 5) the fire is a warming and purifying substance, i.e., a substance that drives away evil spirits.

[171] 2. It is curious that a similar view exists among the Buryat: a man who perishes from lightning becomes a powerful and beneficent spirit to whom sacrifices are made and prayers are raised.

CONTINUED ON NEXT FICHE

ONTINUED
FROM RECEDING
FICHE

/88 cont./

*614 372 Externally the clan unity of the fire finds expression in the following ways. Only a clansman has the right to light a fire in the hearth of a clansman. Only a clansman has the right to take fire out of the yurt. A member of another clan who has lighted his pipe at the clan hearth may not leave the yurt until he has finished his pipe. Any [688] infraction of these rules of the inviolability of the clan fire by a member of another clan inevitably incurs dangerous consequences for the clansmen and the obligation for the member of another clan to pay blood money.

Each clan has its own clan steel, guarded by the oldest member, and only with this steel can the fire be lighted when bear meat is cooked at the bear festival, which plays such an important role in the religious and clan life of the Gilyak. When it becomes necessary for the clan to divide, i.e., when a part of the clan is compelled to emigrate to a very distant place, the oldest member of the clan breaks the clan steel and entrusts one half to the oldest of the emigrants, and only after this is the clan formally divided.

The mistress of the fire, as the representative of the akhmal'k clan, plays quite an important role in interclan relations, binding, through her cult and protection, the clan in whose midst she dwells and to which she gave birth with the clan from which she came; from generation to generation she brings into it the daughters of her brothers and their descendants.

*614 ● 775 3. One mountain man, sea man, etc. -- the common benevolent clan masters of the mountain, sea, earth, etc. In the section on religious beli[illegible] we have already explained the nature and significance of this type of deity. These are not the fantastic heroes of the classical clans, not the vague, mythical beings whose clan celebrations were a simple traditional ritualism, but clansmen close to each living generation, who either died some kind of unnatural death (in the water, slain by a forest beast, and so forth) or, cremation, and the ears are placed upright, facing each other, in order to be noticeable from afar.

/89 cont./

614 713 712 796 182

clansmen serve as daily reminders of them.

But the bond of the clan with its divine clansmen is not limited to piety and grateful recollection; these ties are rooted in a more practical and stronger motive force -- the very instinct of self-preservation. For the Gilyak there is no more indubitable truth than that all his prosperity, all that nature gives him in return for his desperate efforts in the struggle for existence, all this is the free gift of the gods, his benefactors; without their benevolence, all the efforts of man would be fruitless. And the gods-clansmen, as we know, take part above all else in this life-giving benevolence; they are the true sustainers of the clan, and there is no weightier obligation for any clansman than to promote this benevolence to the best of his ability. That is why the clan sacrifice and festival, held once a year according to rule, /90/ for the mountain and sea people are most important acts of clan life, in which everyone, in the name of self-preservation, considers it his most sacred obligation to take the most fervent part.

In the section on religion we dwelt in detail on these periodic sacrifices to the masters of the sea and mountains. Without exaggeration one can say that the whole social activity of the Gilyak is principally directed to preparation for the clan sacrifices and to preoccupation with celebrating them most magnificently. Wealthy and poor man alike, according to their abilities and means, not from fear but for conscience's sake, make all possible efforts, sometimes denying themselves their last possessions, in order that the sacrifices be as ample and varied as possible and that the festivals be as magnificent as possible; this is the general interest of one and all.

/90 cont./

* 614 713 712 796 182

In its evolution, this solidarity in the sacrifices to clansmen, fostered for ages, becomes the principle of the clan relation to the gods in general. When in whole individual affairs, during illness, say, the Gilyak makes a sacrifice, he will without fail summon his absent clansmen, even from afar, so that they may enjoy the beneficial consequences of the sacrifice.

614 713 712 796 182 * 614 713

The principle of common clan deities, the sustainer of the clan, is the foundation of the institution of hospitality and the most extensive fraternal mutual aid.

It should be evident to anyone acquainted with the institution of hospitality among primitive peoples, even if only from travelers' descriptions, that it must be based on something more than mere social etiquette or even ordinary sympathy for one's fellow creatures. The Arab, at his own hearth manifests the warmest hospitality to even his enemy, concerning whom at any other place he has only one imperative -- kill, evidently is impelled by a more powerful motive, a motive which has behind it religious sanction. And this must be said about the basis of the institution among all other primitive peoples, including the Gilyak. The Gilyak considers it his obligation to extend hospitality not only to the traveler, not only to the actually hungry man, but also in cases where from our point of view there is no necessity whatever for displaying this feeling. No matter how many times a day a neighbor may appear at his hearth, no matter what time of day it be, the guest is immediately offered all the viands in the possession of the host, not to mention the inevitable handful of tobacco for his pipe. /91/ If there is no extra tobacco, the host takes from with the guest in drawing on a common pipe. These attitudes are most striking in the handling of rare, costly dishes and delicacies. If you bring the host a glass of vodka, he will never allow himself to drink it alone, he will merely put his lips to it, and then it goes around to all the dwellers in the house, although there may be dozens of them, including the children, even suckings. To do otherwise would be a very great sin, one might die.

/91 cont./

very great sin; one might die." It is a sin not to be hospitable, not to share edibles. And the reason is clear: the gods, as we have seen, are the ones that "feed" man, and principally the clan gods, who provide for not one man, but the whole clan, which brings them sacrifices and which is bound to them by clan ties; to eat, therefore, without sharing with a clansman who is present and, in general, not to feed him, is a "sin" and a direct risk of losing the benevolence of the gods-sustainers. It is not by chance that in all this the "hearth" plays a great role. In the fire of the hearth lives the "master and mistress" of the fire, "a clansman or even an ancestor, who does not miss a single thing that takes place in the house; they, as we have seen, are the intermediaries between the clan and its clan gods, and there is nothing more natural than that the gods of the hearth should above all be the guardians of the principle of hospitality.

But the ties of the clansmen, living by the favors of their gods-clansmen, are so binding that the recipients of "regaling" alone, but by the real, most extensive principle of the community of earthly benefits. If this does not find expression in a purely communistic form, it is only because there is no necessity whatever for it. Life is so simple, the conditions of acquiring food are so simple, the gifts of nature lie so widely and freely before each person, that there is no necessity for communistic production and distribution. Yet the principle is in full force. In the communal hunting for sea animals, for example, in one boat, it is the owner of the boat who is generally also the most skillful hunter, but he receives no more than the last adolescent rower, and, in addition, a part of the catch is distributed to those families whose members for one reason or another could not participate in the hunting. Dried fish, the principal food of the Gilyak, is regarded almost as communal property, and anyone whose supplies have run out takes some from his neighbor without any objections. At any rate, no one goes hungry as long as any clansman has provisions. All the hungry individual has sought by the deities, were prematurely torn from life in more natural ways, /89/ for example, those who died from longing for the mountain, sea, and such people who were enamored of them.

614 713 712 796 182 * 614 713 712 796 182 * 614 713 712 796 182 *

[025] [026] [027] [028] [029] [030] [031] [032] [033] [034] [035] [036] [037] [038] [039] [040] [041] [042]

/88 cont./

The beloved and chosen ones of the "master" of one or another element, upon whose bounty depends the entire welfare of the Gilyak, pass immediately after death into the clan of the corresponding "master" for a fairly long time (in the case of the mountain people, for example, up to their second death, i.e., for two generations, and during all this time, of course, they especially shower benefits upon their kinsmen, sending them forest beasts (the mountain man), or fish and sea animals (the water or sea man). And when the Gilyak speaks of some "mountain" man or some such man who feeds him, he has in mind his kinsman, who, within his recollection or at the most that of his father or grandfather, found himself, in the ways indicated above, among the host of the "masters." The time span of such [765] a chosen one is not long (two generations at most) and frequently one clansman has barely joined the gods when he is followed by a second, third, etc., cases of death from an attack by a wild beast or on the water are not rare. Thus, the bond between the living generation of clansmen and their divine clansmen-benefactors is profoundly alive and real. Many of them were known to everyone, either personally or through the vivid recollections of their contemporaries; special monuments (1) erected by their grateful

[766]

1. The monument of a man slain by a bear is the frame of a bear hunter, in which the remains of the slain man are kept in accordance with a special ritual (see below, subsection 6 /p.551 ff./). As for those who drowned, a boat with all the appurtenances of sea and river pursuits is put on the site of their

/761 cont./
heaven. My informant remarked that Mlygh-wo must be a large village, considering the number of persons who die "peacefully" or from sickness, but he could not say anything more about it. The various things put over the ashes of the deceased, such as eagle wings, food provisions, etc. (), serve for a rapid and safe

 See Appendix 47 /p. 1227 /, 53 /p. 1233/.

journey to it.

The surprising answer to my further question as to what happened to the soul of a person killed by a bear ran: Such a soul assumes the shape of a bear and wanders in the forest and in the mountains.

/762/ Undoubtedly among the Gilyak (as well as among the Olcha (*) this is the conception of a transmigration of souls, for

* See Appendix 45, p. 1224.

they put the body of a person killed by a bear into a special little burial house (tschchyf-ngych) and bring it berries, supplies of fish, and the like (). Nevertheless, the dead person himself, i.e.,

 See Appendix 57, p. 1237.

his soul, is said to go into the forest in the shape of a bear, with the skin and fur, etc.

Only the difficulty, with an inadequate knowledge of the language, of reaching an understanding about abstract concepts with a primitive people little inclined toward abstraction has kept me from learning the Gilyak expression for "soul." The above-mentioned views concerning the consequences of death among the Gilyak make it clear beyond any doubt that they are familiar with the concept of the "soul" as a spiritual force innate in the human being. The above-mentioned concept of the metempsychosis of a person killed by a bear also explains to a certain extent why food provisions are brought to his corpse. His soul still wanders about

/762 cont./
on the earth, while the soul of a murdered person has flown to heaven and therefore no longer needs earthly food. Furthermore, this idea may in part also give rise to the reverence, devotion, and often very anthropomorphic treatment of the bear by the Gilyak. (Bm. II, 57-59.)

44. Gilyak. Among the Gilyak, as among the Olcha (),

 See Appendix 45, below.

the soul of a person drowned in the river or in the sea (according to Jutschin's report) does not go to heaven or to Mlygh-wo, but goes into a seal dog, and, to be sure, into a kighitsch or pyghilangr, i.e., the adult Phoca vitulina or nautica. A number of uitsch are therefore connected with the catching of a sea dog. For example, when the sea dog is caught and before any use is made of it, a cut with the knife must always be made through each eye so that the liquid can flow out. This is caught in the hollow of the hand and thrown back into the river. Only then may the sea dog be used as needed (†).

†. See p. 851.

It is difficult to say how the Gilyak conceive of heaven (tlõ), where the souls of the murdered are said to go. As an answer to my question as to whether these souls go to one of the stars, which are also earths, I was told that they also went beyond these, kikr, i.e., "inland" from the stars (††). (Bm. II, pp. 62, 63.)

†† Therefore beyond them; see the star-dwellers, p. 1101.

45. Olcha. From Chossiambo I learned the following about the views of the Olcha with regard to the fate of the dying and the metempsychosis into aquatic animals and bears:

/770 cont./
the village. The raff, then, is a memorial erected for the deceased.

The cremation site was very simply marked: the ashes scraped together, enclosed in an elongated frame formed by four boards set vertically, and this covered with boards; around the boards of the frame, however, little sticks with zach were placed (see Plate LXV /p. 1265 /, to the right in the middle distance).

There was no pittyssj in Kalm. I learned that such is set up for a deceased person only if no snow has yet fallen at the time of death; otherwise it would be uitsch to set up a pittyssj. (2 S.R. I, pp. 4-6.)

57. Gilyak. According to Surgin's report, not every deceased person is given a raff. If a very small infant dies, the corpse is not cremated, but simply wrapped and buried in the ground, and no raff is erected for it, for the soul of such a child does not wander, but goes to heaven. If larger children die, the corpses are cremated, and one raff is erected for two of them. Each adult gets a raff, men and women. The corpse of a person who has drowned is cremated, but no raff is erected over the ashes; rather, a stick is stuck in the ground and a boat is placed next to it. If a Gilyak dies /771/ from being wounded by a bear the corpse is not cremated, but deposited in a structure which is especially erected out of beams crossing at the ends. Such a burial house is called tschchyf(*)-ngych and usually is located in the forest where the deceased fell in the fight with the bear. The soul of such an unfortunate person does not go to heaven. The burial house has a small opening through which all kinds of foods are deposited for the deceased, such as berries, fish, groats, etc. Inasmuch as these these articles lie next to the corpse, they acquire a strong curative power against various sicknesses, and ailing Gilyak customarily go to such a burial house and eat some of the food deposited there, which cures them at once. The depositing of food in such a structure goes on for months and years, and consequently also the visits to it for a cure.

* Tschchyf--the bear.

chrenck--1240 E-5 (1854-1856) 1881-1895 RX2 Gilyak RX2
Goldi RX3
Olcha

2 cont./

1. (cont.)
members of a village -- or -- as in the case of a suicide -- it is automatically omitted.

Since the soul of a murdered person flies to heaven, it does need any of the articles such as are placed in the raff for the dering soul of a person who died a natural death. (Bm. I, 52-54.)

62. Gilyak. As the Gilyak (on the west coast of Sakhalin) me, they burn their corpses and erect wagn over the ashes murdered persons. (2 W.R. I, p. 8.)

63. Gilyak. The Tymy Gilyak assembled in Ngachd-wo the left bank of the Tymy on Sakhalin) said that they like- usually burn their corpses, as is done along the Amur, in Liman, and on the west coast of Sakhalin up to Arkai (excl.). aff is erected over the ashes of the cremated corpse and, as g the Amur, has a kakk, pyk or tutut, and pyk-ngit or tutut- in it. The pittyssj is present in the raff and among the Tymy ak bears the designation raff-njo, that is, burial-house storage- mber, which wholly corresponds to its significance. Only the am-ngar is missing (*). (2. W.R.I, p. 45.)

* See Appendix 53 /p. 1233/, 55 /p. 1234/.

64. Gilyak. From Arkai on, along the west coast of halin, south to Pilja-wo, the last Gilyak village, the Gilyak said not to cremate their corpses which is regarded as uftsch, o deposit them in wooden coffins in small houses, just as ng the Tungusic tribes of Manchuria and Sakhalin and the (2 W. R. I, pp. 8, 45.)

/773/ According to another report, the corpses are interred of Arkai (2 W.R. II, p. 25).

65. Olcha. In the forest not far from the Russian village of rodskoye in the vicinity of the Olcha village of Pullj (Pulu he map, on the right bank of the Amur), there were two very efully worked Olcha tombs ornamented with various paintings

4:Ivanov et al. E-4 (no date) 1964 RX2 Gilyak RX2

780 Peoples of Northern Siberia and the Far East

764 burned their dead, but they also buried them in the earth. During the burning, they broke the sled on which they had brought the corpse and killed dogs. Their meat was cooked in large cauldrons and eaten on the spot. The "sendoff of the soul" took place several days later, on the day of the "lifting the tree," as the cemetery was called. There they built a raf—a little hut for the figurine which represented the dead.

At the cemetery more dogs were killed on this day. The women sewed clothing for the figurines. Models of hunting and fishing gear were attached to the figurine, and a variety of household articles were laid with it. The real gun, kettle, teapot and other articles were broken nearby. It was held that on this day the soul migrated in a sled into the world of the dead, situated underground. The dead were buried only by members of their clan.

